THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was happy to have an opportunity of stating to the House the nature of the measure before them, and the Amendments which we had thought right to make in it. In order to render the subject intelligible he might remind the House that when the general Charity Bill was passed in 1853, giving the Commissioners a summary power, of making inquiry into the administration of charitable estates, it was thought wise to exempt the Roman Catholic charities from the operation of that statute. The reason was that anterior to the passing of the statute of William IV., Roman Catholic charities were, from the then state of the law, generally invalid, and it was accordingly requisite for the Roman Catholics, in order to give effect to any charity connected with their religion, to make secret and clandestine arrangements for that purpose, and to rely upon the honour of individuals, to whom they committed the trust, in order not to infringe the Statute of Mortmain. Therefore, it was not thought just that these charities should be subjected to the inquiry of the Commissioners. It was, however, thought requisite that some measure should be introduced for the purpose of giving an opportunity to Roman Catholics of placing their charities on the same footing with those of Protestant Dissenters, and so to arrange them as to admit of their being brought within the operation of the general law. A Bill was accordingly introduced for that purpose by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer). Upon examining that Bill it appeared to him (the Attorney General) necessary that some alterations and additions should be made, and he proposed now to explain the effect and operation of the various provisions of the Bill in its present form. The first clause was one which required the careful attention of the House. The enactment of the first section was that a good charitable use should not be tainted and rendered invalid by its being connected with a superstitious use. He considered that those uses which were pronounced by the statute of Edward VI. to be superstitious still retained that character, and were consequently illegal and void. The present state of the law was, that if there was a gift to a good charity, but so mixed up with a superstitious use that what was given to the one could not be distinguished from that which was given to the other

—if the superstitious were inseparably connected with the valid use, the result was that the superstitious use voided the good charity, and the whole of the property became forfeited to the Crown. But that seemed to be unreasonable and unjust. Therefore the object of the first clause in the Bill was to alter that state of the law, and to render the good use valid and free from objection, notwithstanding its connection with the superstitious use. But no validity was given to the superstitious use, which remained bad as before. It should be carefully observed that the first section saved only gifts for charities relating to the Roman Catholic religion, and that word "charity" was carefully explained by the interpretation clause to mean such charities only as would be perfectly good and valid under the General Charitable Act of 1853. The first section, therefore, might be read thus — "That no gift for any good and valid charity should be made void and invalid, simply by reason of there being some direction touching prayers for the dead, or observances of Roman Catholic ceremonies usual in the ordinary mode of performing Divine worship in the Roman Catholic Church." There was then no foundation for the apprehension which some hon. Members seemed to entertain that the effect of the measure would be to encourage and render valid superstitious uses. He was perfectly sure in his own mind that such an apprehension was totally without foundation. The second section had the effect of preserving Roman Catholic charities, with regard to their administration, prior to the 2nd and 3rd William IV., from any investigation in a court of justice, save only so far as there might have been any fraudulent misappropriation of property. The reason was that almost every Roman Catholic charity having been originally constituted by reason of the former state of the law, so as to produce a reprehensible state of things, it was not thought just to leave those charities exposed to legal proceedings when their condition had been produced solely by previous legislation. The third section imposed on all existing Roman Catholic charities which were constituted by deed the obligation of enrolling those deeds within a twelvemonth after the passing of the Act. By the Statute of Mortmain persons creating a charity by deed, which conveyed any real estate for the purposes of the charity, were comcreased tolls would not only pay the working charges but leave a sufficient margin.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the Caledonian canal was made at a time when it was believed that it would be an advantage in periods of war, but from the moment of its construction up to the present it had been a tax upon the country. If the Bill were thrown out an annual expenditure would be required, but as it afforded them a fair prospect of getting rid of that constantly recurring expense, he hoped that it would be allowed to pass.

MR. STEUART said, he thought the passing of the measure would save the country expense, and hoped the hon. Gentleman would not insist upon a division.

MR. CAIRD denied that the Scotch Members had any interest in the canal, and said that unless it could be shown that its maintenance was a national object, no penny of the public money should be voted in its support. The tolls which were already charged were considered too high, and if the effect of the Bill would be to make them higher it would be better if it were withdrawn.

MR. LONGFIELD said, that if the hon. Member pressed this question to a division he should conscientiously vote with him. The security offered was not of the kind that any prudent man would advance money upon.

MR. DEEDES was inclined to give his support to the third reading of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, that the canal was continually swallowing money, and he never heard that it had been of use to any one. It was now proposed to increase the tolls, although the result of modern experience showed that by reducing them more money was got. The nimble ninepence was better than the slow shilling. Still if the Chancellor of the Exchequer could assure the House that he believed the outlay of the money to be borrowed to promote the undertaking would be so usefully expended that the increased traffic would repay the expenditure he should have no objection to vote for the Bill.

MR. BUCHANAN supported the Bill, and urged that the maintenance of the canal was of national interest and importance.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the House would assent to the Bill, as the best mode avoiding those demands on the public resources which had hitherto arisen in connection with the canal in question.

Mr. Laing

That canal might not be so useful as it was supposed it would be when it was constructed, but it would be, he thought bad policy to refuse to pass a measure which, by levying toll on those who used the canal, would afford some prospect of maintaining the necessary communication, without at the same time applying to Parliament for grants of public money for the purpose. Those who professed to be the guardians of the public purse ought not to object to a Bill the object of which was to protect that purse.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to have an answer to the question put by his right hon. Friend, the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), because both his vote and the vote of his right Friend depended upon that answer. He wished to know whether it was absolutely necessary to keep these canals. Could they not be given up?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that he believed an increased toll would, judiciously applied, afford the sole chance of materially improving the revenue of the canal, so as to relieve the public from an annual charge on its account. The contemplated expenditure would, in his opinion, prove to be of a remunerative character, and tend to improve the general resources of the canal.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 98; Noes 47: Majority 51.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHARITIES BILL.— CONSIDERATION.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question (18th June), "That the Bill be now taken into consideration."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he had any information as to the fulfilment of an understanding made the other night that the Bill should not be proceeded with, until there was a fair opportunity for a full discussion, and until the Attorney General was present to give explanations as to the various Amendments introduced into the Bill. It was hardly possible to proceed with a subject of such magnitude at that hour; but he should wish to know from the Attorney General when the opportunity would be afforded?

MR. BOWYER said, he had no objection to the committal of the Bill, and would therefore second the Motion.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to observe that a great number of hon. Members who took an interest in the matter had gone away upon the understanding that another day would be especially appointed for the recommitment of the Bill. at an hour when it was reasonable to expect a full attendance. Almost all the proceedings on the Bill had been taken behind the back of the House, and he trusted it would not be proceeded with in the absence of many hon. Members who desired to discuss the question.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he hoped that no obstruction would be offered to the House going into Committee. He did not know to whom the hon. Member alluded as being absent, but he (Mr. Newdegate) was present, and all would admit that on that question he was a host in himself.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question?"

Put, and negatived.

Word added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Bill re-committed.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1, (Roman Catholic Charities not to be avoided on account of certain trusts.)

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask the Attorney General whether the words of the clause did not go somewhat further than he had stated. He understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that it only went to this—that any bequest which was for the purpose of procuring prayers for the souls of those who had departed, or any other religious ceremony, was not to be held to be superstitious. The words were "Any trust condition or request in conformity with the doctrine, discipline, canons, laws, or usages of the Roman Catholic Church." It seemed to him that that was setting up, by law, all the canons, all the discipline, and usage of the Romish Church wholesale.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the true meaning of the clause was, that no gift for any valid or legal charitable purpose should be or deemed to be invalid or void, by reason of its having any trust, condition, or request for procuring prayers for the soul of the donor, or any trust, condition, or request in conformity with the doctrine, discipline, and so forth of the Roman Catholic Church attached thereto. No gift for any charitable purpose would fail of taking effect by reason of there being attached to it some direction connected with the Roman Catholic Church, which direction the law held to be superstitious. In Shelford's work on Mortmain, in the chapter on Superstitious Uses, there was a passage pointing out the state of the law, which he thought unjust, and which was intended to be remedied by this enactment. The state of the law seemed to be this: where a charitable use was intermixed with a superstitious use so that they could be distinguished, the King was entitled to so much only as was given for the superstitious use; but where the gifts to the good use and to the superstitious use were so mixed up together that nothing separate was limited to the good use, and nothing separate or distinct was limited to the superstitious use—in such cases the intermixture of the bad use with the good use infected the whole. The case in which that doctrine was applied was the case of a gift for a charity school, the bequest containing a provision that the priest who presided over it should sing masses for the soul of the founder, and perform some other Roman Catholic religious duties which the law held to be superstitious. It was held that it was impossible to determine how much money was given to the school and how much for the superstitious uses, and the whole was, therefore, bad. Surely that was not just, and that was the only state of things which this particular enactment was intended to remedy and redress. The clause enacted that no gift should be deemed invalid by reason of there being attached to it some direction which the law deemed superstitious. But the gift to the superstitious use would still remain invalid and void, and be forfeited to the Crown.

MR. ADDERLEY said, if the clause did no more than the Attorney General said it did there could be no reasonable objection to it; but he suspected it went a great deal further. He wished to ask, Whether, if property were left for a good use in one part of the country, and a bad use in a distant place, both would not be legalized?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the enactment would leave the superstitious use in a distant place still amenable to the law and absolutely void. The present state of the law, by reason of the identity of trust, made the whole thing bad. If one entire thing was given to a bad pur-

pelled to enrol that deed, and, if not enrolled, it became null and void. Accordingly, the same provision was henceforth to be made applicable to Roman Catholic charities which were constituted by existing deeds, the object being to give them the power of publishing the nature of the charity, and an opportunity for investigation by the Commissioners, and in this way to make them generally amenable to the law. But the section had an additional provision. Many Roman Catholic charities not having been constituted, for reasons already stated, by deed, this section threw upon the trustees of the charity the obligation to verify by a statement in writing the mode of the administration of the charity during the last twenty years, and to enrol that declaration in lieu of the deed. The great object of this provision was to give notoriety to the constitution and present establishment, condition, and administration of all Roman Catholic charities. The 4th section merely threw upon the charity the expense of complying with the obligations of the measure. The 5th section was the interpretation clause. The 6th section introduced, with regard to Roman Catholic charities, a rule of law which had already been established by the case commonly known as Lady Hewley's case. In many religious charities there had been in the absence of a written settlement a great fluctuation in their administration, in consequence of the variance from time to time of religious tenets, and it was determined that where there had been a settled custom for a period of twenty years, that uniform administration for such a period should be accepted as the final manifestation and proof of the nature of the trust affecting the charity property. Accordingly, such a rule being more immediately required in the case of Roman Catholic charities for the reason already stated—that they were depending rather on the honour of the trustees than on any legal obligation, and were therefore necessarily subject to fluctuations in their administration—this enactment was introduced. The remaining section prevented the Act from having a retrospective operation. This was the sum total of the enactments contained in the Bill. The only alteration of law which might be considered as a relief extended to Roman Catholics was the taking away of that very unjust, and, as he thought, very severe enactment, which made the presence of any superstitious use sufficient to invalidate the gift with which it was connected, remembering always, that under that word, superstitious use was included by the law things which were of daily occurrence in the ordinary exercise of Roman Catholic worship, such as the saying of prayers for the dead, and not only the performance of mass, but the ordinary burning of lights, candles, and so forth, all of which were still regarded as superstitious uses. To that extent the first section gave relief. The rest of the Bill was directed to the laudable purpose of bringing forth to light all existing Roman Catholic Charities, under the penalty of being made void if not duly brought to light and registered. They were all now to be brought under the ordinary jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners, and were to be placed in that respect on the same footing and made subject to the same obligation, and if not brought under the Act, to incur the same penalties as at present affected other charities. That was the total of the Bill. It seemed to him to be a measure which it was desirable should be passed, on the ground that it was just to put these charities on a footing that would render them amenable to the general law, and that that should no longer continue in the anomalous position in which they at present stood. The principle was fully recognized by the House when they passed the Act of 1853; and he trusted the House would be of opinion that the object had been attained by the provisions of the Bill before them.

The Attorney General

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he rose to move an Amendment, when

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member had already spoken.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I rose on a question of order.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot again be heard. It was after I had put the question that the speech of the hon. Member was made.

MR. HENLEY said, he would make the Motion which his hon. Friend had lost the opportunity of making. The statement of the Attorney General with regard to the operation of the first clause was so important that the Bill required serious consideration from the House, and he would, therefore, move that it be recommitted.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out the words 'now taken into consideration,' in order to add the word 'recommitted,'—instead thereof."

should be taken to express the intention of the Legislature clearly and unmistakeably. The more he looked at the clause the less he understood it; and he therefore hoped the Attorney General would undertake to amend it, and let it be considered again on a future occasion.

MR. MONSELL said, that the result of postponing the measure from night to night, would be that the Government would be compelled at the end of the Session, as they had done before, to pass a Continuance Bill for exemption from penalties. The measure was a very moderate one indeed. It did not cure superstitious uses, but merely provided that money left for a good use should not be confiscated when mixed up with a superstitious use. That was very scant justice, when it was remembered that the objects of these superstitious uses were intimately connected with a religion which was tolerated in this country, and professed by so many of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. He trusted the Committee would proceed with the clause.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the clause undoubtedly was open to different interpretations, and he, therefore, thought that it should say simply what the Attorney General said it ought to say. To render it clear it seemed to require some such proviso as the following, "that no such last-mentioned trust, condition, or bequest, shall be hereby rendered valid or legal." He hoped that they would be able to avoid the necessity of a continuance Bill.

MR. FULLER said, he should propose in Clause 1, line 15, to insert the words "or have been" with a view of giving the clause a retrospective operation, to a certain extent.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was evident that hon. Members were not prepared to deal with the Question. He, therefore, would move that the Chairman should report progress.

MR. BOWYER said, it must be clear to the Committee that the object of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was delay and nothing but delay. On the 4th of the next month the Act suspending the operations of the Charity Commissioners as regarded Roman Catholic Charities would expire, and there was therefore no time to lose. The Bill was one to amend the law relating to Charities; and it legalised nothing except what were charities within the Charitable Trusts Act of 1853; it left the question of superstitious uses entirely untouched. The clause had been framed by Mr. Stonor with great care, and he did not think it could be improved.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that there appeared to be no great difference of opinion with regard to the object to be accomplished; but, as the phraseology of the clause was unsatisfactory to many hon. Members, he would suggest that the consideration of it should be postponed, and that the Attorney General should bring up upon the Report another clause carrying out the views on which all were agreed.

MR. WHALLEY said, he differed from the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk as to the meaning of the clause, and he did not think it prudent to raise in that House a discussion respecting (to use the language of the clause) "the doctrine, discipline, canons, laws, and usages of the Roman Catholic Church." He saw no reason why there should be a special exemption of Roman Catholic Charities from the general law respecting charities.

MR. SPOONER denied that his hon. Colleague (Mr. Newdegate) was anxious to delay the Bill beyond the time which might be necessary for the Attorney General to render the clause clearly expressive of the views of the Committee. Last year a Bill was brought in by the Government which entirely expressed those views, and he wished that it could be now proceeded with. That Bill provided that when charities were left for illegal and superstitious purposes the intention of the founders should be carried out by the Ecclesiastical Commission, as far as might be, divested of the illegalities.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would endeavour to shape the clause into a simpler form of words.

MR. BUTT suggested that the clause should be passed, subject to such modification which could be made on the Report. He thought the clause did not go far enough. He—Protestant as he was, and he called himself a strong Protestant—was prepared to sweep away all the restrictions connected with superstitious uses, and even to say that a gentleman might leave his property even for masses for the repose of his soul.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS suggested that, as the Attorney General had proposed to modify the clause on the Report, it should be postponed, in order that the remainder of the clauses might be now passed through Committee.

pose and a good purpose, and no room was left to discriminate how much was intended to the bad, and how much to the good, the bad infected the whole, and the whole gift would be invalid. Surely that was wrong; and that was what the present Bill was intended to redress. Supposing a gift for the education of Roman Catholic children in Warwickshire, coupled with a gift for masses to be said, or an image of the Virgin to be erected in a chapel in Northumberland, the superstitious use itself would still continue to be wholly invalid, and would be amenable to the existing law. He admitted, with regard to a former Bill, that he had desired that whatever was given to a superstitious use should be applied in augmentation of the legal use. He should have desired to do that now, but he found it was not acceptable to the Roman Catholic Members. If they were content with the law relating to superstitious uses, and only desired to modify it, he (the Attorney General) had no right to force a general repeal upon them, permitting them to apply to a good charitable use what had been given to a bad.

MR. WALPOLE remarked that if the Attorney General himself had drawn the clause under consideration, there would have been no discussion about it, for he might say that they all assented entirely to the proposition which his hon. and learned Friend had laid down. The difficulty arose, not from what he had said, but because the clause did not say what he had said. If his hon. and learned Friend would apply his mind to the subject, and so amend the clause as to carry into effect that laudable object which he had in view, he (Mr. Walpole) would undertake that there would be no further difficulty. The clause as it stood placed the Roman Catholic charities in a different position from other charities.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that he held in his hand an opinion from a legal authority for whom he had great respect; and this opinion confirmed what he himself thought, and this was, that the clause under discussion would give effect to endowments of Roman Catholic institutions of all kinds, provided that they were in conformity with the laws, canons, and usages of the Church of Rome. The Committee and the House would, therefore, if they passed the clause declare valid certain institutions which by the Act of 1829 were prohibited; and they would incorporate with the law of England the whole canon law of the Church of Rome. These were serious things to be done by a single clause. And who was to interpret the canon law of the Church of Rome; for they would be told, as the Courts of this country had been told, in several well-known cases, that they were incompetent to interpret the canon law of the Church of Rome; the Court of Chancery would thus be driven to accept as indisputable all such authoritative dicta as the Pope might think fit to enunciate, or which might be declared consistent with the canon law of Rome by those whom the Court of Rome might think fit to appoint, and according to those dicta to validate institutions that by law were illegal, for the exception as to superstitious uses would scarcely touch many of these Institutions, which were on other grounds illegal. He thought, therefore, that the Bill, by inference rather than by direct enactment, would contravene the great compact under which Roman Catholics were admitted to sit in that House. He warned the Committee not to adopt legislation directly in favour of the Jesuits and of other regular orders connected with the Church of Rome, who throughout Europe were the great originators of oppression, recognized and treated as such, and who had been deemed deserving of being expelled from every country in Europe. [An hon. Member: Hear, hear!] He supposed that the hon. Member rejoiced at that circumstance. The existence of the orders to which he had referred was inconsistent with true freedom, and had been found inconsistent with the preservation of peace and social order in countries where there were Protestants as well as Roman Catholics. He objected, therefore to this clause, as being in contravention of the Act of 1829, and as tending directly to legally establish in this free country those orders which, especially the Jesuits, had been expelled from time to time by every nation of Europe, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, and this has taken place among countries which value or are seeking constitutional freedom, the instances reach to the present day.

The Attorney General

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the best plan would be to report progress, as no one seemed to understand the clause. The Courts of Chancery sometimes complained that Acts of Parliament were passed in terms of great obscurity, and therefore in such a matter he thought the greatest care should be taken to express the intention of the Legislature clearly and unmistakeably. The more he looked at the clause the less he understood it; and he therefore hoped the Attorney General would undertake to amend it, and let it be considered again on a future occasion.

MR. MONSKILL said, that the result of postponing the measure from night to night, would be that the Government would be compelled at the end of the Session, as they had done before, to pass a Continuance Bill for exemption from penalties. The measure was a very moderate one indeed. It did not cure superstitious uses, but merely provided that money left for a good use should not be confiscated when mixed up with a superstitious use. That was very scant justice, when it was remembered that the objects of these superstitious uses were intimately connected with a religion which was tolerated in this country, and professed by so many of our Roman Catholic fellow-subjects. He trusted the Committee would proceed with the clause.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the clause undoubtedly was open to different interpretations, and he, therefore, thought that it should say simply what the Attorney General said it ought to say. To render it clear it seemed to require some such proviso as the following, "that no such last-mentioned trust, condition, or bequest, shall be hereby rendered valid or legal." He hoped that they would be able to avoid the necessity of a continuance Bill.

MR. PULLER said, he should propose in Clause 1, line 15, to insert the words "or have been" with a view of giving the clause a retrospective operation, to a certain extent.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it was evident that hon. Members were not prepared to deal with the Question. He, therefore, would move that the Chairman should report progress.

MR. BOWYER said, it must be clear to the Committee that the object of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was delay and nothing but delay. On the 4th of the next month the Act suspending the operations of the Charity Commissioners as regarded Roman Catholic Charities would expire, and there was therefore no time to lose. The Bill was one to amend the law relating to Charities; and it legalised nothing except what were charities within the Charitable Trusts Act of 1853; it left the question of superstitious uses entirely untouched. The clause had been framed by Mr. Stonor with great care, and he did not think it could be improved.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that there appeared to be no great difference of opinion with regard to the object to be accomplished; but, as the phraseology of the clause was unsatisfactory to many hon. Members, he would suggest that the consideration of it should be postponed, and that the Attorney General should bring up upon the Report another clause carrying out the views on which all were agreed.

MR. WHALLEY said, he differed from the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk as to the meaning of the clause, and he did not think it prudent to raise in that House a discussion respecting (to use the language of the clause) "the doctrine, discipline, canons, laws, and usages of the Roman Catholic Church." He saw no reason why there should be a special exemption of Roman Catholic Charities from the general law respecting charities.

MR. SPOONER denied that his hon. Colleague (Mr. Newdegate) was anxious to delay the Bill beyond the time which might be necessary for the Attorney General to render the clause clearly expressive of the views of the Committee. Last year a Bill was brought in by the Government which entirely expressed those views, and he wished that it could be now proceeded with. That Bill provided that when charities were left for illegal and superstitious purposes the intention of the founders should be carried out by the Ecclesiastical Commission, as far as might be, divested of the illegalities.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would endeavour to shape the clause into a simpler form of words.

MR. BUTT suggested that the clause should be passed, subject to such modification which could be made on the Report. He thought the clause did not go far enough. He—Protestant as he was, and he called himself a strong Protestant—was prepared to sweep away all the restrictions connected with superstitious uses, and even to say that a gentleman might leave his property even for masses for the repose of his soul.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS suggested that, as the Attorney General had proposed to modify the clause on the Report, it should be postponed, in order that the remainder of the clauses might be now passed through Committee.

MR. NEWDEGATE denied that he wished to delay the Bill. He had repeatedly urged that the Bill should be proceeded with. All that he had insisted on was that it should not be passed behind the back of the House. He begged to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. WHALLEY said, the law of the land had interfered to prevent Roman Catholics tying up in mortmain their property which might be devoted to useful purposes; but he again objected to the exception to the general law sought to be introduced by the Bill with regard to the doctrines, discipline, canons, laws, and usages of the Roman Catholic religion.

Motion for reporting Progress and the Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause negatived.

Clause 2 (no proceedings to be instituted as to dealings with Roman Catholic Charities prior to 2 & 3 Will. IV., c. 115).

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to ask whether this clause would not prevent all question or inquiry into the application of a charity to any purpose anterior to the Toleration Act, unless fraud could be proved. If so, it might be held to sanction the endowment of religious orders.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, in reply, explained that the clause would exempt from investigation every application of property given to a Roman Catholic charity, even though it was given to one charity and applied to another, save and except the application was to a private use, or, in other words, a fraudulent application, which would render it liable to the full operation of the law.

MR. HENLEY asked why a fraud should be protected when committed for a public purpose any more than for a private purpose?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that when all Roman Catholic charities were illegal they were sometimes applied to a charitable purpose, though not that originally intended. The object of the clause was that they should not pry too closely into such application, provided only it was for a charitable purpose.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he wished to insert, after the word "religion," the words "which took place."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 3, after the word "religion," to insert the words "which took place."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would move
Sir George Lewis

that the Chairman be ordered to report progress.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought that after the first clause had been postponed there could be no objection to passing the second clause before reporting progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 14; Noes 66: Majority 52.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. STEUART said, it was impossible to ascertain the exact meaning of the Amendments proposed, and it would, therefore, be better to report progress at once.

MR. ADDERLEY opposed the Motion.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 16; Noes 50; Majority 34.

MR. ADDERLEY said, the effect of the clause would be to exempt Roman Catholic charities from any proceedings whatever. He thought that any fraudulent misapplication of a charity to any private purpose, whether to or by a trustee, ought to be subject to proceedings, and he should propose to insert the words "to any private use or purpose."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL suggested that the right hon. Gentleman should alter his Amendment so as to read "to any private use or purposes not being charitable."

MR. ADDERLEY accepted the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 2, lines 8, to leave out the words 'to the private use or purposes of any trustee,' in order to insert the words 'any private use or purpose not being charitable.'"

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. WHALLEY proposed that, as so little advance was being made, the Chairman should be ordered to report progress.

LORD JOHN MANNERS hoped the discussion on this clause would be continued.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 9; Noes 47: Majority 38.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, a settlement of this question might be very desirable, but the House ought not to be forced to accept such a crude settlement as was offered by this Bill. The Attorney General had declared that it was the result of a compromise, and that it was not such a measure as he himself would have sanctioned.

LORD LOVAINE opposed the Motion for reporting progress.

MR. WHALLEY said, it was rather inconsistent for Roman Catholic Members to object to the House considering the doctrines and usages of the Church of Rome when legislating for Roman Catholic charities. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had informed the House that the doctrines and usages of the Church of Rome had proved the scourge of many of the countries of Europe.

MR. BOWYER said, he rose to order. The hon. Member was not justified in using language offensive to Members of that House.

MR. NEWDEGATE explained, that the hon. Member had attributed to him language he had not used. What he had said was, that there were religious orders of the Roman Catholic Church which had occasioned many of the civil and political convulsions of Europe.

MR. WHALLEY (who spoke amid frequent interruptions) said, he would call on Roman Catholics to state the grounds on which they wished for an exceptional law. Before legislating on the subject the House ought to be satisfied that these charities did not come within the ancient law of mortmain.

MR. LESLIE regretted that an attempt to alter the old laws of the country, by a measure of a very intricate character, should be persisted in at such an advanced hour (five minutes to two o'clock), and that the House should be almost forced to proceed by a clamour which he must say was marked by extreme indecency. As one clause had been already postponed it was but fair that the second should be likewise deferred.

MR. GEORGE LEWIS said, as the House was to meet again at twelve o'clock it would, perhaps, be wise to agree to the Adjournment.

MR. MONSELL said, it was evident that a settlement could be only effected in a conciliatory spirit. With this object he put it to his Friends at the other side whether it would not be well to defer the consideration of this clause.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 9; Noes 47: Majority 38.

Question again proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. STEUART moved that the Chairman report progress.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought the Minority had done enough to expose the character of the Bill; to exhibit that the majority, then present, could not be held in their present reduced numbers to represent the majority of the House, and therefore suggested that his hon. Friend should not persevere in his Amendment.

MR. WHALLEY said, that on the other hand he was fighting out the question.

MR. STEUART said, he would yield so far as to allow his Motion to be negatived if the Committee thought fit, but he would not withdraw it.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 7; Noes 46: Majority 39.

Clause as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

The House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Four o'clock, in the morning.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, June 22, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Local Boards of Health, &c.; Local Government Supplemental. 3^a Fisheries (Scotland).

LAW AND EQUITY BILL.

SELECT COMMITTEE MOVED.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in rising, pursuant to notice, to move that this Bill be referred to a Select Committee, said their Lordships had now to determine what course to take upon this very important Bill, which they had read a second time without a division. He ought, perhaps, to apologize for the delay which had occurred in again bringing the Bill under their Lordships' notice; the delay had arisen from a communication he had received from the Lord Chief Justice of England and two of his learned brethren, who acted as Commissioners to inquire into the practice and procedure of the Courts of common law. The equity Judges had presented a memorial, which at the request of the noble and learned Lord who sat near him (Lord St. Leonards), he had laid before their Lordships, in which they expressed their disapproval of the Bill. He hoped he need not assure their Lordships that he had a sincere and profound respect for the equity Judges—a respect which, if possible, had been increased since he had the honour of being associated with them. They were most learned, honourable, and devoted public functionaries, and he rejoiced that he had always been able to act with them with the most perfect harmony. But their opinions being hostile to the opinions of the common law Judges, headed by the Lord Chief Justice, it was impossible that he could act upon the recommendations of the Commissioners, without giving every possible opportunity for the full consideration of the provisions of the measure. The objections of the equity Judges would be found in the memorial which he most earnestly implored their Lordships to read, since it was written with great ability, and deserved their deepest attention. The question was whether any further equity jurisdiction should be given to the Courts of common law? He trusted that their Lordships would have no objection to the course he proposed, which was to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, consisting of all the law Lords and as many lay Lords as would do them the honour of assisting at their deliberations. He regretted to have received from his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) notice that he intended to oppose his Motion—on what grounds he could not easily conjecture. A monstrous misapprehension existed on this subject. People supposed that the Bill was meant to destroy the Court of Chancery, that it established a new and dangerous innovation, and would lead to fatal consequences. This was as far as possible from the fact. The principle was laid down by the Equity Commissioners, that equity jurisdiction should be given to the Courts of common law, so as to enable them to bring to a conclusion the causes that legitimately originated in those Courts. The principle briefly might be expressed in the words "one Court for one cause." If an equitable defence arose in a Court of common law the Bill proposed to give that Court the power of deciding the question, so that the parties might not be put to the expense of going before another tribunal, of engaging another staff of counsel, and of being subjected to the expense and vexation of a double litigation. From an early time a portion of equitable jurisdiction had been conferred upon the Courts of common law, which had always been exercised beneficially. So long ago as the reigns of William III. and Queen Anne, an equity jurisdiction was given to the Courts of common law with respect to actions on bonds with a penalty for the performance of contracts. In the reign of George II. this equitable jurisdiction was further extended; and whereas there used to be no mode of obtaining a discovery from either party in an action at law, save by filing a Bill in equity, the parties by recent legislation were mutually examined, and an inspection of all material writings was granted, so that the necessity of appealing to a Court of equity for those purposes had been entirely obviated. It was the aim of the present measure to give a further equitable jurisdiction to the Courts of common law. The Bill extended to Courts of law the jurisdiction enjoyed by Courts of equity in cases of forfeiture from non-payment of rent. By the Act of George II., the Courts of common law had a right to grant relief before trial: After trial, however, they had no right to interfere, the forfeiture took place, the lease had been broken, and the tenant might be ejected. The Court of equity had jurisdiction in similar cases for six months after the trial. Why, he asked, should it be necessary to appeal to the Court of equity when the action had been brought in the Court of law, and when that Court was as well able to form a judgment on the case as the Court of equity? There was another ground for extending the jurisdiction of the Courts of law of the greatest importance. There was at present no protection to property during litigation, and it might be destroyed or rendered useless by one of the parties, without the Court having power to interfere. It was necessary to apply to a Court of equity in such cases. But by the Bill it was proposed to give the common law Courts power to protect the property during litigation. It was further provided that injunctions might be granted in cases when that the common law Court should have the power of dealing with the equity matter. His noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) who opposed the Bill stated three objections to the decision to which the common law Judges had come on the subject—namely, that the common law Courts were overworked, that they had not the proper machinery, and that they were not competent for the purpose. From his noble and learned Friend he appealed to those Judges themselves, who declared that in point of time and labour they had no objection to the proposition now made; that they had abundance of time, and were not overworked, but were capable of taking this small fraction of addition to their labours. He could not help referring those who entertained objections to the proposed change in the proceedings of the Courts to that Report of the common law Commissioners in which the history of amendments in the law was traced with great accuracy, and where it was shown how matters, deemed at one time wild and dangerous innovations, had gradually, by the improvement of men's knowledge on a subject, become the law of the land. As a remarkable proof of this, they mentioned the changes effected in the law of evidence, by his (Lord Brougham's) Act of 1845, which had been found to work admirably, and to contribute greatly to the efficient administration of justice.

The Lord Chancellor

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he hoped that the Bill would be very much altered before it was passed into law. There ought, in fact, to be two Bills, and, notwithstanding the authority of the common law Judges, his objection to many parts of the first portion of the measure was not in the slightest degree lessened. He was bound to say, at the same time, that the opinion of their Lordships upon the principle of the Bill ought to have been tested when the Motion was made for the second reading. That change had been allowed to pass without opposition, and, inasmuch as there had been no other sharp encounter between the equity and common law Judges, it was impossible for their Lordships to make up their minds on the subject without carefully considering the statements and opinions on both sides. Of course, that could not be done by the House itself. It would be infinitely better to refer the matter to a Select Committee, and when the Bill came out of the Committee their Lordships would be able to decide whether it should be passed into law or not.

LORD KINGSDOWN said, that having carefully read the Memorial transmitted to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack by the Common Law Commissioners, he must say that their observations had not removed, or even in the slightest degree affected, the strong objections which he entertained to the present Bill. The Bill had two objects entirely distinct, which should properly form the subject of two different measures, but which, unfortunately, had been united in one. One portion of the Bill gave what he believed was in principle an entirely new jurisdiction to the Courts of common law. The other was confined to amending the proceedings in matters which properly came under the jurisdiction of those Courts. To the latter, if brought forward in a Bill by itself, there could be no objection; but the case was very different with respect to the former. If the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, the objections entertained by many noble Lords to its first portion, consisting of no fewer than thirty clauses, would continue to exist in precisely the same force. The only difference would be that those clauses, if the Committee should not approve them, would be expunged; or, if the Committee should approve them, they would be the subject of a hostile Motion on the third reading of the Bill. To the latter portion of the measure there could be no objection whatever, except in so far as Amendments might be thought desirable in the details. He could not help looking with considerable apprehension to the course about to be taken. If the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, it must, of necessity, occupy some time in its consideration there. It must occupy some further time in its discussion in the House after it came out of the Committee; and, supposing their Lordships should ultimately give it a third reading, at what period of the Session was it likely to go down to the other House? What might be its fate there he would not, of course, presume to say; but at present, at all events, the omens were not auspicious. The consequence would be that we should lose, for this Session at least, the whole of the Bill, the portion which was desirable as well as that to which the strongest objections were entertained.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that there had not been a single observation made to show that any one of the powers proposed by the present Bill might not be safely conferred upon the Courts of and gave relief against and moderated the rigour of the common law. But as you must necessarily know what a thing was before you could give relief against it, so it would be found that there was no first-rate equity lawyer who was not imbued with a fair knowledge of the common law. The common law Judges, however, had only to administer the common law; and, that being so, equity was to them utterly unimportant, except as a science which they might perhaps wish to know something about; they had not to found themselves upon the principles of equity; they had not to give relief against any rigour in the application of the rules of equity; and he hoped they would take no offence when he said that they were not and could not be expected to be, good equity Judges. Yet their Lordships were asked to transfer a great mass of equity business to the common law Courts. At present, if a man sold an estate, stipulating that the purchaser should be prepared with his conveyance and his money by the 10th of July, and if difficulties arose in consequence of which the purchaser was not prepared by the 10th of July, the seller could immediately bring an action in a court of law and recover damages; for time, in law, was of the essence of the contract. In equity just the reverse was the case, and unless it was expressly declared that time should be of the essence of the contract, or unless it could be shown that the purchaser had been guilty of unnecessary and wanton delay, equity would stop the action at law, decreeing specific performance of the contract between the parties. But if this Bill passed, and the vendor brought his action, a Court of common law must first decide, according to its own rule, that time was, and afterwards must decide that time was not, of the essence of the contract. It would decree a specific performance without having the slightest means of carrying it into effect, and it would inevitably break down in the attempt. The Legislature had already confided to the Courts of law, every equitable power which they were competent to administer; but with this they were not satisfied. The Common Law Commissioners, in their Second Report, asked for all the jurisdiction which it was proposed to confer by this Bill; but the Legislature hitherto had only given them that which they could fairly exercise. Parliament would now have to decide whether it would give them a jurisdiction which it had denied them before, and whether it would interfere with a jurisdiction which worked so admirably as that of the Courts of equity. In equity there was now no delay; there were six courts, and seven Judges constantly sitting to decide the cases which came before them; and would Parliament be doing well to take away the jurisdiction of these excellent Judges and give it to the common law Judges, who already complained that they had not time to perform their present duties? He was strongly induced to take their Lordships' opinion on the principle of the measure; but, as it was unusual to do so on a Motion for referring the Bill to a Select Committee, he should on this occasion refrain from pressing for a division.

Lord St. Leonards

LORD BROUGHAM concurred with his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) in thinking that, there being a division of opinion between the common law and equity Judges, the proper way was to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. The design of the Bill was to extend still further the equitable jurisdiction which the common law Courts now possessed. It was said by many that this measure would operate to the restriction of common law and the extension of equity jurisdiction; and the objection of his noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) was, that the principle giving the common law Courts an equity jurisdiction was a bad one. Now, in his opinion (and he had been a sincere friend to what was termed law amendment for many long years), there could not be a greater mistake than to suppose that a general fusion, as it was called, of law and equity was possible in this country; and any attempt to effect such general fusion would only be productive of mischief. But what the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack said, was, that in many instances a certain equitable jurisdiction had been given to the Courts of common law, particularly of late years, and that this jurisdiction might be advantageously extended. Now, the principle of the present Bill, as he understood it, declared that where there was a legal right, and where that right was sought to be obtained in a Court of common law, it was better that Court should be empowered to deal with the whole subject matter; and if in the course of the inquiry any equitable objection should arise on one side or on the other, the parties should not be put to the expense, delay, and vexation consequent on being sent to a Court of equity, but that the common law Court should have the power of dealing with the equitable matter. His noble and learned Friend (Lord St. Leonards) who opposed the Bill stated three objections to the decision to which the common law Judges had come on the subject—namely, that the common law Courts were overworked, that they had not the proper machinery, and that they were not competent for the purpose. From his noble and learned Friend he appealed to those Judges themselves, who declared that in point of time and labour they had no objection to the proposition now made; that they had abundance of time, and were not overworked, but were capable of taking this small fraction of addition to their labours. He could not help referring those who entertained objections to the proposed change in the proceedings of the Courts to that Report of the common law Commissioners in which the history of amendments in the law was traced with great accuracy, and where it was shown how matters, deemed at one time wild and dangerous innovations, had gradually, by the improvement of men's knowledge on the subject, become the law of the land. As a remarkable proof of this, they mentioned the changes effected in the law of evidence, by his (Lord Brougham's) Act of 1851, which had been found to work admirably, and to contribute greatly to the efficient administration of justice.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, he hoped that the Bill would be very much altered before it was passed into law. There ought, in fact, to be two Bills, and, notwithstanding the authority of the common law Judges, his objection to many parts of the first portion of the measure was not in the slightest degree lessened. He was bound to say, at the same time, that the opinion of their Lordships upon the principle of the Bill ought to have been tested when the Motion was made for the second reading. That stage had been allowed to pass without opposition, and, inasmuch as there had been a rather sharp encounter between the equity and common law Judges, it was impossible for their Lordships to make up their minds on the subject without carefully considering the statements and opinions on both sides. Of course, that could not be done in the House itself. It would be infinitely better to refer the matter to a Select Committee, and when the Bill came out of the Committee their Lordships would be able to decide whether it should be passed into law or not.

LORD KINGSDOWN said, that having carefully read the Memorial transmitted to the noble and learned Lord on the woolsack by the Common Law Commissioners, he must say that their observations had not removed, or even in the slightest degree affected, the strong objections which he entertained to the present Bill. The Bill had two objects entirely distinct, which should properly form the subject of two different measures, but which, unfortunately, had been united in one. One portion of the Bill gave what he believed was in principle an entirely new jurisdiction to the Courts of common law. The other was confined to amending the proceedings in matters which properly came under the jurisdiction of those Courts. To the latter, if brought forward in a Bill by itself, there could be no objection; but the case was very different with respect to the former. If the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, the objections entertained by many noble Lords to its first portion, consisting of no fewer than thirty clauses, would continue to exist in precisely the same force. The only difference would be that those clauses, if the Committee should not approve them, would be expunged; or, if the Committee should approve them, they would be the subject of a hostile Motion on the third reading of the Bill. To the latter portion of the measure there could be no objection whatever, except in so far as Amendments might be thought desirable in the details. He could not help looking with considerable apprehension to the course about to be taken. If the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, it must, of necessity, occupy some time in its consideration there. It must occupy some further time in its discussion in the House after it came out of the Committee; and, supposing their Lordships should ultimately give it a third reading, at what period of the Session was it likely to go down to the other House? What might be its fate there he would not, of course, presume to say; but at present, at all events, the omens were not auspicious. The consequence would be that we should lose, for this Session at least, the whole of the Bill, the portion which was desirable as well as that to which the strongest objections were entertained.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, that there had not been a single observation made to show that any one of the powers proposed by the present Bill might not be safely conferred upon the Courts of

MR. LIDDELL said, he could assure the Committee that he had no desire to see boys overworked; but the Motion of the hon. Member would, in fact, regulate the hours of labour for the men working in mines. The hours might occasionally be rather long, but the labour was very light; it consisted chiefly in driving ponies from the place where the men worked to the bottom of the shaft; so that if the limitation proposed by the hon. Member was agreed to, it would be a direct interference with all the labour in the mine.

MR. AYRTON said, that when they were told that it was impossible to limit the hours of labour which a boy should work in a mine, he should like to hear some grounds stated in support of that assertion. He had heard none, and no hon. Gentleman connected with the mining interest had ventured to stand up in his place and to state to the House any ground which could lead any intelligent person to the conviction that it was impossible to limit the hours of labour of a child between ten and twelve years of age to ten hours a day. To say it was impracticable meant nothing more nor less than that it might affect the profits of coalowners, with whom this was a mere question of money. Was Parliament to say that those children should be kept underground and deprived of that opportunity of improving their health and mental condition which should be accorded to all the children in this country? He understood it was the practice of men employed in mines not to work one day and to do overwork the next. He did not think that the children should be subjected to that overwork, simply because the men, for their own gratification, did not choose to attend to their work regularly. He thought the Legislature should interpose to put down the abominable system of overwork one day and drunkenness the next, and to substitute for it a more regular and methodical working of mines. The warnings and threats about the interference with masters and the stoppage of trade had been thrown out in similar terms when the Factories Bill was under discussion, but experience showed that the masters were none the worse, and trade had not decreased. He should certainly support the Amendment of his hon. Friend.

MR. TAYLOR said, he knew of no instance of boys having worked in mines longer than twelve hours in the day. He could assure the House that there was no disposition on the part of coalowners to inflict hardship on those under them; but, on the contrary, everything was done to promote their education and welfare. He trusted the Committee would not accede to this Amendment.

MR. PEASE said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), in advocating his case, had carefully overlooked all precedent and fact, and had merely propounded his own theories. He had forgotten to remind the House that eleven of the inspectors had reported that the limitation was impracticable. It was the interest of the coalowners to take care of the boys, and such a limitation as was proposed would only have the effect of imposing a tax on the constituents of the hon. Member.

MR. CLIVE said, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets and his friends seemed to have an idea that all mankind, besides themselves, were in combination to persecute the boys that worked in collieries. If he (Mr. Clive) entertained the same opinion, he should use every effort to secure the passing of the Amendment. Practically, however, the condition of those lads was not so bad as had been supposed, while the opinion of the inspectors of collieries was against limitation. The House had already taken a large amount of labour from the mine-owners by declaring that children under twelve should not be employed in mines. Formerly the ages of children employed in mines ranged from ten to fifteen. In consequence of recent legislation they were now from twelve to fifteen. So that Parliament had deprived the mine-owners of two-fifths of the childrens' labour, of which they formerly had the advantage. If it were hereafter found that the number of hours was excessive, the House could interfere; but it would be rather hard on the mine-owners to add a limitation of the hours of labour so soon after the limitation of age.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the coalowners and those who represented them altogether shirked the real question, which was, what was the proper number of hours for a child to be compelled to labour underground. Hon. Members of the House of Commons did not want paid officials to tell them what number of hours children of tender age might be worked. Any man who had a child could feel that a poor boy of twelve years old ought not to be worked more than ten hours a day. He therefore hoped the House of Commons would not listen to the arguments of in-erected parties against the dictates of humanity.

Sir George Lewis

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he should support the Amendment on the ground that the labour in mines was very severe for young children, and he knew that many mothers had a great objection to the long hours which their children were now compelled to work. He believed that many accidents took place in mines in consequence of the boys being overworked.

MR. CAYLEY said, he had been always in favour of limiting the hours of labour, though he had not quite made up his mind in the present instance. At the same time, he might mention a fact within his own knowledge which might have some weight. He knew a man who had been working in a mine all his life. He was now thirty-eight years of age, and in the first colliery at which he worked there were forty boys. Every one of those boys was now dead. In the next mine at which he went to work there were thirty-seven boys employed. Those boys were all dead but three. Those facts showed that some legislative restriction was required.

MR. H. A. BRUCE contended that much exaggeration had been used in stating the case of the colliery boys, and that the exceptional cases that had been at various times brought forward were of extremely rare occurrence. Indeed, if the illustration of the hon. Member were true, there could not be a collier of forty years of age alive. As to the unhealthiness of the employment, the boys were only employed in the open air ways, and they were not stunted in growth, morally and physically, like the factory children, on whose behalf Parliamentary interference had been very properly invoked.

MR. KINNAIRD asserted that there were instances in which boys were worked in mines fourteen and fifteen hours at a time.

MR. KENDALL said, he also would deny that the miners and boys employed in the mines of Cornwall were overworked, or that the occupation was of the unhealthy nature described.

MR. WEMYSS supported the Amendment, as the hours of labour for children in mines depended upon the men employed, and that he greatly objected to.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY denied that the children were overworked, or that their employment was of an unhealthy character.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 79; Majority 18.

LORD LOVAINE said, he would then move the insertion of the words, "before the 1st of July, 1861," with the object of prolonging the time for six months during which children of ten years might be employed without a certificate that they could read and write.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had no objection to the Amendment which merely amounted to the prolonging the notice to owners of mines and collieries.

The words were accordingly inserted.

MR. PAGET said, he rose to move as an Amendment, to leave out lines 11 to 19 inclusive, and insert,—

"In the second and every subsequent week during which such boy is employed in such mine or colliery the owner shall obtain a certificate, under the hand of a competent schoolmaster, that such boy has attended school for not less than five hours in each of two days (not being consecutive days, and on which he shall not have worked in a mine or colliery) during the week immediately preceding, between the hours of eight o'clock in the morning and five in the evening, exclusive of any attendance on Sundays."

He hoped the Committee would not be led away by the objections of hon. Gentlemen who had not visited the mines and examined the subject; but who would, nevertheless, assert that the plan which he proposed could not be carried out. There would be no more difficulty in carrying it out in the case of boys employed in mines than there was in carrying it out in that of boys employed in agricultural labour; and he could say, from experience in the latter case, that it was quite practicable. Parliament had already decided that factory children should have a certain number of hours for education. There was still more occasion for Parliamentary interference with respect to the education of children employed in mines. It was necessary, for the physical requirements of the children, that they should be brought into the light some other days besides Sundays. Notwithstanding what had been said by some hon. Gentlemen about the good health enjoyed by miners, there could be no doubt of the fact that their occupation was not one of the most healthy, for while the average of life in England was thirty-three years, the average life of miners was only twenty-seven. It might be thought that his proposition would allow too many hours above ground on each of the days on which the child was to receive schooling; but he believed it was a well-ascertained fact, that, after coming up from a mine, children required some sleep before they were fit to receive mental instruction. Some little inconvenience might at first arise; but he trusted the Committee and coalowners would not on that account hesitate to adopt a system that would be beneficial to the children.

MR. EVANS seconded the Amendment.

MR. CLIVE objected that the effect of the Amendment would be to lessen the number of boys by one-third, and if there were an unlimited amount of colliery labour, it might be done; but that was not so. It was necessary, moreover, that miners should learn their occupation at an early age.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he thought it inconsistent to expend large sums of money in the promotion of education, and at the same time to admit that they could not require boys of twelve years of age, engaged in mines, to be able to read and write. He would, however, suggest that the time at school should be altered to "five hours on one day," instead of on two days, exclusive of Sundays, and that, he thought, would meet the objection raised by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State.

LORD LOVAINE said, that the Amendment would suspend the labour of the boys for certain periods, and at the same time would suspend the labour of adults. He did not believe that the labourers in the colliery districts were inferior in education to the labourers in other parts of the country. He thought they might very well be content with the restrictions in the Bill, and therefore he should oppose the Amendment.

MR. JACKSON said, the coalowners found their profit in paying attention to the education and sanitary condition of the children, and might safely be trusted to do what was necessary themselves. The true interest of the master was to be on good terms with the operatives, and unless employer and employed went hand in hand together, no success could be achieved.

MR. NEWDEGATE argued, that to exclude children from employment because they were ignorant would be, in effect, to exclude them from education altogether. The Amendment, therefore, would operate more hardly upon those who were the poorest of the mining population than upon others, as the poorest were generally the most ignorant.

MR. AYRTON said, that, according to the provisions in the Bill, twenty hours in the month were to be devoted to education; but that provision might be observed by devoting five hours on each Sunday to the purpose. The law might even be complied with by devoting ten hours on Sunday and ten hours on drunken Monday to educational purposes; but that would not be attended with useful results. He considered that the time should be so arranged that it should be distributed fairly over the month, and not confined to a few days. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would make an Amendment in the Bill to meet that objection.

Mr. Paget

MR. BRADY said, he trusted that the Secretary of State would accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Member for North Staffordshire (Mr. Adderley).

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would make this offer, which would, perhaps, meet the views of the hon. Gentleman—namely, to omit the words from line 14 to 19 inclusive, and to add these words—

"In the second and every subsequent week during which such boy is employed in such mine or colliery the owner shall obtain a certificate—under the hand of a competent schoolmaster—that such boy has attended school for not less than five hours in one day during the week immediately preceding, exclusive of any attendance on Sundays."

In that way the attendance of the boy for five hours on one day of the week at school would be ensured, and an assurance would be thus given that the time allotted for educational purposes would be distributed evenly over the month.

MR. PAGET said, he would accept that proposition, and withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MONSELL said, he objected to depriving children of employment if they could not satisfy an educational test for which they might not have had any opportunity of preparing themselves by previous instruction. Such a proposal was utterly subversive of every principle which had ever been acted upon, and would be injurious to the most destitute part of the community. In order to raise the question, he proposed to divide the Committee on omission of the words "the owner shall obtain a certificate under the hand of a competent schoolmaster," as that would raise the whole question.

MR. ROEBUCK remarked that the Factory Act was a precedent for an educational test.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the Factory Act did not insist upon an educational test as an indispensable qualification for obtaining employment. He maintained that the effect of such a system as that proposed would be most-injurious to the coal-owners, would diminish their supply of labour, and would in the end affect injuriously the persons to be employed. He was as warm an advocate of education as any one, and education was recognized by all intelligent mine-owners as an object as necessary for the outlay of capital as any of the mechanical appliances of the mine; but he thought education might be obtained in a manner less injurious to the owner. Nor was that humanity real which would turn boys out of the coal trade without a certainty that they could obtain employment elsewhere. He suggested that the amount of instruction should be five hours per week, and that it should not be in any one day, but spread over the whole week. He suggested that the clause should specify five hours per week, without the restriction to one day.

MR. HENLEY said, that the provision in the clause went much beyond that in the Factory Act; all that was provided by the Factory Act was that children should receive education, but there was not a word about a qualification. The principle that children should not earn their bread if they could not read and write, even though they might not have had the means of education, was a principle which certainly had never been adopted before. He very much doubted its wisdom. It must be remembered that to a man earning 10s. or 12s. a week, with four or five children, the wages of a lad between ten and twelve was 25 per cent of his whole wages. Again, in the case of a widow, the wages of a son of that age might make the difference between a home and being thrown on the parish.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick (Mr. Monsell), would perhaps be met by an alternative providing that, failing to produce the certificate of education, the child should receive education concurrently with his employment in the mine.

MR. W. J. FOX said, the system now proposed had been found to work well in other branches of labour—factories of cotton and silk—and he did not see why it should not be applied to children employed in mines. He thought the labour of children should be kept down to its minimum, and that their education should be raised to its maximum.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must remind the Committee that there was no Question before it. They were now arrived at the word "obtain."

MR. MONSELL said, he would then propose to omit the words "obtain a certificate."

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 12, to leave out the words "obtain a certificate."

MR. CLIVE said, that to adopt the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Limerick would be to undo what they had already done to provide education for these children.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he objected to any restriction being placed on the children of the poor in order that they might be educated, especially as Parliament had not instituted a free system of national education. If the clause should be agreed to, great hardship would be inflicted on the mining population.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the suggestion of the Home Secretary a fair compromise, and hoped the Committee would adopt it.

MR. LIDDELL said, however inconsistent it might appear, he should, on consideration, support the clause.

MR. VIVIAN said, the clause would press hardly upon outcast children, and prevent their turning to a course of industry, by which they might obtain means and educate themselves. It was tyrannical to enact that such children should not earn an honest living, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would divide the Committee.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 131; Noes 69: Majority 62.

MR. H. A. BRUCE suggested that the five hours should not be limited to one day in the week, but should be distributed over the week, according to the convenience of the parties.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he moved the insertion of the Amendment, which he offered in lieu of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Nottingham.

MR. JACKSON suggested that the amount of instruction should be ten hours in a fortnight.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Bill as it stood required twenty hours in a month. He proposed to substitute five hours in a week, and he did not see the advantage of the medium of ten hours in a fortnight.

Amendment proposed,

"In line 14, to leave out from the word 'secondly' to the word 'preceding,' in line 19, in order to insert the words 'In the second and every subsequent week during which such boy is employed in such mine or colliery, the owner shall obtain a certificate under the hand of a competent schoolmaster that such boy has attended school for not less than five hours in one day during the week immediately preceding, exclusive of any attendance on Sundays'"

—instead thereof.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause,"

Put, and negatived.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, as the clause then stood, it appeared that the hours of education were to be five hours in one day in each week. He should move that the words "in one day" be omitted from the proposed Amendment.

Question proposed,

"That the words 'In the second and every subsequent week during which such boy is employed in such mine or colliery, the owner shall obtain a certificate under the hand of a competent schoolmaster that such boy has attended school for not less than five hours in one day during the week immediately preceding, exclusive of any attendance on Sundays,' be there inserted."

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "in one day."

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 106; Noes 84; Majority 22.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Clause 4, (5 & 6 Vict., c. 99, s. 8).

MR. RIDLEY said, he would move to leave out the word "eighteen" in order to insert the words "sixteen." As the clause now stood it would provide that no lad under the age of eighteen should have charge of the engine; but a boy who had received an education and been employed in a mine might be quite competent to take charge of it at sixteen.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the age of eighteen had been determined upon by a majority of the Government inspectors of mines as the lowest age at which a boy should be left in charge of machinery.

MR. LIDDELL said, that lads were more docile at sixteen than when they were older.

Sir George Lewis

MR. AYRTON said, he did not think it too much to require that the person on whose care greatly depended the lives of all the men employed in the mine should be at least eighteen years of age.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CLIVE suggested that the insertion of the word "sole" before the word "charge" would render unnecessary the alteration in the limit of age.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 8, before the word "charge," to insert the word "sole."

MR. CLAY said, he objected to the Amendment, as it would have the effect of compelling owners of mines to employ two boys of sixteen years of age instead of employing one, which he infinitely preferred. After some discussion across the table,

Question put, "That the word 'sole' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 132; Noes 31; Majority 101.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

On Motion "That the House at rising adjourn till Monday next,"

PROCEEDINGS OF THE HOUSE OF LORDS.—QUESTION.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there would be any objection to the Minutes of Proceedings of the House of Lords being laid daily upon the Table of this House. As he wished to obtain the opportunity of making a few observations, he would, to put himself in order, move that the House at its rising adjourn to Monday next. The production of Minutes of the House of Lords would not only contribute to the more satisfactory despatch of business, but would prevent a repetition of the absurd farce which took place about a month ago, when the noble Lord moved the appointment of a Committee for the purpose of searching the Journals of the House of Lords to see what had been done in reference to the paper duty, when every man, woman, and child in the kingdom knew four days before what had taken place. It was formerly quite right that search should be made in the Journals of the Lords at a time when mystery surrounded the proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament. It was then a breach of privilege to publish the debates, whereas now the press was officially recognized in that House, and reported the proceedings with an accuracy, expedition, and a fidelity which were the envy and admiration of surrounding nations. Strangers now were admitted to the galleries, and were no longer removed during divisions. Formerly hon. Members did not leave the House, but divided to right and left of the chair, and were counted by two Gentlemen, and it was a breach of privilege to publish anything in relation to the division. But now the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons were published to the world, and the House of Lords had a copy of those proceedings on their table, and openly referred to them, and discussed them in their debates. The House of Commons, however, if they wished to obtain an official knowledge of anything that had taken place in the other House, were obliged to appoint a Committee to search their Journals, though it was true the Minutes of the Lords' proceedings were in the library, where they were of no use whatever. He thought it would tend materially to the despatch of public business if these were officially laid on the table of the House, and if hon. Members possessed the power of referring to them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: My hon. Friend will recollect that there are two sources from which documents are received in which any action by this House can take place. One of these is from the Crown when papers are presented by command or are officially laid on the table; the other source is when they are furnished in obedience to the order of this House for the production of certain documents. Now the Journals in which the proceedings of the House of Lords are entered are not in the possession of the Crown, which has no more cognizance of them than we have, and therefore cannot order any responsible Minister to lay these papers on the table of this House. I apprehend it would be contrary to all the reciprocal usages and mutual privileges of the two Houses for either to order the other to furnish its proceedings. Therefore in neither of these modes, which I imagine are the only channels by which official records reach us, can the proceedings of the House of Lords be laid on our table. But my hon. Friend is probably aware that by reciprocal courtesy the Minutes of each House are communicated to the other. About sixteen copies of the Proceedings of the House of Lords are daily transmitted to this House—one copy for the library and the others for distribution to different officers of the House, and it will be perfectly easy if it should be thought more convenient to have one copy laid upon the table, instead of in the library. It is quite true, as my hon. Friend says, that the House of Lords have founded Resolutions of their own on the records of this House, which were laid upon their table, and we might undoubtedly pursue the same course. But, generally speaking, I apprehend—and you, Mr. Speaker, will correct me if I am wrong—it is not the habit of the House of Commons to found proceedings except on documents that are officially in our possession. My hon. Friend says the proceedings of the House of Lords are well known to everybody, from being reported in the newspapers, and that no doubt can exist as to what has taken place. But that remark applies much more extensively than to the proceedings of the House of Lords. There are various matters of which all of us have personal cognizance, events of public notoriety, which are recorded in the newspapers; but with regard to these before any formal Act of this House can be taken we require to have some written document officially and responsibly put on the table, either in answer to an Address from the Crown or by the order of the House, directed to those persons who are bound to obey our directions. I therefore very much doubt—even if an arrangement could be made by which one copy of the proceedings of the House of Lords would be laid on our Table, either instead of or in addition to that already in the library—whether the House would be disposed to make it a foundation for any serious measure. I think it would be a departure from our ordinary course, and I confess I do not quite perceive the value of the difference which it would produce in the expedition of our proceedings. My hon. Friend says we ought to dispense with the formal appointment of a Committee to search the Journals of the Lords. But that course is a very easy one; there is no difficulty in the way; it is a question merely of a short period of time, and I do not see that we should gain anything in point of expedition by substituting for the authentic report of the Committee a copy of the Journals of the House of Lords. On the contrary, I think the step would lose some portion of its weight; for, although everybody would know that the printed paper was an accurate transcript of the Minutes of Proceedings in the other House, yet, as a foundation for legislative action, I think it would be more satisfactory to have the extract taken from the Journals themselves. Having stated what the practice is, I apprehend, Mr. Speaker, there will be no difficulty, under your directions, in having a copy of the Minutes of the House of Lords placed on the table of this House, for the information of hon. Members, in addition to that which may be consulted in the library. I think the House, probably, will be disposed to leave the matter in your hands, and will feel that you will make such an arrangement as may be satisfactory to all.

TRANSFER OF LAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY, referring to the proclamation or police notice, whichever it might be, which had been recently issued by the Government in Ireland, said he had been asked how to evade an unjust law as to which a similar proclamation was recently issued in Ireland, declaring it illegal to enter into a lottery for certain charitable purposes, and he had mentioned the name of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office (Lord John Russell) as an authority that the best way to avoid an unjust law was to break it, inasmuch as he had heard the noble Lord state that he had formerly subscribed towards the prosecution of a revolutionary movement in a foreign state—Greece—a proceeding which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department, after what fell from him in that House, must regard as a breach of the law. When he was lately applied to in Ireland for advice in a similar instance, he said he never advised a breach of the law; but as the noble Lord had stated that he had broken the law without being prosecuted, perhaps they would follow his example. He told the parties, however, to be sure not to quote him as their adviser. He had a question on the paper which he wished to put to the Attorney General for Ireland. Before putting it, however, he would say, with reference to the question of the hon. Member for Finsbury, that he could see no possible objection to the proceedings of the House of Lords being laid on the table daily. He wished, in the next place, to know how the Rag Committee on Paper Duties were getting on. They did not seem alive at all. They were very mute; they had now been appointed four or five weeks, and they had heard nothing of their proceedings. ["Question."] His question related to the transfer of land in Ireland. That was, perhaps, the most important matter that had been or could be discussed this Session. ["Question, question!"] While he made jokes for the amusement of the House hon. Members gave him a very attentive hearing, but the moment he began to talk rational common sense he was met with cries of "Question." He would not trouble the House further. ["Go on, go on!"] He was in the hands of the House. ["Question."] He would, then, defer discussion until the Attorney General brought forward his Bill. The notice with reference to that Bill had been on the paper twenty times at least. He did not say this in any unfriendly spirit to the Attorney General. He knew the difficulties he had to contend with, having regard to the business of the Government. ["Question."] He would not ask any question, but with an apology to the Attorney General for having given him the trouble to attend, he would now yield to these unseemly interruptions, and resume his seat.

Viscount Palmerston

ANNEXATION OF NICE AND SAVOY TO FRANCE.—MINISTERIAL POLICY.

QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Before the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary replies, I shall be very glad to have the opportunity of putting a question to him; and, before doing so, I beg to thank the noble Lord for his kind consideration in being present, so as to be able to return an answer; and I hope it is an earnest that for the future the noble Lord will endeavour to be present in this House to defend the policy which the Government are following with respect to foreign affairs. I said last night, and I now take the opportunity of reiterating in presence of the noble Lord, that in my belief there is a general opinion throughout the country that the noble Lord is endeavouring to shirk the responsibility vested in him by the office the duties of which he has undertaken to discharge. It may not be the case, but such is my impression. We so seldom receive any information from the noble Lord with respect to foreign affairs that when any is obtained the feeling of the House generally, I think, is rather one of commiseration for the noble Lord at being any longer unable to conceal the intelligence than of gratification at the tidings which he has been obliged to con-

my. We have had some experience of the manner in which the noble Lord conducts his policy, and I am sorry to say that I conceive it to be far from satisfactory. For many months the noble Lord has had charge of the Department of Foreign Affairs, and I am bound to declare in my place in Parliament that I believe that policy to be both weak and vacillating. I recollect the noble Lord was sometimes very indignant with other Ministers when they did not pursue a straightforward policy. I remember perfectly well, when the noble Lord sat on these Benches, with what indignation, and how, with the mien of an exasperated patriot, he fulminated against my noble Friend the Prime Minister for what he called his mean and humiliating policy. I do not know whether the noble Lord recollects the expressions which he then made use of against the Prime Minister, but, if he does not, I will recall them to his memory. The House will recollect that in 1858 the noble Viscount now at the head of the Government introduced into this House a measure known as the Conspiracy Bill, which a large number of hon. Members, of whom I was one, from the first resisted most strenuously. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs was then sitting on the back benches, and, in a spirit of strong indignation—he was then, no doubt, anxious to replace his noble Friend—denounced the measure. The noble Lord, on the occasion to which I am alluding (the 9th of February, 1858), said—for the noble Lord at that time was very violent against the Prime Minister, although matters have since been made up between them—that the Government yielded to a demand from France; that it was not a strong Government; that it was about to introduce a Bill which he should feel it a shame and a degradation to support. “Let those who will support it,” said the noble Lord, “in that humiliation I, for one, will not share.” Loud cheers followed that announcement, and, of course, the noble Lord obtained credit throughout the country for being a very spirited and exasperated patriot. I must, however, say that I am afraid the noble Lord's present policy is very shameful and humiliating to the nation. The despatch which, if what I read in the newspapers be correct, has just reached the noble Lord from M. Thouvenel I look upon as an insult to us and our councils in the eyes of the nations of Europe, and as tending to the prestige and character of England. M. Thouvenel appeals to the good faith of the policy of France, and says that, although the Court of France asks Europe to sanction the act of annexation which has just received its final consummation, yet that the Court of the Tuilleries will not consent to any lessening of the Savoyard territory in favour of Switzerland. Now, I regard this, after the repeated declarations which have been made on the subject by the French Emperor, as a most serious and dangerous position of affairs. Upon three separate occasions—the 10th of February, the 1st of March, and then on the 6th of the same month—distinct assurances were given on the part of France that the Powers of Europe would be consulted before the contemplated annexation was carried into effect. Now, the expressions used were very singular, and if any faith is to be placed in the statements of public men, some importance ought to be attached to the report which on the 10th of February last was made by Earl Cowley to the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, when he wrote as follows:—

“I saw the Emperor yesterday, and had some conversation with him on the subject of the annexation of Savoy. The Emperor entirely disclaimed all intention of proceeding to make the annexation without consulting the great Powers. I asked His Majesty if I might repeat this assurance to your Lordship, and permission to do so was most graciously and cordially given.”

Now, that word “cordially” seems to me to possess a charming piquancy, because the Emperor of the French must have known perfectly well that when he gave the assurance in question he did not mean to act upon it. There is also another despatch, No. 17 in the books, in which Earl Cowley says that M. Thouvenel had again assured him that the Emperor intended to abide by the statement which I have just mentioned. On the 6th of March the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs wrote to Earl Cowley in the following terms:—

“I wish your Lordship to ascertain from M. Thouvenel in what manner the promise of the Emperor that the great Powers of Europe shall be consulted is to be carried into effect.”

Now, I wish the House to bear in mind that from the date of that despatch—the 6th of March—to the 21st of June, no answer whatever to that question, with respect to which the noble Lord expressed a wish an explanation should be obtained by Earl Cowley, has been returned. That is, I contend, a very lax way of conducting the foreign affairs of the country, particularly in reference to a question affecting in so important a degree a State whose neutrality England as well as the six other great Powers of Europe had guaranteed. I will not at the present moment enter into a full consideration of this question, because I believe we shall at a future time be furnished with an opportunity of having with respect to it ample discussion. I cannot, however, allow this day to pass without entering, in the name, I will not say of Switzerland, but of every man who is desirous of seeing the principles of honour observed in the conduct of public affairs, my protest against the policy which the Emperor of the French has in this matter pursued. We must recollect that the neutrality of Switzerland is absolutely at an end from the present moment. The Cantons de Vaud and the Genevois can no longer deliberate in safety. Not only was the neutrality of Switzerland guaranteed by the great Powers, but it was distinctly laid down no troops whatever should enter into the neutralized province of Savoy, whereas, under present circumstances, not only are the troops at Chambéry, but the Pont de Beauvoisin, St. Jean de Maurienne, Albeville, and Moutier will forthwith receive detachments. On the other hand, troops are going to Annecy, which is situated in the neutralized provinces. The garrison of Annecy will furnish detachments to Thonon and Evian, on the Lake of Geneva, in the Chablais, at Bonneville in Faucigny, and at St. Julien, the principal military station in the Genevois; so that you will have troops in that very district in which their maintenance is strictly opposed to treaty engagements and inconsistent with the due protection of Switzerland. There are troops on the very limits of the Lake of Geneva in direct opposition to the distinct understanding of treaties, and the distinct and reiterated protests of the Republic of Switzerland.

I would ask the House, in dealing with this question, not to lose sight of the important fact that the King of Sardinia, when the Treaty of Turin was framed,—base and iniquitous as it was on his part,—to sacrifice what I may call the berceau of his family, distinctly stated that, although he assented to the cession of Savoy to France, yet Sardinia reserved to Switzerland her co-operation in the steps to be taken on the subject of the neutralized provinces. Now, without entering more at length into the question, I maintain that Switzerland has not been consulted in this matter, and that if the Government of this country have been consulted, they have given an opinion with respect to it without the consent of the House of Commons. I believe I am in a position to state positively, and upon high and important authority, that in the month of February an offer was made to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to the effect that France was prepared to cede those portions of territory adjoining the Lake of Geneva, in the hope that by means of that proposal arrangements might be quietly made for the cession of the rest. Now, the cession of Nice and Lower Savoy to France is a matter which perhaps does not materially affect us. One Power may cede to another, there being a mutual understanding on the subject, a portion of her territory without an infringement of the laws of nations, but when such a course is taken with respect to a territory whose neutrality has been guaranteed by Seven Powers of Europe in a most sacred and solemn manner, as is the case with Faucigny, Chablais, and Genevois—I say it is degrading to the councils of this country, and an insult to the character of England, to allow such a policy to be carried out without entering against it a serious and determined protest in the name of the English people. I hope the noble Lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, will be able to stand up in his place to-night and to state that he has received no communication such as that to which I have alluded; but, in order to refresh his memory on the matter, I would refer him to a despatch written by Earl Cowley on the 9th of February, in which he distinctly tells the noble Lord that the Emperor of the French is prepared to cede the territory in question, in the hope that the annexation of Savoy and Nice might be amicably arranged. The noble Lord will find that passage in a long despatch of Earl Cowley, of the date I have mentioned. I regret that I have felt it to be my duty to trouble the House with these observations; but, as hon. Members are probably aware, I have been recently in the locality of which I am speaking; and I can assure those who have not, that we in this country can scarcely realize the feeling of the inhabitants of those provinces when they see an enemy at their gates, and their rights and liberties being wrested from their grasp. These people are brave, and love freedom. They are anxious to enjoy the popular institutions which they have; but they know perfectly well, from the teachings and experience of history, that the progress of France on that side of Geneva is fatal to their aspirations, and that if she once obtains possession of the Lake of Geneva—I do not say the independence and integrity of the Confederation will be greatly endangered, but its very existence will be absolutely and permanently annihilated. It was only last night that I saw at a meeting in the City of London the whole colony of Swiss over here, I myself, perhaps, being the only Englishman who was present on the occasion; and I can assure the House I could not help responding from my heart to the sentiments which animated those men, when they saw the standard of Switzerland floating over the chair of the president, and heard from the lips of their Minister that the greatest danger threatened their country. I addressed to them a few simple words, but I could not, I repeat, help feeling from my soul the greatest sympathy with those men—Savoyards and Swiss—whose rights are now, to my mind, permanently menaced by the cruel hypocrisy of France.

Sir Robert Peel

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In answer to the question of the hon. Baronet, and to his statement that I was not here last night to answer questions, I believe I am generally in the House almost every day at a quarter past four o'clock. Perhaps the hon. Baronet himself is not here quite so frequently or so punctually as I am. Every one at all acquainted with the Foreign Office must know that at times questions arise of considerable urgency, which take up time at the very moment one is preparing to do some other business. It so happened yesterday, just as I was about to leave the Foreign Office to come down to this House, I was consulted by the Under Secretary of State on a question of great importance respecting papers to be laid before Parliament, and I remained discussing the matter with him till past the hour when questions are generally answered. The only question that was on the Notice Paper was that of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Mr John Acton) who has just spoken with respect to the Correspondence of 1856-7. That was not a very urgent matter, and I desired a notice to be sent to the hon. Baronet that he might have the papers if he would move an Address to the Crown, in the form of Motion for which I also sent him. The hon. Baronet does not seem to have correctly understood that message; but he may move any day for the papers. It has taken some time to collect them, being parts of a correspondence with a former Secretary of State; but they are now in order, and the hon. Baronet can have them whenever he likes to move for them. With regard to the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth, I can only say, if he has any question to ask which he thinks urgent with reference to Foreign Affairs, his correct course is to do as other Members do, and to give notice of his intention to put such a question. The hon. Member might have had the courtesy to send me a note to say that he was going to ask his question, and then I should certainly have endeavoured to attend in my place to answer it.

Well, omitting all matters relating to the Conspiracy Bill, which has hardly any bearing on any subject now before us, it appears that the hon. Baronet has seen a report in the newspapers that a note has been transmitted to us from M. Thouvenel, containing, among other things, a very strong hint that France would not submit to any diminution of the territory of which she is now in possession, namely Savoy and Nice. Sir, I could not have answered the hon. Baronet on that point yesterday, because I had then no knowledge of any note from M. Thouvenel; but at half-past three o'clock to-day I saw the French Ambassador, and he placed in my hands a copy of a French note; and as to any such intimation as that stated in the newspapers, namely, that France would not consent to any diminution of that territory, there is not a word of that kind in the whole despatch. The purport of the despatch is to this effect:—It is stated in the Treaty of Turin that France will come to an understanding with the other Powers of Europe with respect to the neutralized portions of Savoy; and, according to the view of the French Government, that understanding is to be arrived at by endeavouring to reconcile the Second Article of the Treaty of Turin with the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna. The French note then proceeds to say that this may be done in one of these three modes:—Either the Powers who signed the Treaty of Vienna may meet in conference with the French Foreign Minister, or identical notes may be exchanged, the French note stating that France is ready to take upon herself the whole of the obligations by which Sardinia has been bound during the time she held Savoy. And here I may mention, in answer to the question put to me by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. B. Cochrane), that the despatch says that France is ready to make this neutral territory part of the neutral territory of Switzerland in the same manner as Sardinia did. The third mode would be by leaving it to France and Switzerland to effect such a substitution for the former engagements as France and Switzerland might mutually agree upon. The note then goes on to say that if there should be a conference, most of the Powers have already said they think that Paris would be a convenient place in which to hold it, and that it should meet on the points I have mentioned. Such, Sir, is the substance of the note we have received only to-day; and of course Her Majesty's Government have not yet answered it. It remains for them to answer it in such terms as they may think it requires.

But it appears to me the whole question rests upon this,—that the Great Powers of Europe were willing to agree on a guarantee at this portion of Savoy being left neutral and to its being held like the other parts of the country by Sardinia. Sardinia was a State with whom the Allied Powers were ready to agree upon such terms, and they might, at all events, be quite sure, when they had engaged with Sardinia upon those terms, that Switzerland was safe and that these obligations would be binding upon Sardinia. But the case is very much changed when a great Power like France comes into possession of the territory that was held by Sardinia. And it is not the same thing—although it is so represented by France, and although, indeed the words are the same, the technical engagements exactly the same—for France to say, “We will undertake to fulfil the obligations of Sardinia, and to place this neutralized territory in the same position as it stood in before.” That is the answer which we have urged more than once to this proposal. Really, the hon. Baronet, who speaks frequently and with great ability on these subjects, should endeavour to be more accurate; because, be it observed, the engagement of the Treaty is not that there should be no troops at any time in the neutralized provinces. On the contrary, the specific engagement is that the Sardinian troops, in the case of war with the neighbouring Powers, shall evacuate this neutralized territory, thereby implying very clearly that during peace the Sardinian troops are at liberty to occupy it. This, therefore, is the position of the question. We have an opinion—and it is a very decided opinion—as to the mode in which, supposing France to have obtained, as she has done already, the cession of Savoy, a substitute should be provided which would, as I believe, be an efficient substitute, and one that would be satisfactory to Switzerland, for the engagements which have hitherto subsisted. But I am sorry to say that at no time, in any of our discussions, has France shown any disposition to adopt that substitute which seems to us to be the only one which would be an equivalent, in point of efficiency, to the security which the Treaty of 1815 created. It would be impossible for us, therefore, to state that we shall be satisfied with or shall accept the Treaty of Turin as affording an equivalent security to Switzerland for that which she has previously enjoyed. I do not know whether the hon. Baronet really means to say that we should not have given any opinion on the subject without obtaining the sanction of this House. [“No, no,” from Sir Robert Peel.] That is certainly not the usual way of carrying on such correspondence. The Cabinet must obtain the consent of the Crown to such despatches and communications as they may feel it their duty to prepare, and on afterwards presenting the papers to this House their authors must submit to any opinion which the House may think fit to pass upon them. In this case the papers are rather voluminous; but I hope very soon to place at least a portion of them, bringing the correspondence down to this time, upon the table. For France having now, according to her own view, accomplished the annexation, and French authorities and French troops having taken possession of Savoy and Nice, as far as that point is concerned we have at length reached the stage at which it is fitting to produce to this House the correspondence which has passed on the subject.

Lord John Russell

With respect to the offer to which the hon. Baronet alludes—namely, that the French Government would give up Chablais and Faucigny if we would consent to the cession of the rest of Savoy to France, I can only say that the French Government has never made any such offer to the British Government. I do not think it would have been becoming in us to accept it, if such an offer had been made to us. But what has taken place has been accurately represented by the hon. Baronet, that in the early part of February the Emperor of the French and his Ministers declared that they were ready to yield Chablais and Faucigny to Switzerland. But in a very short time afterwards the Emperor declared to a deputation who went to Paris that he should not consent to what he called the dismemberment of Savoy, and that Chablais and Faucigny could not be separated from the rest of the annexed provinces. Earl Cowley spoke to the French Minister for Foreign Affairs on the subject, and was told that the Emperor had been willing—if the population of these territories had consented to such an arrangement—to cede them to Switzerland; but that there had been such a strong disinclination, and repugnance even, evinced to being parted from the rest of Savoy, that the Emperor found himself obliged not to proceed with that cession. Earl Cowley likewise said he did not think that the engagement to come to an understanding with the Powers of Europe had been fulfilled. M. Thouvenel stated that he thought Earl Cowley was not very reasonable, that all the other Powers of Europe seemed to think the despatches which had been written by France were satisfactory on that point, and that the engagement had been amply fulfilled. I have now, Sir, answered the question of the hon. Baronet. The hon. Baronet, always presuming upon certain facts without ascertaining whether they are correct, goes on to make some comments. He says, that if the French Government have made a communication to us in the terms which he has seen in the newspapers, it is very insulting to the British Government, and ought to be protested against. But, as he is wrong in his facts, his inferences fall to the ground with them. The remaining question for the Government to consider, I must say, amounts to little more than this:—how we can best use our influence to maintain the neutrality of Switzerland, and whether there be any terms which Switzerland is likely to accept that can now be proposed. But if there be no such terms—if France offers nothing further than that she will undertake the same engagements towards Switzerland and towards Europe, which were undertaken by Sardinia, Her Majesty's Government can only say—and they will say so in the strongest and most formal manner—that they do not think the engagements of the 92nd Article of the Treaty of Vienna, and the 2nd Article of the Treaty of Turin, can in that way be reconciled.

THE ARMY IN THE UNITED KINGDOM. OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he rose, according to notice, to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the present state of the Army in the United Kingdom, and he thought he might do so very appropriately after the conversation that had just occurred, and especially so as they would very shortly be engaged in a discussion upon the question of fortifications. He did not intend to impute blame to any department of the State; but he thought it was right that the House and the country should be informed as to the exact number of troops at present quartered in the United Kingdom. In the course of the Session an erroneous statement, which he had taken upon himself to contradict at the time, had been made to the effect that we had only an army of 30,000 men, for which we paid £15,000,000 yearly, or at the rate of £500 for every soldier. According to a Return which had been furnished to the House during the last week, the numbers were as follows:—The regular army, including all arms, 102,080 men; embodied Militia, 15,911; disembodied Militia, 52,899; Yeomanry Cavalry, 15,002; enrolled Pensioners, 15,000; Volunteer Rifle and Artillery Corps, approximate number, 122,367; making a grand total of 323,259 men. We ought, however, only to consider as the army of the United Kingdom the 102,080 regular troops. The embodied Militia he looked upon as doomed to dispersion within a month or two, and they, the disembodied Militia, the Yeomanry Cavalry, the enrolled Pensioners, and the Volunteer Artillery and Rifle Corps could only be looked upon as a reserve whose assistance could be counted on in case of emergency. No man was more willing than he was to give credit to the Volunteers, of whom, indeed, the country ought to be proud; but he did not think that in calculating the strength of our military defences we ought to reckon 122,367 men as the available addition to the army in the shape of the Volunteer Corps. They had taken great pains and had advanced very rapidly in their training, but it was impossible that they should always drill so constantly as they had done during the last few months, without producing great inconvenience and causing a serious disturbance of business. Already he had heard complaints from tradesmen who were willing to pay any necessary amount for defence; but who were anxious that their business should not be interfered with by their being required to close their establishments, as they were now, in order that the young men in their employment might attend to their drill. Of course if war broke out every man would stand to his regiment, and in time the Volunteers would become as efficient as any other force, but at the present moment we ought not to consider them as part and parcel of the army of the country. That left us with 102,080 men who formed the standing army at present quartered in the United Kingdom. Of these 4,080 were officers, leaving of the really working rank and file only 98,000. From that number was to be deducted 6 per cent, or 6,000 men, who were sick, leaving 92,000. The dépôt battalions and dépôts of regiments at home, in the Colonies, and in India included 33,302 men. Considering that they had to supply recruits for 35,000 men in the Colonies and 66,000 men in India, it was but fair to assume that one-third of their number, or 11,000 men, might be looked upon as untrained and unfit for any purpose of war. That reduced the number to 81,000. The absentees from the army on account of desertion, on leave, or from other causes generally equalled in number the sick. Assuming that they amounted to only 5,000, that would leave a really effective force of 76,000 men. An army of 76,000 men might appear a very respectable force if we were actually in a time of peace, but would it be sufficient to meet the emergency for which, from the Estimates and the talk of fortifications, there seemed to be a lingering idea that we ought to be prepared? It became, therefore, necessary to inquire how these 76,000 were disposed of, and it should be recollected they included every branch of the service. He found that there were in garrisoned towns 7,574 Artillerymen, 1,000 Engineers (there being in all 2,089 Engineers), and 1,000 Cavalry. He did not consider the dépôt battalions useless; deducting their sick they would number 32,500, and they might be made to do garrison duty. It would be necessary to have 15,000 at least in Scotland and Ireland; there were at present in Ireland 20,000. Then there was the army hospital corps, 6,000 men; these could not be called fighting men. Deducting, therefore, all these latter numbers, amounting in the gross to 57,760 men, from the 76,000, left a manœuvring army of 18,240 only. Now, the Commission upon fortifications had reported that if the fortifications of which they recommended the erection were constructed 70,000 men would be required to man them. Of course, if those fortifications were not agreed to, we should require a still larger number for the defence of the country. These 70,000 men might, no doubt, include Volunteers, enrolled Pensioners, and Militia, but among these irregular troops they ought, in order to make them efficient, to have a certain number of regulars. 20,000 regular troops, backed by 100,000 Militia, would do much more than 200,000 Militia without regular troops to support them. Therefore, he thought that the House would agree with him that although we had an army which was superior to what was usually supposed, and which, in time of peace, would be sufficient for any purpose, yet, looking to the vast works which we were about to undertake, the state of affairs throughout the world, and the possibility of an outbreak upon the Continent, a large number of men was required to support the dignity and maintain the safety of the country. He thought that if they were to raise 20,000 additional men, which would give them a manœuvring army of 40,000 or 50,000 men, they would be in a condition to meet any sudden emergency that might arise, and that number of men could be raised without any very great increase of expenditure. Without adding to the number of regiments, but rather increasing the number of men in the regiments that now existed, 20,000 men might be raised at a cost of about £600,000 a year. They were about to spend a large sum of money on fortifications, but what would be the use of those fortifications if they had not men to defend them? If he had to choose between laying out money on improved arms and fortifications, or on men, he would say, "Give me the men without the arms and fortifications, rather than the arms and fortifications without the men." He would therefore urge the augmentation of the regular army by a force of 20,000 men. He saw by a return he held in his hand that the quota of the disembodied Militia was put down at 113,801, and that the whole number of effectives was 52,899. That corroborated a statement he had formerly made, that we could not depend on more than one-half of the disembodied Militia if they were suddenly required for active service. He also thought the Militia should be put on a different footing. They should be able to depend on 50,000 Militia, whom one-third should be embodied for three or six months at a time, each regiment in its turn. In this way every regiment would be embodied and thoroughly trained in due course, and they would be saved the expense of the useless training now given for a short time every year to a large body of men who never would be found when wanted. A retaining fee should be given to the men in their disembodied state, and they should be obliged periodically to present themselves at headquarters. With 15,000 embodied and 37,000 disembodied Militia, which could always be found, they would on any sudden emergency start with a certain force of at least 50,000 or 60,000 Militia, which could be increased, within a month or six weeks, to any extent that might be required, since that time was known to be long enough to drill the working man into a soldier sufficiently for manning fortifications. He made these suggestions for the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. Everybody must be impressed with the necessity of making our army system more efficient, when all that was taking place around them proved that there was a lurking suspicion in men's minds that the state of peace could not last, and that this country might be suddenly called on to interfere in contests abroad, or to defend our own shores. On this subject he could not do better than quote the language of Lord Overstone, in his reply to the inquiries put to him by the Royal Commission on National Defences. He said—

Colonel Dickson

"We have every inducement to make our system of national defence complete and effectual, because the calamities and misery which a successful invasion of England must produce would be far more serious than any of which the world has yet had experience. We have ample means for self-defence, in accumulated wealth and productive energies, sufficient to support all necessary expenditure, in mechanical skill and appliances, and in abundance of mineral products, which properly applied, must render us predominant in all the scientific machinery of modern warfare; in a people proud at heart of their country, attached to its free institutions, and whose courage and self-devotion have never been found to fail in the hour of trial. Negligence alone can bring about the calamity under discussion. Unless we suffer ourselves to be surprised, we cannot be invaded with success. It is useless to discuss what will occur, or what can be done, after London has fallen into the hands of an invading foe. The apathy, be it of the Government or of the people, which renders the occurrence of such a catastrophe possible, will not afterwards enable the country, enfeebled, dispirited, and disorganized by the loss of its capital, to redeem the fatal error. In short, we have a stake at issue in the property, the happiness, and the free institutions to be protected, in the plunder, the misery, and the degradation to be averted, which may well call forth all our energies. We have means of defence of every kind; national wealth, engineering skill, personal courage, amply sufficient to secure our safety. We have warning more than enough to awake our vigilance. If we prove too apathetic to take the necessary precautions, to make the requisite efforts, or too shortsighted and selfish to submit to the necessary sacrifice, we must bow to the fate which the whole world will declare that we have deserved."

In calling the attention of the Secretary for War to this subject, he wished to point out the condition of the Militia Artillery in our garrison towns. They were so many nights on guard that they had little time to attend to their drill, and did not therefore attain that efficiency which it was desirable they should have. Besides, the duty in which they were engaged had a deteriorating effect upon the constitutions of the men. There were more men in hospital in garrison towns than in other towns, chiefly in consequence of the night duties they had to perform, and, therefore, even as a matter of economy, this was a matter that called for the consideration of the Secretary for War. There was a feeling in some minds that a large standing army was inimical to our liberties. The time might have been when, with monarchs fond of despotic sway, a large standing army might be made to control the liberties of the people; but, as matters were now constituted—with a Sovereign who reigned not by her power only, but through the love and affection of her people—who so truly knew and understood her position—considering the constitution under which we lived, and the constitution of the army itself, he asked if it was possible that danger could accrue to the liberties of this country from increasing the number of the standing army? His sole object in directing their attention to this subject was that the House might be induced to make our army sufficiently strong to enable us to maintain our honour and influence abroad, and to preserve at home the inviolability of our shores.

HIGH SHERIFFS FOR CITIES AND BOROUGHS (IRELAND)—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BLAKE said, he wished to call the attention of the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the fact that, since the appointment of High Sheriffs for Cities and Boroughs in Ireland became vested in Government in 1842, the Roman Catholics of the city of

Waterford have been excluded from that office, and to ask whether he is prepared to take the necessary steps for remedying a grievance which has hitherto been remonstrated against without success? As this appointment rested with the Government, it was their duty to inform themselves of the most competent persons to discharge the office, and to see that they were appointed. The high sheriffs were chosen from a list furnished to the Judges by the outgoing sheriff, but he had reason to believe that the high sheriffs for the city of Waterford never did return the name of a Catholic for that office a native of the city, except in one instance; and it must appear to the House a monstrous injustice that in a town where Catholics numbered four-fifths to one-fifth of Protestants, Catholics should have been systematically excluded. The right hon. Gentleman might, perhaps, say that he knew of three cases in which Roman Catholics had been appointed to that office; but that did not take from the statement which he had made, that no Roman Catholic of the city of Waterford had been appointed, because those gentlemen did not belong to the city. He might refer to his own case. He had been mayor of Waterford three years in succession, he had been president of the Chamber of Commerce, and he had been twice returned a Member of Parliament, and yet he had never been selected for the office of high sheriff. And this was the case with regard to the Roman Catholic gentry generally. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland would direct the attention of the Judges of assize to this matter. He had spoken to the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald) on the subject, but there had been no change; and he now appealed to the right hon. Gentleman, who had always shown himself so ready to do justice in Irish matters. He would also direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the manner in which the law was openly evaded in Ireland with regard to the appointment of sub-sheriffs. The law provided that no person should hold the office two years in succession, under a penalty of £100. The law, however, was constantly evaded in this way. As soon as the sub-sheriff was appointed a second year in succession a nephew, or clerk, immediately went to the Government and gave information, and the fine of £100 was paid, but immediately handed back to the sub-sheriff. It was a singular fact that, since the reign of James II., no Roman Catholic but one, who belonged to the city, had filled the office of high sheriff of Waterford. Since 1842 twenty high sheriffs had been appointed in Waterford, of whom seventeen were Protestants and only three Roman Catholics, and these not gentlemen of the city. He, therefore, begged to suggest to the Chief Secretary that whenever lists were returned by the outgoing sheriff of persons to fill the office, that care should be taken to see whether the names of Catholic citizens of Waterford appeared, and, if not, to inquire whether there were any such eligible for the office.

Mr. Blake

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT:—In reference to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Officer (Colonel Dickson) I have no reason to complain either of the tone of his speech or the spirit in which it was made. It did at first alarm me when I saw the notice, as the object was not very clearly stated, but I thought the intention of the gallant Officer must be just what it has proved to be. In the first place, he says that he has seen it asserted that we have but 30,000 soldiers in England, and that that is the result of the large Estimate of 15 millions that have been moved in this House. Now I do not hesitate to say that never was there a calculation more absurdly unfair than that. I do not know that it is at all proper to make a rule of three sum of the number of men voted and the amount of money granted by this House, because obviously the two things have no close connection. You may have in one year a larger number of men than another, at the same time with smaller Estimates, because the Estimates depend upon the state of your stores, your equipments, and even your navy; but even assuming that mode of comparison to be a fair one, and supposing that we set against the private soldier the cost of the whole establishment, even including the non-effective branch, I find that in 1835-6, when the Army Estimates were lowest, the cost of the soldier was then £81, while now, notwithstanding the many improvements that have been made in barracks, in clothing, and various other ways, and with an increase of pay in all ranks, the cost is only increased to £94. Still, I do not think that practically that point is of any real importance. The gallant officer spoke of the Volunteers, and does not think that movement can go on.

COLONEL DICKSON: I said that they could not be expected to continue so attentive to their drill as they have been, for it would interfere with the ordinary business of life.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Well, I concur with the gallant Officer. It is singular how the conduct of the Volunteers has disappointed the prophecies that were made about them. It was said that they would never attain any great proficiency, as they would never submit to the drudgery of drill, but I think they have proved their willingness to submit to drill, and to do everything in their power which is calculated to render them effective soldiers. They have fully shown that they are not mere holiday soldiers, but under great disadvantages they have applied themselves steadily to the duties which they have taken upon themselves. One of the disadvantages with which they have had to contend may seem trivial, but it was calculated greatly to influence the attendance at drill—I mean the weather. Now, the Volunteers have hardly got home with a dry skin the whole of the last spring, but still they have not been discouraged, but have mustered well at drill. I quite agree, however, with those who think that we ought not to take the Volunteers into too great account in estimating the force of the country. The first thing is to reckon the regular forces. The Militia when embodied, with the efficient colonels which they now have, become almost as good as the Line; but they ought, I think, to be in a disembodied state, acting as a reserve. The gallant Officer says, and I know it is a favourite theory of his, that the Militia ought to be kept disembodied, with the exception of a certain proportion; that they ought to be trained for three months together once every three years, and that that would be better than a month's training every year. But I doubt whether that month's training is, as he says, useless, especially as the gallant Officer also says, that in six weeks you may make a soldier fit for garrison duty. Of course, if you can get a man who has been drilled for three months, he will make a much better soldier than a man who has received only a month's training. But would the gallant Officer sooner have a man who had been drilled three months three years ago, or one who had been drilled a month a year ago?

COLONEL DICKSON: I suggested that they should be drilled for three or six months, and one-third at a time.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: But then comes the question,—are they disembodied Militia, and is it not likely that by such a mode of drill you will not take so much from the labour of the country as to excite dissatisfaction among employers? This is a point of no little importance. The object should be to interfere as little as possible with the labour market; but if you take men from their work for a long period you do interfere with the labour-market seriously, and are likely to draw down much opposition on the part of employers.

With regard to the number of troops, the gallant officer has stated them very accurately. At this moment the number of regular troops in this country is as near as possible 80,000 men. Of course, you must make deductions for sick and absent, though the absent at a time of emergency would be almost nil. The number I have given, too, includes all ranks. It is as well in these calculations to reckon the non-commissioned officers, but if we deduct the officers the total number will be reduced by 3,000 or 4,000. The House must remember that this is not a fixed number, but that, in the natural course of things, it is a growing number. Last year there were 64,500 regular troops in this country; this year we have got 80,000 making an increase of about 17,000 men. I am speaking now of purely British regiments, and am not including the dépôts of Indian regiments. The number, I repeat, has increased from 64,500 to 80,000, and we have seven battalions of infantry on the seas and now coming home—one from the Mauritius and six from India, with one regiment of cavalry. Next year, I hope, will see a further accession from India, and it must be borne in mind that at this moment we have diverted from their proper position no fewer than 10,000 Queen's troops, who are now in the China seas. Then, again, I mentioned at the commencement of the Session, when I moved the Estimates, that I looked upon this as an exceptional year, when it was necessary to make enormous efforts for the purpose of adding to our stores, providing a large supply of rifled muskets, and otherwise improving our matériel. We are thus spending our money rather upon matériel than upon men; but when once we have got this matériel our expenditure on this head will of course be diminished, and upon the same outlay we may, if we choose, maintain a larger force at home. I am much obliged to the gallant Officer for the manner in which he has discussed this subject, pointing out, as he has done, the absurd exaggerations which have been spread abroad respecting it. The expenditure, I admit, has been large; but I have shown why it has been large. At this moment, with the number of troops now in England, we are short of barrack-room. If the men had allotted to them the space which is properly their due, we should be short of accommodation for 25,000 men. We are adding to this accommodation as cheaply as possible, and I hope next year that we shall be able to show a decided improvement, both in the number and the condition of the force at home.

MR. CARDWELL, in reply to the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake), said, the facts had been very accurately stated in the main by the hon. Gentleman. What had happened was—the Judges of Assize uniformly prepared for the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant a list of three persons, and, although they were doubtless assisted by the sheriff and the under sheriff in the preparation of the list, most distinguished Judges, including some of the Roman Catholic Church, had stated that they could not be governed by any such representations; but that, having themselves knowledge of the position and standing of gentlemen in the neighbourhood, they would not think it right to exclude any one from the panel merely because he was not placed upon it by the sheriff. Thus there was security that the panel would be impartially constituted, and no man passed over because of his religious opinions. The Lord Lieutenant almost invariably selected the first name in this panel, and in the list of sheriffs appointed during the years to which the hon. Gentleman had referred, that course had been pursued in every case, except where the gentleman thus selected himself desired to be excused. The Judges therefore, had, in point of fact, selected year by year the gentleman who had served the office of sheriff for the city of Waterford, and they would continue to make such a selection as they thought reasonable. It was true that the Lord Lieutenant was really invested with the power and the responsibility; but the system now pursued was a wholesome one, from which it would be unwise to depart. It was better that these appointments should be made by the Judges acquainted with the locality than by persons of political leanings, whose selection, if it did not lead to real abuses, would yet fail to command public confidence.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

Motion agreed to; House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

SAVINGS BANKS AND FRIENDLY SOCIETIES INVESTMENTS BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,—
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to ask whether it was competent to him to move, as an Amendment in Committee, that the Savings Banks Fund should be entrusted to five persons without first moving it as an “instruction” to the Committee. If so he should withdraw the Motion for the instruction of which he had given notice.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was no doubt competent for the hon. Member to move the Amendment of which he had given notice in Committee, and if it should appear that it went beyond the present title of the Bill it was possible to amend the title in conformity with the alteration.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that he believed that this was about the fifteenth time that the Motion had been put down for going into Committee on the Bill, and he was afraid that even then many hon. Gentlemen interested in the matter were engaged elsewhere. He thought it right, however, to call the attention of the House to the principles of the measure; and he was the more induced to do so, because he was aware that a Select Committee was two years previously appointed by that House to inquire into the whole matter of the savings banks, and the names of the gentlemen who sat on that Committee showed that it was a very able one. They sat twenty-one days and examined witnesses, and collected a most important body of evidence, and made a very important Report; but from that day to the present not the slightest notice had been taken of any of their suggestions; and certainly the Bill before the House, which had been introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and which related to only one branch of the question, was in direct opposition to the suggestions of the Committee. That was one of the main reasons which induced him to trespass on the indulgence of the House, with a view of persuading them that it would be wise and proper to follow the suggestions of that Committee. He could name several important Select Committees which had made most elaborate Reports, and yet their suggestions had been entirely passed over, and it was worthy the consideration of the House whether such recommendations should be so set aside. With regard to that Bill, the suggestions of the Committee were very clear, and were summed up in two important recommendations. One was that there should be a bond fide Commission of five Gentlemen, namely, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the governor or deputy governor of the Bank of England, and three gentlemen to be appointed by the Crown, one of whom should be paid. The second recommendation was that the whole of the savings banks money should be treated as a trust, for the purposes of the savings banks and of the savings banks only, and that the money should not be used for state purposes; but above all that the Finance Minister should not have power to use any of the funds for the purpose of operating in the bill and stock markets of the kingdom, unless authorized to do so for a special purpose by an Act of Parliament. On the 20th November last, the amount of money invested in the savings banks was £41,180,000, and the account of the assets, taking the stock and bills at the market price, showed that there was only £37,700,000, so that there must be a deficiency of £3,500,000, if they were called on at once to pay every depositor his money.

He wished to call attention to the view which the trustees and managers of savings banks throughout the kingdom took of this Bill. A short time ago a similar Bill was brought in by the right hon. Gentleman, on the same principle as the present, but varied rather in its proportions. There were 250 petitions presented against it: nearly every leading bank in the kingdom petitioned against it. The same course had been followed on the present occasion. Nearly 100 petitions were now on the table of the House, and he believed all, without exception, pressed very much upon the attention of the House the absolute necessity of placing the funds in a bond fide Commission, and treating them as trust funds. They did not want to take a farthing from the State in any way; for if their funds were treated as trust funds they believed that not only the present rate of interest but all the expenses of the Commission could be paid; and they believed also that there might even be a better rate of interest. Down to 1828 a higher rate of interest than at present was paid; and in 1828 there was no deficiency, but a surplus. In 1828 the interest was lowered from £4 11s. to £3 15s., and the interest had now fallen to £3 5s., while the amount paid to the depositors did not average more than £2 18s. per cent. He could not concur in the dictum which he believed he had heard the Chancellor of the Exchequer express, that the trustees, managers and depositors had no interest in the way in which their money was treated when it passed from the banks. It was perfectly true that the trustees and managers and depositors had an undoubted statutable right to be repaid every shilling that had been paid into the savings banks and handed to the Government; but he could not concur that therefore they had no interest in the way in which their money was treated, because, at all events, they were very much interested in the rate of interest not being lowered, and there was very considerable fear, which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would dispel, that there was some intention of reducing the rate of interest.

The existing law pointed out distinctly what was to be done with the money belonging to savings banks. That money was to be sent up to the Banks of England and Ireland, where it was to be placed in the names of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, who were directed to make regulations as to the investment and employment of the monies for the benefit of the Savings Banks' depositors. But there was not a single word in the Act about the use of the money for any other purpose. The parties who were really interested in the settlement of the question were the taxpayers of England; for although the depositors might suffer, in the first instance, by any hocus-pocus in fiscal transactions, the taxpayers would ultimately be required to make good any deficit that might arise in regard to this money. The importance of the present measure could not be overestimated; for this was the first time the House had been invited to legislate with regard to the investment of the money of savings banks. Under it a power greater than he already possessed was placed in the hands of the Finance Minister, who, as an ex-officio Commissioner, was entrusted with the power of selling and purchasing stock to the extent of several millions. It was competent to the House to confer this power on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but it ought to be done directly, ex nomine. At present the Financial Commission consisted of men of great ability and commanding position; but their important duties elsewhere prevented them from giving attention, or even in some cases attendance, as would be evident from the fact that the most distinguished Members of the Commission were the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Accountant General of Chancery, and the Master of the Rolls. Nothing could be more unwise than to repose powers of such great extent in an ex-officio Commission, as it necessarily followed that it must be exercised by somebody else. Sydney Smith used to say pleasantly that "Boards were often made use of only to make screens;" and, in the present instance, the Select Committee which inquired into the subject, had distinctly expressed their opinion as to the impolicy of imposing such responsible duties on an ex-officio Commission. It was ascertained that for many years the funds of the savings banks had been mainly, if not entirely, vested in the purchase of stock on the order of the Accountant General, an honourable and high-minded public man, Sir Alexander Spearman. The power of selling the stock was exercised on a written order by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and it was no disrepute, either to the Accountant General, or to the Finance Minister, to say that this was a power which was not recognized by the Act of Parliament, and ought only to be admitted with the utmost caution. It rested on the evidence of Lord Monteagle and Sir A. Spearman, that the money had been used on many occasions for what was called "State purposes"—namely, in the purchase of Exchequer bills, to keep these at a fair price in the market. Were they prepared to give to the Finance Minister the power of dealing in stock, without the knowledge of the House, to the extent of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000? Would anybody contend that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who knew precisely what was the state of the Treasury, and who was acquainted beforehand with the measures to be brought forward, ought to be allowed to operate secretly and silently in the market, thereby affecting the property of every individual who had made investments? Above all things, he thought that they ought not to place such a power in the hands of an ex-officio Commission. They ought rather to adopt the recommendation of the Select Committee, and place the control of the funds in a bond fide Commission, to be named by the Crown, and to be composed of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Governor of the Bank of England, and three other gentlemen. It was a curious fact that, for many years the silent operations of the money of the savings banks on marketable stocks, were not known. The country owed the knowledge of the fact to the late Mr. Goulburn, who, acknowledging the danger of the system, placed upon the table of the House a voluminous document containing the whole history of those transactions, from which his information was derived—transactions extending from the period of 1828 to 1844, and amounting, he thought, to about 6,000 in number. The Legislature had authorized the Government in some instances, particularly in the days of Lord Auckland, to use the savings banks' monies. Looking at the whole of those accounts, however, from 1828 to 1844, there were only three years in which the balance was against the savings banks, and then only for small amounts; but, on a close analysis of the accounts, after making allowance for all demands on draughts, and treating the subject, as he hoped the House would now be disposed to do, as that of a trust-fund, it would be found that nearly £2,000,000 ought to be added to the account. It was a bad system that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by the use of vast sums of money not in the stock market, should be able to carry on operations which would be otherwise impossible. For some years it was denied that the funds of the savings banks were made use of for the purpose of increasing the funded debt, and the observations which he from time to time had addressed to that House had not received all the credit to which they were entitled. But it had now been established conclusively, according to the evidence of Lord Monteagle, that there had been periods in which the bond fide debt of the country was increased through the medium of the Consolidated Fund; that no less than £3,000,000 of the unfunded debt were converted to funded debt between 1828 and 1860. Did the House mean, then, to make the savings banks' money a means of increasing the public debt? If not, it ought to place the powers necessary for the control of the funds of the savings banks in the hands of responsible people, and guard their exercise with vigilance.

Sir Henry Willoughby

With respect to the Bill introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he hoped that the House would be told the precise object of it in the course of the discussion. It was a grave operation proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. At the present moment the savings banks possessed about £36,000,000 or £37,000,000 stock, Three per cents Reduced, and £25,000,000 Exchequer Bills. He gave great credit to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for grappling with the difficulty arising from a deficiency in the funds to satisfy the claims of the savings banks. It was proposed to place the sum of £31,000,000 to the credit of an account to be called the "State Deposit Account, No. 1," with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. This, he presumed, created a sort of book-debt to that extent, and he should like to know whether it was to be divisible and saleable, or in what manner it was to be treated. The 3 per cent interest, which the sum was to bear, was not the rate of interest at present prevailing, and he did not see why property should thus be arbitrarily dealt with. He should therefore certainly object to that portion of the Bill. It was a great question, too, whether the Legislature should lay hold of this property of the savings banks, cancel the existing securities, and by a sort of conjuring process create fresh securities. No doubt, the faith of the country would be pledged to repay the money of the savings banks, but he considered that the trustees and managers of savings banks and the depositors in them had already a right to their money by statute, provided they acted according to law. Therefore he did not see that their position was improved in that respect. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would explain what would be the operation of clause 4, for it appeared to give for the first time by statute a power to deal with stocks and securities to an extraordinary extent. In addition to the £10,000,000 remaining of the savings banks' money there would be the current balances, which would raise the amount to about £12,000,000. Now, he wished to know the various securities in which that sum of money would be placed. Those securities would be absolutely under the control of the Finance Minister of the day. It was specially provided by the Bill that such Minister might buy and sell stock or other securities, so that it would give him now, for the first time, by statute that absolute power, as the avowed and avowed organ of this Select Commission. The right hon. Gentleman, as well as the legal adviser of the Commission, appeared to have lost sight of the 25th Clause of the 3 and 4 William IV., c. 14. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman to produce the statute by which the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt could buy and sell stock and bills, and purchase other stock and bills. The 9th George IV., for the purpose of savings banks, gave distinct powers for the handling of stock for the use of savings banks. But there was not the shadow of right to use what he might call the jobbing power. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would explain to the House how the matter really stood. The fourteen Gentlemen who sat upon the Committee in 1858 had not a shadow of doubt that those funds should be treated as trust funds, and should be only invested in the best mode so as to secure the money for the savings banks' funds. There was no reason why those institutions should cost one shilling to the United Kingdom. He should impress upon the House the anxious desire of the trustees and managers of savings banks that the laws relating to these institutions should be consolidated in one Act. Through mismanagement, between the years 1820 and 1844 the savings banks' fund had been diminished to the extent of £1,820,000. In conclusion, he might state that what he wished for was a bond fide Commission; and he felt certain that if that were granted the trustees and managers and the depositors would be perfectly satisfied with the interest which their funds obtained; and that at the same time the public would have the advantage of these glorious institutions without being put to one farthing of loss. He thanked the House for the attention with which it had listened to the statement he had felt called upon to make.

Mr. HANKEY rose to state the reasons which induced him to believe that the Bill before them did not provide the proper mode of dealing with the subject of savings banks. The Bill unsettled a great deal and settled nothing. It did not contain any provision for the satisfactory settlement of the question, and it introduced many very novel principles that deserved the serious consideration of the House before they consented to sanction them. It set out on the principle that there was some sort of apprehension on the part of depositors, and that it was necessary to provide a fund to secure at all times the repayment of deposits. That was a laudable object, but the depositors in savings banks were safe beyond dispute. They had no apprehension that they would not get their money when they chose to call for it, and on the part of the depositors generally there was no necessity for the Bill. To effect his purpose, it was proposed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should cancel a certain amount of stock, and create in its place a book debt. That was a novel mode of proceeding in their history, so far as any deposit of the kind was concerned. The proper way of treating the money was to place it out on proper security, taking care that too large an amount of interest was not paid, and that the money was always forthcoming. It was not necessary to invent the machinery proposed by the Bill to effect that object. The real thing the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to do, was to provide for the interest, and how did he do that? He provided for the payment of 3 per cent to the Government, while he gave the depositors $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That was not an intelligible way of satisfying their minds that they would at all times be secure; but he repeated there was no apprehension that they would not be paid. The only advantage that could be gained was in saving the expense of management, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have little difficulty in arranging that point in half an hour with the Governor of the Bank of England. Another objection was that the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not create a sufficient amount of book debt to pay the whole amount. A deficiency was left unprovided for, and if the Chancellor of the Exchequer wanted to create a fund out of which the savings banks' money was to be paid, he should create a fund for payment of the whole. The right hon. Gentleman merely created a book debt, equivalent to a certain amount, the remainder being left entirely at his disposal. He (Mr. Hankey) objected to the power given to the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to the remainder of the money. He understood the Chancellor of Exchequer expected to effect a large amount of saving by the Bill—as much as £40,000 or £50,000 a year. The percentage now paid to the Bank would be, of course, so much money saved; but what saving was to be effected upon the remainder of the capital? He was afraid that only a small portion of it could be more profitably invested than at present. As the Bill originally stood it reserved a power to the Chancellor of the Exchequer to fund a certain amount of Exchequer bills. That clause had, happily, been withdrawn, for it did nothing more or less than empower the Chancellor of the Exchequer to create an additional amount of national debt without the knowledge or sanction of Parliament. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had a certain portion of stock at his command, and could buy and sell Exchequer bills; but he did not think it desirable the right hon. Gentleman should be in the position of one who "rigged" the market, for when the Chancellor of the Exchequer—the price of Exchequer bills being depressed—went into the market and bought, a rise was created, but not on the sound principle of supply and demand. He might add that in the Bill before the House pains seemed to have been taken to ignore the Resolutions, twenty in number, of the Committee of 1858, and he (Mr. Hankey) did not think that that was a fair way to treat the results of their labours. He (Mr. Hankey) did not agree with all the recommendations of the Committee, but there were many valuable recommendations offered by them, and their resolutions were sound and deserving of the consideration of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They treated the funds of the depositors as a trust fund, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer thought it was a fund with which he could do what he pleased. If the change were to prove advantageous to the nation, so much the better, but who was to be the judge of that? The Chancellor of the Exchequer was entirely to decide upon it. It was a question about which the House knew nothing, and which was not brought under their notice. However, he would give the right hon. Gentleman credit for having attempted to grapple with the subject more effectively than any Chancellor of the Exchequer had done for many years past. Many savings banks Bills had been prepared, but he was not aware that any one of them had been seriously discussed while he had the honour of a seat in the House. He objected to the Bill because it ignored entirely the objects which the Committee had in view; it treated the matter in quite a different way to that in which trust property should be treated; it did not grapple with any of the difficulties which surrounded the question as far as details were concerned, and it instituted a perfectly novel principle for giving greater security to depositors, for it did not create a sufficient stock nor a sufficient charge upon the Consolidated Fund, to pay $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum, which was the rate the Government had undertaken to pay the depositors.

Mr. Hankey

Mr. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he might very well have left the question where it was after the able statements of the hon. Members who had preceded him, but as he had been Chairman of the Committee that sat to consider the subject in 1858 he felt bound to say that they brought to its consideration an amount of pains, trouble, and careful consideration which entitled their conclusions, at least to the consideration of the House, and as he had been prevented by illness from being present at the second reading of the Bill he hoped the House would allow him to say a few words with respect to the Report of that Committee. It was very true that the Bill dealt only with the subject of investments in savings banks, and for that reason he presumed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government thought they had not treated the Committee with discourtesy. He gave the right hon. Gentleman and the Government full credit for dealing with the subject in the present Session. When he saw that they were going to bring in a Bill upon the subject of savings banks he hoped they were approaching the settlement of a long-agitated question, on which the minds of people in the country had been more exercised than on almost any other question. Four or five different Bills with respect to it had been brought in by Chancellors of the Exchequer, but one after the other had been withdrawn; every one of those Bills threw some doubt on the security enjoyed by depositors, so that they acted, perhaps, rather to the prejudice than in support of the excellent institutions with which they dealt. He had hoped that the present measure would remedy that state of things, so much as the way for legislation had been smoothed by the labours of the Committee which sat two years ago; but when he saw the Bill he had experienced considerable disappointment. In the first place, he found that it dealt with only portions of a great subject which ought not in his opinion to be dealt with piecemeal. It referred only to investments, and he could under these circumstances be glad to know what chance other questions connected with savings banks more immediately and vitally affecting them had of being settled within any reasonable time? It might be said the Committee had taken notice of these interesting points. But they dealt with them in the only way that was open to them—they had suggested the appointment of three Commissioners, in addition to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor of the Bank, to be looked upon as the guardians and trustees of the different savings banks, and the 14th and 15th Resolutions of the Committee specially provided that the Commissioners should have the power to frame Resolutions as to the mode in which the accounts should be kept and audited. These questions were most interesting to local savings banks;—the question as to the best mode of establishing and enforcing an audit, of producing uniformity of accounts and determining how the usefulness of savings banks might be extended—how they could prevent defalcations such as those which had agitated the country from one end to another—how they should deal with the expenses of management—whether there should be a Government treasurer or leave the matter as at present—the question of the surplus of interest not paid—the question whether they should absolutely prohibit any bank being established other than a savings bank eo nomine under the provisions of the present law—the question of pass-books—the question as to the accounts and trusts of minors—the question of the liability of the Government, whether they should or should not transfer the deposit of any individual into the public funds when it had reached a certain point—and the most important question as to the liability of the trustees, Parliament having relieved them of all responsibility whatever—for this whole congeries of questions vitally affecting the management of local banks, and vitally affecting the character of the law and Parliament, no provision whatever was made in this Bill. The Committee of 1858 did make provision for them, and if Parliament passed them over unnoticed now he did not know that another opportunity would offer for dealing with them. He should therefore prefer that the whole subject should stand over until it could be fully dealt with. So much for points omitted in the Bill; now for a few words on what he thought objectionable in the Bill itself. He might have left this to what had been so well said by the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham, who had treated the subject with an ability that showed he might well aspire to the post of Financial Minister. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer denied that the property should be regarded in the light of a trust. His (Mr. Sotherton Estcourt's) impression was that between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and any individual savings bank, the transaction was a banking one; but as between the Government and the whole body of savings banks it was a trust. If the Government overlooked that distinction they would probably come to a defective conclusion. It was admitted on all hands that, as between the tax-payer and the Government the money was held as a trust. The main principle of the Bill went to the conversion of the security of savings banks now held in Consols into what was called a book debt, for which a fixed amount of interest was to be paid, and what was the consequence of such a conversion? At this moment there was an apparent deficiency between the sum the State was liable for, if every depositor were paid, and the amount of assets held by the Commissioners, as the result of the whole transactions since savings banks were established, of from £2,000,000 to £3,000,000. That was not an absolute sum, but depended on the price of the stocks. For the purpose of covering a deficit they were about to inscribe in their books a debt which must be paid in full to an extent much larger than he thought was absolutely required. Whenever a large demand was made upon them they would be obliged to sell at the price of the day, and according to that necessity they would either gain or lose. Further, the Bill would create a fixed and permanent interest to be paid by the Government on the debt, while the interest accruing from the investment of the deposits would be continually varying. The only saving would be in the sum paid for the management of the debt. Did the right hon. Gentleman hope to gain a sixpence more than that from any other source under his Bill? The right hon. Gentleman might say he was going to inscribe this debt in a large book, and to give an indefeasible title to it by a clause in this measure. But, on the part of the savings banks, it could be answered that they would rather keep the security they had than accept the right hon. Gentleman's clause. Nobody disputed the liability of the Government for the money it received from the savings banks, and therefore the effect of the arrangements under the Bill would be to diminish the security while retaining the old management. The mode recommended by the Committee was to adhere to the present security and alter the management, and of the two suggestions that of the right hon.

Mr. Sotherton Estcourt

Gentleman was the one least deserving of adoption. In money transactions where there was no dispute as to the security afforded up to the present moment it was impossible to make any change without giving the country the impression that those who made it had some other object in view than the one that was apparent. He must again advert to the way in which the right hon. Gentleman had spoken of the labours of the Committee. One could quite understand that the right hon. Gentleman should disapprove all their proceedings, and as Finance Minister should think it his duty to assert the right of the Government to control this matter; but it would have been well to treat with some consideration the Gentlemen who devoted so much of their time, and worked extremely hard at this subject. They came to their Resolution nearly, if not quite, unanimously, and from no party spirit; and their Report contained an amount of valuable materials which would be of the utmost assistance to those who came to deal with this question. He was very sorry the right hon. Gentleman had brought the question forward in this shape, as he must vote against his Bill, because, even if it were a good scheme as far as concerned investments, they ought not to legislate on the subject piecemeal. They should satisfy the public upon points on which it was entitled to satisfaction, and should deal with the question as a whole. If they allowed the present opportunity to slip they might not very soon have another. The action of these excellent institutions was now very much impeded, and their sphere of operation greatly circumscribed. There were not above 600 savings banks in the whole country, whereas they ought to ramify every parish, and even every village in the kingdom. If the House passed this measure they would throw away a golden opportunity of placing these institutions on a better and more expensive footing, as well as of setting our whole law relating to them on a satisfactory basis.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had hoped and expected that this question would have been solved by the Committee who sat to inquire into it some time ago; but in that hope he had been disappointed. Their recommendations had not been attended to, and for aught that appeared in the Bill the Committee might as well not have sat at all. Indeed, the labours of many Committees were thrown away in the same manner; those of the Committee

Harbours of Refuge for instance—and it seemed to him that the only way in which they could make the labours of Committees fructify, would be to require that the Chairman of every Committee should bring its Resolutions before the House in a substantive form. If that had been done with respect to the Committee which sat upon the subject of savings banks, the House would not have heard such expressions of dissent with respect to the Bill, and which he was afraid would be fatal to it. He hoped and trusted that something would be done in future to give a useful result to the labour of Committees. The great principle to be adopted in legislating with regard to savings banks was that the property of depositors in them should be considered to be a trust, and a trust alone, and should not be used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer to give a fictitious value to Government securities. When Exchequer Bills lost their value the Chancellor of the Exchequer sold out a great quantity of savings bank money, thereby at a loss, and went into the market to purchase those securities in order to give them a fictitious value, and deceive the mercantile world. This practice should be put a stop to.

MR. MALINS said, he had for many years given his attention to the subject, and in June, 1857, he called to the notice of the House the injury which was inflicted on public credit in consequence of the conduct of the Exchequer, what might be vaguely but with strict accuracy called, buying the market by means of the funds belonging to the savings banks. He entirely agreed with every word which had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Exeter in the course of his luminous speech. These funds ought to be regarded as a trust, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to be allowed to use them for the purpose of buying Exchequer bills at a discount, and thus giving them a fictitious appearance of value. The Court of Directors which he passed so much of his time in annually held respectable men liable for the money which they had employed in the purchase of shares in companies to which they belonged in order to raise their value in the market; and now that this was before them it was the imperative duty of the House to provide that that should not be done by the Government. If a Court of Justice would not permit it to be the part of an individual. It was also important that there should be a real body of trustees, men who would make it their duty to attend to their business, instead of such officers as the Master of the Rolls, the Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Speaker of that House, and the Accountant General of the Court of Chancery, not one of whom had an hour to devote to the business.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I sincerely wish, Sir, that it was in my power, consistently with the respect which is due to the House and to the hon. Members who have taken part in the debate, to release you from the position you have occupied for so many hours during the last twenty-four. Unfortunately, it would not be respectful or just with respect to the subject that I should not, at any rate, make some remarks, in which I will endeavour to bring to a head the principal points in regard to this Bill which have been referred to by the different speakers. First, I must thank all who have taken part in the debate for the spirit in which they have approached the subject. I cannot say that it has in every case been regarded from the true point of view; but nothing could be more kind and considerate than the remarks which have been made. I will begin with what fell from my right hon. Friend the Member for Wiltshire (Mr. S. Estcourt), because the complaint which formed the burden of his speech can, I think, be easily got rid of. The main objection of the right hon. Gentleman was that the measure did not contain a set of provisions to regulate the ordinary management of savings banks, and he enumerated a multitude of points with respect to that which he thinks ought to be settled by law. Now, I admit that it is most desirable that we should have a Bill for the management of savings banks; but it is a subject of great difficulty, and has no relation to the mode in which the moneys are to be invested and used. Does the right hon. Gentleman really mean to say it is a valid objection to a Bill for dealing with the investment of savings banks' moneys that it does not deal with the totally different subject of the management of these banks and the liability of trustees—a subject upon which half a dozen Finance Ministers have in vain endeavoured to legislate, and all this at so advanced a period of the Session as the 22nd of June, when so much business of importance yet remains to be disposed of? I feel confident that the House will not refuse to proceed with the Bill on such a ground as that.

I now come to a point on which much has been said. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Hankey) complained that I had ignored the labours of the Select Committee of 1858, which, he said, at least deserved consideration at my hands. But how does he know that I have not considered the Report of that Committee? Consideration does not necessarily involve adoption. A man may consider and adopt, or consider and decline. It was my unfortunate condition, after most carefully considering the recommendations of the Committee, that I was, in a great number of instances, compelled to decline them. My hon. Friend, however, is in error when he says that no trace of the recommendations of the Committee is to be found in the Bill now before us. There are two most important recommendations of the Committee embodied in the Bill. One is the limitation, or as I may rather call it, the abolition of the power of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt to add to the funded debt of the country without the authority of Parliament. The other is the power which is conferred by the Bill of varying securities, within certain limits, in order to increase the income that would be derivable from the proceeds of these moneys when invested. I must say a word, however, as to the proceedings of this Select Committee. The instruction which it received when appointed was to inquire into the Acts relating to savings banks and the operation thereof, and I, for one, at once concluded that the management of savings banks was to be the chief subject of inquiry. I cannot, therefore, express the astonishment with which I found, when the Report of the Committee was issued, that not a tenth part of the whole inquiry related to the question of management, and that the investigation mainly turned on the financial questions connected with the investment of moneys received from savings banks. Those questions were, perhaps, within the terms of the reference; but I had not the smallest conception that they would form the subject of their labours. How did that Committee proceed? There were then in the House five Gentlemen who, during the course of twenty years, had, as Chancellors of the Exchequer, been invested with the sole responsibility of the management of these moneys. With the exception of these five Gentlemen and the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby), there was scarcely a Member in the House at the time who had paid any attention to the proceedings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in this matter. Not one of these Gentlemen either sat as a Member of the Committee, or was examined as a witness. Under these circumstances, no one can be surprised that the investigation of the Committee proved imperfect and unsatisfactory.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT: Lord Monteagle was examined before the Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Lord Monteagle retired from the office of Chancellor of the Exchequer twenty-four years ago, and could not, therefore, be expected to give a sufficient account of all the operations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli); my right hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir Francis Baring); the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Sir Charles Wood); the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Radnor (Sir George Lewis); or myself, during the twenty years between 1839 and 1858. [A MEMBER: Sir Alexander Spearman was another witness.] Sir Alexander Spearman—yes. But who is he? A very able and excellent public servant, but not the responsible officer from whom the House should seek to know the grounds upon which the Finance Minister of this country has proceeded.

The main questions that have been raised for the consideration of the House are two: the first is the doctrine that the funds ought to be managed by what is termed an independent Commission, entirely different in composition from the present one; the other is the doctrine that the moneys ought to be dealt with in the same manner as private trust moneys. Before going into these two questions, I may state for the satisfaction of the hon. Member for Evesham, that no provision has been inserted in the Bill with the view of reducing the rate of interest allowed to depositors, and that no such intention is entertained. Indeed, I apprehend it is indubitable that the fund from which the interest is payable will be larger under the operation of this Bill than under the present law. But to return to the two questions. It is said that the Commissioners for the reduction of the national debt are not the proper persons to manage these funds, and that there ought to be an independent Commission. Now what is meant by an independent Commission? It is, of course, very agreeable to a gentleman in my position to contemplate the creation of additional patronage, and I have to thank my hon. Friend for proposing the creation of a new paid office. Of the new and independent Commission which is proposed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to be one member with the Governor of the Bank of England and three others, one of whom is to be paid. The real meaning of that arrangement is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to have one vote among five. Now, I do not at all dispute that if we were about to constitute a trust like that recommended by the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) it might be desirable to render it wholly independent of Parliament. On the other hand, however, if you hold that these moneys ought not to be regarded as trust moneys at all, but that the public is strictly a banker and nothing else, then it is obvious that it would be absurd to constitute an independent Commission to manage moneys which are, in fact, the moneys of the public, and which ought, therefore, to be kept under the close and immediate control of the House of Commons. If, as contended by the hon. Member for Evesham, this money is the money of the depositors, and ought to be managed by the public as trustees, you ought to look at the character of your trust, and separate it from the immediate control of Parliament. But the doctrine has always been that this money is not the money of the depositors, and on this principle it has always been held and managed. And the vital question now at issue is, are we to hold this money as trustees or as bankers? The obligation of a trustee is to act in the interest of those for whom he holds the trust, and when he has so acted to the best of his judgment, with integrity, and reasonable discretion, his liability terminates, and the persons for whom he is trustee are liable for any loss they may suffer.

MR. MALINS: If he acts within the limits of the trust.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I assume as much when I suppose that he acts with integrity and to the best of his discretion.

MR. MALINS: But he might invest in other funds than the trust allowed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: That would certainly not be acting to the best of his discretion.

MR. MALINS: I beg your pardon—it might be so in some cases.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have never heard it propounded before that a trustee who travels out of the limits of his trust may be held as acting with integrity and discretion. I repeat, a trustee must act with integrity, and use a reasonable discretion, and having done so, the persons interested in the trust are liable for any loss. But will the House legislate on that principle for the depositors of savings banks? If so, you must reconstitute the fund entirely, and begin de novo. The principle upon which all past legislation has been founded is that this money is not the property either of the depositors or of the trustees, but the property of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National debt. Instead of that you wished to make it the property—of whom? Either of the trustees of savings banks or of the depositors. I do not think you will declare it to be the property of the trustees as they themselves are irresponsible. But if you declare it to be the property of the depositors you must hand over to them the sum you have received. You must therefore find a sum of about £3,000,000, and place it in the hands of those gentlemen. You have certain liabilities towards the trustees of savings banks on behalf of the depositors. There are certain assets to meet those liabilities, and the assets are of less value by £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 than the amount of those liabilities. It will be a breach of faith which I feel confident this House will not entertain, if, when you have the fact established beyond doubt that the assets of the Commissioners are not equal to their liability, you hand the money over to a Commission as trustees without enabling them to discharge every shilling of liability. Such a course cannot be contemplated for a moment. But I contend that the proposition is unreasonable and undesirable in the interests of the depositors themselves. The property in question is subject to fluctuations of value. It would be a bad view to hold this out to the depositors in savings banks, “instead of a regular and fixed amount of interest you are to take the chance of the funds going up and down, and four or five gentlemen are to be appointed as Commissioners, who are to do the best they can for you.” These gentlemen must sell when the funds are low, and buy when they are high. The difference between the rate of interest paid and received and the necessity of selling out at a time when the funds are low have been the main cause of the loss on this money. Now would it be for the benefit of the depositors to place them under all the fluctuations that result from the system proposed by the hon. Member for Evesham? The fact is, this doctrine of a trust is a vast legal change in the tenure of a vast amount of property. At present property is vested in the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, and their absolute proprietary right is balanced by the obligation to pay back the trustees the whole sum invested, with interest at 3 per cent. The basis of the present law is, that the Commissioners are in the position of bankers. The savings banks' money is their property, but they hold it subject to the repayment of the principal and a fixed rate of interest. The proposal of the Committee would be the breaking up of that system, and I declined to enter upon a task that I knew would be hopeless, of attempting to persuade this House to undo all the policy and retrace all the steps it had taken for the last forty or fifty years, even if that change had not been accompanied with the necessity of handing over to the Commissioners a sum of £3,000,000 of the public money.

Something has been said of the constitution of the present Commission, which is, I apprehend, analogous to many other Boards and Commissions which Parliament has thought fit to establish. I was for many years prior to 1858 a Member of the Indian Board of Control; and so also was my noble Friend at the head of the Government, and I do not know whether down to the period of its abolition my noble Friend has ever—for myself at all events I can say that I have never—attended a single meeting or took any share in its proceedings. I have also been a member of the Board of Trade, over which my right hon. Friend so efficiently presides, but I have never troubled him in the discharge of his business. The practical working of such a system is that his responsibility is full, absolute, and undivided. It may be a question whether we should keep up the umbra of a Board, but the responsibility which thus falls upon the adviser of the Crown and the head of the Department is unquestionable. In like manner, the responsibility of the Minister is absolute in these savings bank transactions, for there can be no doubt the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he alone, is the person whom the House of Commons would call to account. I do not say that the machinery is perfect for securing the control of the House of Commons, but this I do say, that no effectual control can be obtained by tying the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. How will the House ensure his acting well? By ensuring an effectual review by the House of Commons of his transactions. I contemplated the formation, under the highest authority, of a Select Committee of this House who should sit from year to year and carry out an entire audit of the public money. This would, of course, include a regular revision of all the proceedings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the management of this money.

From the speeches delivered to-night it might be supposed that some dreadful Bill had been introduced enabling the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take into his hands a number of exorbitant powers which hon. Members were endeavouring to prevent. But there is not a power given to him by the Bill which he does not already possess, except one or two minor provisions that do not enter into the substance and purpose of the Bill. On the other hand, the surrender of powers that he does possess is very large. He has at present the power of funding deficiency Bills, Ways and Means, and other Bills, which is done away with by this measure. A large portion of the Stocks under the control of the Chancellor of the Exchequer are placed beyond his control by this Bill. Above all, while I propose to limit his powers, I also propose to provide by the appointment of this Committee that the whole of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proceedings shall be under the review of this House. We are all agreed in this, that the main question we have to settle is in what capacity these moneys are to be managed—are they to be managed by us as trustees for private persons or as bankers? It is clearly impossible we can manage them as trustees. The time for that is past. If a trust was to be constituted, it should have been constituted when the savings banks were first taken in hand; but Parliament adopted a totally different system, and I think it did so wisely. But the financial purposes to which these moneys are applied are purposes of such a magnitude that I think the mode of dealing with them is of a character far beyond being settled by the Report of any Committee, and must be reserved to the discretion of this House. Those funds have been used for purposes of great importance. At times, when it has been thought right to lighten the burdens on property by reducing the interest on the public debt, these funds have afforded the means of doing so by enabling us to make the proper provision for that purpose. I doubt whether, if it had not been for the possession of these funds, Mr. Goulburn would have been able in 1844 to effect that great operation which saved this country £1,200,000 a year. And during the Crimean war could my right hon. Friend the Member for Radnorshire (Sir George Lewis) be blamed because he largely used these funds to enable him to borrow with advantage and with a saving to the country, in order to bear the expense of the war? If he had then been compelled to borrow in stock—the demands for the war being uncertain—he would have had to borrow a larger sum than was wanted, and would not only have withdrawn from the demands of commerce money that was necessary, but have entailed upon the country considerable expense.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Then as to the objects of the Bill. There is at this moment no positive title in law to the deposits in savings banks. I have been told that it is alarming to the depositors to say so; but I think that opinion has been set afloat by certain officers of savings banks—the persons, in fact, who have got up the petitions. But if it is true that alarm will be created, I ask would it be wise or right to conceal from the depositors what is the fact? The legal position of depositors is this—they have a perfect and absolute title to all assets held by the Commissioners, but none beyond that. This Bill gives them a title to all the money held by the Commissioners, a title secured on the State Deposit Account, and it insures the trustees of savings banks in the funds of the State itself. The next object of the Bill is to give a true account of the National Debt; no one has ever seen a true account of the National Debt. No such thing has ever been laid before this House; but the Bill aims at arriving at as true an account of the National Debt as we can, and of rectifying that account once every year. An hon. Gentleman has said I ought to go bowing to the Bank of England to ask more favourable terms from them in respect of these funds. The Bank of England is entitled to £300 a year for the management of every million of stock created by these funds, and I am asked, as Finance Minister, to go to them and petition to have the charge lessened; but I do not think that that is a position in which the Finance Minister of this country ought to appear. In conclusion, I have to repeat that this Bill completely establishes the legal title of depositors; limits the power of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—cutting off the means by which he exercised his power, and which, I am free to admit, has in past times been abused; increases the income derived from these funds, and makes provision for bringing all the proceedings connected with them under the cognizance and control of the House. I believe, therefore, that the Bill will receive the sanction of the House.

MR. T. BARING said, that as a Member of the Committee he could not overlook the statement of the right hon. Gentleman—that the Committee was composed of individuals not one of whom knew any thing of the question.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I never said anything of the kind. I said that none of them had been conversant in the slightest degree, as responsible persons, with the question to be considered.

MR. T. BARING said, he did not apprehend that the Committee professed to know more than other Members; but when the right hon. Gentleman said the Committee contained no Chancellor of the Exchequer, he would ask under whose administration was that Committee appointed? It was formed under the sanction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day, now the Secretary for the Home Department. Why did that right hon. Gentleman exclude the Chancellor of the Exchequer? He (Mr. Baring) did not know his sentiments on the subject; but it was only reasonable to suppose that, as a fair and honest Minister, he thought the inquiry ought to be conducted by a Committee wholly distinct from the existing or any previous Government. The right hon. Gentleman had the opportunity of objecting to that Committee as not being a fair Committee, but he did nothing of the kind. It was also in the power of the Chancellors of the Exchequer to whom reference had been made to ask to be examined, but no one did so; and when reference was made to Sir Alexander Spearman, a man more conversant with savings banks than perhaps any other man in the country, the right hon. Gentleman told the House that he was not an efficient, because he was not a responsible witness in such a question as this. If he were to be again a Member of that Committee he would say, "Examine Sir Alexander Spearman, who is the man most conversant with the affairs and the conduct of savings banks." But the Chancellor of the Exchequer also said the Committee took the benefit of the letter of their Commission and overstepped the spirit of the inquiry. The spirit of the inquiry was—first, to see whether the management of the funds was conducted with security to the depositors, and next, whether the loss which was apparent arose from the savings banks' system itself, or from the system of control and management being vested in the hands of the financial Minister of the day. The result was that, as the funds were at the disposal of the financial Minister of the day they were made use of, no doubt, from most conscientious intentions and with perfectly clear views, but the operations were conducted not for the interest of the savings banks, but for the purposes of the Government and the country. The right hon. Gentleman said that himself, for he asked if the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the time being had not had the control of the savings banks' funds, how could Mr. Goulburn have effected a reduction in the rate of interest, and how could we have managed in the Crimean war? But when complaints were made of the cost of the savings banks, the House ought to know whether that was traceable to the operations of the savings banks themselves, or the employment of the funds for national purposes. He was glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that no depositor in any savings bank was not sure of his money.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I said as far as the Government were concerned.

MR. T. BARING said, he did not want to draw any distinction, but he was glad to hear the Minister charged with that department tell the country that the depositors were perfectly safe. But the real question was whether the Government in employing the money belonging to depositors they considered the interests of the depositors or the advantage of the country. The right hon. Gentleman said that the control over those moneys must be vested in the individual at the head of the finance department, and instanced the Board of Control. But those systems were not analogous. The Board of Control in former times had the Government of a great empire, distinct from this country, and were responsible for it; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer was responsible to the country for the finances, and he had placed under his control the deposits of individuals which had not in their origin any connection with the finances of this country, except that they implied an obligation on the part of the country to repay them. But then came the question whether that control was always wisely, judiciously, and safely exercised. Undoubtedly it was so under the right hon. Gentleman. Nothing could be more safe, judicious, and wise than his management. But there would always exist a doubt whether there might not be some financial operation which the minister of the day might wish and be able to carry out with these funds which might terminate in a loss to the depositors, although beneficial to the country. The establishment of savings banks had been one of the best institutions ever conceived. It had encouraged saving habits and stimulated the industry of the poorer classes. But the late Mr. Hume used to say they were a great loss to the country; but then came the question of how that loss arose. The evidence before the Committee showed that if there was any loss it did not arise from the employment of the funds in due course, but resulted from their being used for the temporary purposes of the Minister of the day. The right hon. Gentleman said that this Bill was to make everything more secure, but he (Mr. Baring) could find nothing in it to benefit depositors. It was, in fact, a great financial measure, and should have been introduced as such. He wished to enter his protest against the measure, as he did not believe there was any necessity for it, and he would be glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman consent to withdraw it.

Mr. T. Baring

MR. AYRTON said, as a Member of the Committee, he rose to protest against the assertion of the right hon. Gentleman that the Committee had confined its inquiries to financial policy, and had not devoted much consideration to the conduct of savings banks. The Committee had examined Sir A. Spearman, and did not call for Chancellors of the Exchequer, therefore it was clear that the Committee had devoted their inquiries to the proper subject. They only entered into the operations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, so far as to ascertain that those operations, however advantageous they might be to the national finances, had actually diminished the funds in the hands of Government on account of savings banks. The objections to the Bill were twofold—that it did not contain many of the recommendations

tions of the Committee ; and, next, that what it did contain was unsatisfactory. To accomplish two simple objects the right hon. Gentleman had taken a most complicated course. To cancel a portion of the National Debt and turn it into a book debt with the Treasury, was a most dangerous operation, and, he should have thought, inconsistent with national faith. But what was the use of it ? Why begin a new system of National Debt ? The only reason he could discover was to save the money paid to the Bank of England. There was no necessity for the Chancellor of the Exchequer going cap in hand, as he had described, to the Bank ; but if he had made proper representations to the Directors of the Bank, they would no doubt have surrendered the payment for the national benefit without the necessity of this complex legislation. The right hon. Gentleman said that if he did not do this he must create some new fund, but that was what he was doing by this complicated proceeding. Every hon. Member with whom he had conversed on the subject asked, "What can be the meaning of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Bill ?" If the right hon. Gentleman, instead of trifling with the character of the National Debt, had created some £3,000,000 of new debt in the shape of Consols, people would have thanked him for a satisfactory adjustment of the deficiency which had been created by forty years of mismanagement, and which successive Chancellors of the Exchequer had shrunk from disclosing. He doubted, too, whether the right hon. Gentleman's proposal with regard to the interest was a safe one, or whether it would sustain close investigation in Committee. It would have the effect of diminishing the fund which existed as a guarantee against mismanagement or malversation in certain banks. If, instead of creating a new book debt, as he called it, he had made the original deficiency good in Consols, the interest would have been secured in the same way. But the right hon. Gentleman had destroyed his Consols ; and if any claim were made by the savings banks he would be confined to the Exchequer Bill market, instead of having the advantage of the Consol market, where the field was larger and money more easily got. Any one acquainted with financial transactions must admit that a more inexpedient proceeding could not have been suggested.

MR. COLLINS observed, that no one had spoken in favour of the Bill except the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that it was opposed by the great majority of savings banks. He objected to Members being brought down night after night by the Bill appearing on the paper when there was no chance of their making any progress with it, and he thought he was justified in moving that the Bill be committed that day three months.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee'"
—instead thereof.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 92 ; Noes 65 : Majority 24.

MR. TURNER expressed a hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer might yet be induced to withdraw this Bill. Except the right hon. Gentleman, not a single Member had said one word in favour of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that the Committee who had inquired into this subject had not discharged their duties quite satisfactorily. No Committee, however, could be more determined to investigate the question in every way, and, though they had not examined Chancellors of the Exchequer, they did examine an officer whom they thought more competent to give an unbiassed opinion than even Financial Ministers. The Manchester and Salford Savings Bank, the deposits in which exceeded £1,000,000 had petitioned against the Bill, calling attention to the Report of the Committee, and the Report was, in his opinion, approved by the leading banks throughout the country.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not withdraw the Bill, for it contained a provision of the greatest importance—namely, a clause preventing the conversion of Exchequer Bills into stock without the authority of Parliament.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Stock to be cancelled).

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to take the opinion of the Committee with respect to the formation of the Commission, and he would therefore move that the clause be postponed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER observed, that such a course would be inconvenient. He could not see any connection between the object of the hon. Baronet and the course which he proposed to take. If he wished to raise the question of the constitution of the Committee, he ought to propose a new clause.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he regretted that his Motion did not meet with favour in the eyes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who rarely gave his assent to anything; but he must contend that the object which had led him to give notice of a Motion to postpone the first three clauses was perfectly intelligible.

MR. HASSARD said, that the Bill, so far from extending, appeared to him to limit the power of the Treasury to operate with the funds of savings banks.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER remarked that the sum of £31,000,000, at present subject to the control of the Finance Minister, would be removed from his power by this Bill.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said the sum of £10,000,000 and the current balances would still remain.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the principle of the Amendment was to overset the Bill; and that being so, therefore the propositions in the measure should be taken in the order in which they arose. The first proposition was to cancel a certain amount of stock. We did not owe the total amount which had been named, but only interest upon it, though we did owe the difference between the amount of securities and the debt.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had made his Motion bond fide, and he thought that he had pursued a course which was a proper one. The governors were trustees, and Chancellor of the Exchequer had no right suddenly to get up and say, "I will change the whole nature of the transaction, and alter the kind of securities." He should persist in his Motion, because he believed that a Commission should be appointed to manage this fund, and it was necessary to an Amendment of that kind that the three first clauses should be postponed. He hoped the clause would be postponed.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not impute to the hon. Baronet any unfair attempt at postponement, but the Amendment moved would prevent their proceeding with the Bill. The only question upon the first clause was as to the stock in which the money should be invested; and the usual course would be to discuss that question only upon the clause. The mere fact of changing the security was no breach of faith at all, as seemed to be supposed, for the parties investing had the security of the nation still.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, if it was the desire of the House to determine a thing, the first thing they should determine was, who was to do it, and on these grounds he supported the postponement of the clause.

MR. T. BARING said, the real thing for the Committee to decide was, whether they would vest power in the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or whether they would adopt the recommendation of the Committee. He therefore thought his hon. Friend was quite right in taking the sense of the Committee as to whether the clause should be postponed, in order that they might determine whether they would adopt the recommendation of the Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID insisted upon being informed who the Commissioners were to be that were to manage these funds before they proceeded further.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause I be postponed."

The Committee divided: Ayes 49; Noes 73: Majority 24.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Friday next, at Twelve of the clock.

House adjourned at a Quarter before One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, June 25, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

3rd Plea on Indictment.

SLAVE TRADE—MOZAMBIQUE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD STRATHEDEN: My Lords, in rising to move your Lordships to Address the Crown in favour of appointing a Consul at Mozambique, the capital of the Portuguese dominions on the Eastern coast of Africa, I will not detain the House by a statement of the circumstances arising in the other House of Parliament, which induced me to submit the Motion. But I should wish, in passing, to observe that it has been postponed from the 4th June to the present moment, because it must have otherwise come on in the absence of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford), who presided over the Committee on the Slave Trade in 1850, and that noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham), whose zeal upon these questions has been known for more than half a century. It seemed to me that their attendance was the firmest guarantee that your Lordships would not be led to a mistaken judgment on the point which I desired to bring before you.

My Lords, in 1854 the Government of that day resolved to send a Consul to Mozambique. In December, 1856, the Consul left this country. In July, 1857, he reached his destination. In May, 1858, the Portuguese authorities, not being able to defend him against a violent conspiracy of slave dealers, in the absence of our cruisers at that time called away to India, the Consul left his station for Mauritius. In the autumn of 1858 a great controversy took place between the Governments of France, Portugal, and Britain, on an event to which his consularship gave birth. Since that time the Consul has had no successor.

My Lords, remarks may be made as to the form of the present Motion, and I shall try and try, with your permission, touch upon it. But as the vital question is, whether the Government are bound to re-appoint a Consul at Mozambique, I shall not consult the natural impatience of the House by asking them at once to weigh the two obvious and necessary points into which that question is divided: namely, whether the appointment was originally justified, and whether, if it was, the grounds which justified it have been confirmed by subsequent events, and still retain their power.

As regards the grounds which justified the Government of 1854 in sending out a Consul—if I state them far less precisely than I wish to do, it matters little since I am speaking in the presence of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary at that time, of the noble Lord the President of the Council, then a Member of the Cabinet, and of the noble Lord then, as now, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who can do that justice to their policy which I may fail to do. In the year 1850, after long inquiries and debates, a strong resolution was displayed in the country and in Parliament to maintain British cruisers on the coast of Africa against the slave trade, even at a cost of half a million pounds a year. It was amply proved by evidence collected at that time, that the squadron could not be effective for its purpose, unless supported by consular establishments on land to furnish information to the naval officers, and to promote the lawful commerce by which the slave trade is reduced. On the Western Coast of Africa, our squadron was supported in this manner. Besides the British settlements of Gambia, Sierra Leone, and the Gold Coast, we had consular authorities at Lagos, at Fernando Po, Monrovia, and Loanda, the capital of the Portuguese dominions of Angola. There was no equivalent upon the Eastern coast between Zanzibar and Natal, a sea-board of above twelve hundred miles. Our Commissioner of the mixed Court and our Consul at Loanda had secured the concurrence of Portugal, with the operations of our squadron on the Western Coast. It was essential by new means to obtain the same concurrence on the Eastern coast. The Governor General of Mozambique was far more in want of British countenance and shelter in resistance to the slave trade than any other viceroy. He had the strongest possible temptations to engage in the forbidden traffic on account of the wants to which an insufficient salary exposed him. The feelings, interests, and habits of the colonial circle which surrounded him—threatened with the gravest penalties the slightest effort upon his part to restrain a system of which all enjoyed the gains, and none were sensible to the dishonour. About twenty years before one of these viceroys had been driven from his government in consequence of having assumed too bold an attitude towards the slave dealers. But, since 1854, the Governor General, if he meant to do his duty, had to resist the influence of France in forms of menace or persuasion. The French free-labour system had begun, and it involved an urgent demand for slaves along the sea-board of Mozambique. Against all this adverse pressure the Viceroy could not be sustained even by his Government at home without a British Consul to animate his zeal, to second his exertions, and should the occasion come, to reprimand his slackness. A further ground for the appointment of the Consul was that Britain had acknowledged the sovereignty of Portugal from Cape Delgado to Delagoa Bay, conditionally on observance of the treaty to arrest the slave trade, and that the presence of our representative was called for to ascertain that so long as she maintained her connection between the object of the hon. Baronet and the course which he proposed to take. If he wished to raise the question of the constitution of the Committee, he ought to propose a new clause.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he regretted that his Motion did not meet with favour in the eyes of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who rarely gave his assent to anything; but he must contend that the object which had led him to give notice of a Motion to postpone the first three clauses was perfectly intelligible.

MR. HASSARD said, that the Bill, so far from extending, appeared to him to limit the power of the Treasury to operate with the funds of savings banks.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER remarked that the sum of £31,000,000, at present subject to the control of the Finance Minister, would be removed from his power by this Bill.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said the sum of £10,000,000 and the current balances would still remain.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the principle of the Amendment was to upset the Bill; and that being so, therefore the propositions in the measure should be taken in the order in which they arose. The first proposition was to cancel a certain amount of stock. We did not owe the total amount which had been named, but only interest upon it, though we did owe the difference between the amount of securities and the debt.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had made his Motion bonâ fide, and he thought that he had pursued a course which was a proper one. The governors were trustees, and Chancellor of the Exchequer had no right suddenly to get up and say, "I will change the whole nature of the transaction, and alter the kind of securities." He should persist in his Motion, because he believed that a Commission should be appointed to manage this fund, and it was necessary to an Amendment of that kind that the three first clauses should be postponed. He hoped the clause would be postponed.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not impute to the hon. Baronet any unfair attempt at postponement, but the Amendment moved would prevent their proceeding with the Bill. The only question upon the first clause was as to the stock in which the money should be invested; and the usual course would be to discuss that question only upon the clause. The mere fact of changing the security was no breach of faith at all, as seemed to be supposed, for the parties investing had the security of the nation still.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, if it was the desire of the House to do a certain thing, the first thing they should determine was, who was to do it, and on these grounds he supported the postponement of the clause.

MR. T. BARING said, the real thing for the Committee to decide was, whether they would vest power in the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or whether they would adopt the recommendation of the Committee. He therefore thought his hon. Friend was quite right in taking the sense of the Committee as to whether the clause should be postponed, in order that they might determine whether they would adopt the recommendation of the Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID insisted upon being informed who the Commissioners were to be that were to manage these funds before they proceeded further.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause be postponed."

The Committee divided: Ayes 49; Noes 73: Majority 24.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Friday next, at Twelve of the clock.

House adjourned at a Quarter before One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, June 25, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Criminal Lunatic Asylum.

3rd Plea on Indictment.

SLAVE TRADE—MOZAMBIQUE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD STRATHEDEN: My Lords, in rising to move your Lordships to Address the Crown in favour of appointing a Consul at Mozambique, the capital of the Portuguese dominions on the Eastern coast of Africa, I will not detain the House by a statement of the circumstances arising in the other House of Parliament, which induced me to submit the Motion. But I should wish, in passing, to observe that it has been postponed from the 4th June to the present moment, because it must have otherwise come on in the absence of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford), who presided over the Committee on the Slave Trade in 1850, and that noble and learned Lord (Lord Brougham), whose zeal upon these questions has been known for more than half a century. It seemed to me that their attendance was the firmest guarantee that your Lordships would not be led to a mistaken judgment on the point which I desired to bring before you.

My Lords, in 1854 the Government of that day resolved to send a Consul to Mozambique. In December, 1856, the Consul left this country. In July, 1857, he reached his destination. In May, 1858, the Portuguese authorities, not being able to defend him against a violent conspiracy of slave dealers, in the absence of our cruisers at that time called away to India, the Consul left his station for Mauritius. In the autumn of 1858 a great controversy took place between the Governments of France, Portugal, and Britain, on an event to which his consulship gave birth. Since that time the Consul has had no successor.

My Lords, remarks may be made as to the form of the present Motion, and I shall by and bye, with your permission, touch upon it. But as the vital question is, whether the Government are bound to re-appoint a Consul at Mozambique, I shall best consult the natural impatience of the House by asking them at once to weigh the two obvious and necessary points into which that question is divided: namely, whether the appointment was originally justified, and whether, if it was, the grounds which justified it have been confirmed by subsequent events, and still retain their power.

As regards the grounds which justified the Government of 1854 in sending out a Consul—if I state them far less precisely than I wish to do, it matters little since I am speaking in the presence of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary at that time, of the noble Lord the President of the Council, then a Member of the Cabinet, and of the noble Lord then, as now, the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who can do that justice to their policy which I may fail to do. In the year 1850, after long inquiries and debates, a strong resolution was displayed in the country and in Parliament to maintain British cruisers on the coast of Africa against the slave trade, even at a cost of half a million pounds a year. It was amply proved by

evidence collected at that time, that the squadron could not be effective for its purpose, unless supported by consular establishments on land to furnish information to the naval officers, and to promote the lawful commerce by which the slave trade is reduced. On the Western Coast of Africa, our squadron was supported in this manner. Besides the British settlements of Gambia, Sierra Leone, and the Gold Coast, we had consular authorities at Lagos, at Fernando Po, Monrovia, and Loanda, the capital of the Portuguese dominions of Angola. There was no equivalent upon the Eastern coast between Zanzibar and Natal, a sea-board of above twelve hundred miles. Our Commissioner of the mixed Court and our Consul at Loanda had secured the concurrence of Portugal, with the operations of our squadron on the Western Coast. It was essential by new means to obtain the same concurrence on the Eastern coast. The Governor General of Mozambique was far more in want of British countenance and shelter in resistance to the slave trade than any other viceroy. He had the strongest possible temptations to engage in the forbidden traffic on account of the wants to which an insufficient salary exposed him. The feelings, interests, and habits of the colonial circle which surrounded him—threatened with the gravest penalties the slightest effort upon his part to restrain a system of which all enjoyed the gains, and none were sensible to the dishonour. About twenty years before one of these viceroys had been driven from his government in consequence of having assumed too bold an attitude towards the slave dealers. But, since 1854, the Governor General, if he meant to do his duty, had to resist the influence of France in forms of menace or persuasion. The French free-labour system had begun, and it involved an urgent demand for slaves along the sea-board of Mozambique. Against all this adverse pressure the Viceroy could not be sustained even by his Government at home without a British Consul to animate his zeal, to second his exertions, and should the occasion come, to reprimand his slackness. A further ground for the appointment of the Consul was that Britain had acknowledged the sovereignty of Portugal from Cape Delgado to Delagoa Bay, conditionally on observance of the treaty to arrest the slave trade, and that the presence of our representative was called for to ascertain that so long as she maintained her rights, Portugal fulfilled her obligations. Beyond this it was established that while twelve hundred miles of the eastern coast remained unwatched, it was idle to attempt to control the slave trade on the western coast. The stream went on, although the channel might be altered. The whole system of exertions Great Britain had been forming through the world against the slave trade since she reached her glorious position of 1815, was liable to failure, so long as this extensive chasm in her policy was open. On these grounds and others, doubtless, which escape me, the Government of 1854, appear to have been justified in making the appointment.

But did events belie the calculations which had led to it? Were the exertions of our Consul found to be superfluous or nugatory? What were his adventures? During his sojourn at the Cape, where he was long detained, Soares, the prime agent of the French slave trade in Mozambique, became informed as to his mission, travelled to the Cape, endeavoured to gain his confidence, by well-deserved invectives against the traffic he was guilty of; and almost persuaded him of his fitness for the office of Vice-Consul. So was Mr. M'Leod, by the best authority, initiated in the secrets of the region he was destined to. The frigate which took our Consul from the Cape to Mozambique was nearly all the while engaged in the exciting chase of the Minnetonka, a large vessel from Cuba, endeavouring to ship slaves along the eastern coast. It did not effect the capture, but a new light broke upon the Consul when it discovered a collusion between this vessel and the Zambesi, a Portuguese ship of war, under the control of an ex-governor. Mr. M'Leod, on his arrival at his station, found the French free-labour plan in active operation, and had the strongest proofs of its being neither more nor less than compulsory traffic in the negroes. Soon after he arrived an insurrection of the natives against Portugal broke out, from indignation at the attempts of the Portuguese authorities to meet the French demand, and to revive the evils of the slave trade. Amidst the violence which followed, the British Consul was secure; because he was alone regarded as the friend and champion of the Africans. But this very circumstance provoked the hatred of the persons who depended on the slave trade for their profits. The settlers of Mozambique conspired against him. They endeavoured to deny him any kind of habitation in the city. His supply of necessities was impeded; all service was cut off from him; his home was violated; and his life in danger. The new Governor-General, who arrived after our Consul, with the best intentions was unable to protect him. Although these persecutions would not have occurred, had it not been for the unwonted and temporary absence of our cruisers, they afford the most decisive testimony to the value of a British Consul at that station. For what could have excited them, but the strong and well-founded conviction of the slave dealers, that between them and him no compromise could be arranged; that their gains must fall, or his authority be ruined? But it is worth while to recollect what he accomplished in a career so short, so troubled, and so full of incidents to abate his zeal, and to confound his operations. Two vessels containing British property, and engaged in lawful trade, one of which had been irregularly, the other practically seized, were given up to his remonstrances. He was not, therefore, useless to the commerce he was sent out to encourage. The Marie Caroline, the Maris Stella, and the Charles et Georges, by his efforts were prevented from taking slaves away upon that coast. At his instance the governor of Ibo, a minor settlement of Portugal to the north of Mozambique, was superseded for something worse than mere collusion with the slave trade. But far more, he did stimulate the new Governor-general into a course of energetic opposition to the traffic. He did induce that elevated person to face and to resist the French demand, by which, in that very year, upwards of 5,000 Africans, under the title of free labourers, had been torn away from Mozambique. It is not too much to say that the presence of the British Consul at this station for the first time engaged Portugal in that dignified and strenuous resistance to the slave trade, which for years past British statesmen had vainly urged her to pursue. It is too well known, at least, that Portugal became before the world a martyr to the principles so long impressed, and so reluctantly adopted. It is also certain that the labours of our Consul, after eliciting from the Viceroy of Mozambique conduct which reflected honour on his country and himself, were the means of drawing from the Emperor of the French a formal manifesto against the compulsory traffic which France had too long defended as legitimate. The manifesto may have led to no improvement, but at least it gives the British Government a vantage-ground in all remonstrances with France against the system she was led in language to renounce and even stigmatize.

Lord Stratheden

But what followed the departure of our Consul from the eastern coast of Africa? Did anything occur to supply the plea for leaving the post vacant? Can it be said that what he did is adequate and final, and that there is, therefore, no occasion to perpetuate the office? On this point Major Rigby is a seasonable witness. Major Rigby was the agent of the East India Company at Zanzibar, the capital of the territory which stretches to the north of Mozambique. His despatches are contained in a Parliamentary Return delivered to the House of Commons on the Motion of Mr. A. Kinnaid, March 7th, 1859. On August 15th, 1858, three months after our Consul quitted Mozambique, Major Rigby informed the Government of Bombay that to the south of Zanzibar the slave trade had acquired dimensions and a vigour previously unknown in consequence of French arrangements. He informed them that vessels were sent from France on purpose to convey negroes from the eastern coast of Africa. He informed them that a large American ship under Spanish colours, had just left Mozambique with twelve hundred slaves on board. On August the 20th he wrote that two French ships of war had entered Zanzibar, bringing a letter from the Governor of Bourbon, to exhort the Sultan to permit a negro exportation, and that the Sultan was prevailed upon by Major Rigby to refuse it. Could any circumstance illustrate more precisely the vigour of the French demand, and the efficiency of our consular authorities? On the 13th of September, 1858, he wrote that the French merchant ship Anna left the island of Comoro, with four hundred negroes—that in eighteen hours the negroes armed themselves with fire-wood, overpowered the crew, and permitted them to escape in boats to Zanzibar. Was this the voluntary embarkation of free labourers? The Major wrote also that the price of slaves to the south of Zanzibar had doubled, and that so great were the profits of the trade that all lawful commerce was in danger of extinction. The last volume on the slave trade issued by the Foreign Office did not go much into the year 1859, but it was full of valuable lessons. It showed that on the eastern coast nothing was accomplished. It showed that on the western coast the squadron had been met by unprecedented obstacles. The tone of the commanders was a tone of gloom, if not of despair. The impression which the volume made was that we must now aim rather at preventing the embarkation of the negroes than at seizing ships in which they were embarked. It tended to raise the value of our consular establishments. But the establishments of this character on which it threw the most brilliant light, were those in the Portuguese dominion of Angola, upon the western coast—and the inference was clear as to Mozambique upon the eastern coast. The volume abounded with proofs that the French free-labour system had revived, and was prolonging, in the interior of Africa, the disorders and the horrors against which we had been waging war for half a century. It showed distinctly that the French colony of Bourbon, or Réunion, was not less intent on negro labour than before. It suggested no conclusion upon which the vacancy at Mozambique could be defended. If it were asked what was the precise evil for which the vacancy must answer, it was as follows:—Other Powers have been arrayed against the slave trade by Great Britain. And, were it not for her voice, they would at once suspend their opposition to it. But we are silenced towards these powers so long as on the eastern coast of Africa we allow a negro traffic to continue without the greatest efforts to restrain it; above all, when we fell back from a measure we have recently adopted, and of which all nations have witnessed the results and been led to recognize the value. But if we are not silenced towards Spain, towards Brazil, or towards the United States—as far as possible to limit the position—we are silenced towards France and towards Portugal. Unless we have a Consul to watch the eastern coast of Africa, from Cape Delgado to Delagoa Bay, we have no authoritative ground on which to reply to any version France may give of the proceedings in those waters. We may be convinced, but we have not the power to refute another Government contending with us. As regards Portugal, it was evident, from Mr. M'Leod's experience, that nothing but a thorough reformation could clear Mozambique of the slave trade. Until the leading slave dealers were banished, as in Angola they were banished—until new officials had replaced them—until the Governor-General received such a salary as would make him independent of the traffic

—a system so inveterate and powerful would flourish. But this effective reformation could only be produced by British influence on Portugal. Except at British instigation, Portugal has never yet and never can advance a step against the slave trade. Until we had a consular authority to guide us, we could not urge the Government of Portugal about it. Like France, Portugal might answer that we had no authoritative evidence. But it might argue further, that, until we re-established our consular authority, our zeal was not apparent in our policy. Beyond this it might reply that, however just our views, and genuine our language it had not the power to effect a reformation at Mozambique until our Consul was replaced, because the Governor-General under no imaginable change could do his duty in the absence of a British representative. And the truth of this was incontestable. Last of all, Portugal might argue—if not in words in thoughts—that as her Government in 1857 and 1858 did adopt our counsels, did incur sacrifices, dangers, and embarrassments, by doing so—did expose her capital to menace and her courts of justice to aggression, in our cause, and at our instance—she ought not a second time to tread this arduous path while Great Britain suffered an eclipse upon the very scene on which we asked for a renewal of her hazardous exertions. What were the objections to the Consul being replaced, if the grounds of the appointment were something more than adequate, and if experience had only added to their cogency? Her Majesty's Administration would scarcely dwell upon expense as being the hindrance. They were now in possession of an unanticipated income from the vote of the House of Lords upon the Paper Duties, after strong arguments, to show that the income was superfluous. The Estimates might not have provided for a Consul at Mozambique, but further estimates were not a rare occurrence in this country. At least the disposition of our people to make pecuniary sacrifices to eradicate the slave trade could not be denied. If even £2,000 a year were necessary for this consulship it would be a prudent outlay, since it went to save from inutility a squadron which cost £500,000 a year. And when the Estimates had reached the height of £70,000,000, it was not the moment to haggle about a puny cost to us for an immeasurable benefit to Africa. The Government might far more prudently enlarge on the defencelessness of our Consul in 1857 and 1858, and on the outrages to which that defencelessness gave rise; but it must never be forgotten that that defencelessness arose from the necessary absence of our cruisers. Had four cruisers been stationed in the waters of Mozambique, as in common times they would be stationed, he would not have been defenceless, and he would not have been attacked. The Indian mutiny, by absorbing our ships, occasioned all the difficulties against which he was not able to maintain himself. To anticipate them more completely for the future, it had been thoroughly explained, that any new Consul should be provided with a vessel, and move from time to time along the sea-board between Cape Delgado and Delagoa Bay. In this manner his efficiency would be increased, because his sphere of vigilance would be extended. He would have a refuge and a home in the event of serious commotions in Mozambique. His crew would be sufficient to protect him against violence; but he would still reside enough on shore to communicate habitually with the Viceroy—to watch the sources and accomplices of negro traffic—and to gain that information which never had and never could be gained by a detachment of the squadron. Perhaps the Government might urge that, although there ought to be a Consul in those parts, delay was immaterial. A more unhappy plea could hardly be selected. The great and radical reform at Mozambique, essential to a better state of things upon the eastern coast of Africa, could only be effected—even by the union of Great Britain and of Portugal—on the advent of a new Governor-General. It was only at such a moment that so complete a change of system could be imagined—much more brought about. It could only be accomplished while the Viceroy was more under the influence of his Government at Lisbon than of his colleagues at Mozambique, while his ardour to control the traffic was uncorrupted by example, while the climate had not yet begun to enervate his vigour, while he had not yet incurred the taint or sunk on the proclivity which scarcely any of his predecessors had avoided. The present Viceroy having reached his Government in the autumn of 1857, and having been appointed for three years, would naturally quit it in the present autumn. The moment, therefore, was at hand when the voice of this country towards Portugal ought to be strong and irresistible. He had shown that it could be neither, in the absence of a Consul at Mozambique. Unless, therefore, Government immediately appointed one, they sacrificed the point of time when this essential reformation upon the Eastern coast might be effected. There was one argument upon which the Government would be too cautious to enlarge, but which, perhaps, would weigh with some Members of the House more than any other. It cannot be denied that at the French island of Réunion a strong interest desires negro labour, or that, within France itself, that interest has powerful supporters. It could not be denied, therefore, that while we had no Consul at Mozambique, collision between France and England on questions of the slave trade was less likely to occur. And it might therefore seem, at first sight, that the alliance of the countries gained by such a vacancy. But this view was superficial. The alliance could not be maintained by any understanding of Governments and crowned heads if it was revolting to the people of this country. And it was certain to be revolting to them as soon as they had reason to suspect that our policy against the slave trade was endangered or arrested or relaxed by it. The series of events which had in some degree estranged the public mind from that alliance had not as yet been able to subvert it. In spite of all that passed in 1858—in spite of the aggression upon Portugal in the autumn of that year—in spite of the gigantic estimates which France imposed on this country—the British public so clearly understood the gain which all the world derived from the alliance, that no invectives against the despotism of the French Government at home, or its rapacity abroad, had yet detached them from it. Let it once be known, however, that it demanded an essential part of our policy against the slave trade as a sacrifice, and its day was over. Engagements, statutes, treaties, the recollection of our greatest men, the moral and religious feelings of the country, besides its honour and its pride, would then become arrayed against the union of France and Britain, in irresistible remonstrance. And if it should be so, reason would not seem to be at variance with sentiment. The alliance with France, or any other Power, could only be regarded as an instrument of policy. The deliverance of Africa from the oppression of the slave trade was among the highest ends which, as a nation, we pursued. The alliance might be replaced by other international relations, but no atonement could be offered for the breach of our engagements towards Africa and the world at large. He had pointed to the suppression of our influence upon Portugal as the worst practical result of the vacancy in question. But how much more complete was that suppression if France were thought (unjustly it might be) to keep our efforts on the eastern coast of Africa suspended? Portugal was far more entitled than this country to look on France with apprehension. Portugal had found that to oppose a negro exportation in those parts was to incur the anger of that formidable Power. Could she be exhorted to resist it when deference to France appeared in the remotest way to act upon our councils. If that consideration touches Britain with a feather, Portugal must sink under its weight. Portugal might yield to it at least without so great a sacrifice of faith, or so deplorable a treason to the lesson she had not presumed to teach, although she was conditionally learning it. But he had no desire to push the case too far. He readily admitted that, if the arguments of those who ten years ago endeavoured to recall the squadron were accepted, it would be logical and just to appoint no Consul at Mozambique. But if in the House of Lords those arguments had never been submitted to—if the spirit which prevailed in 1807, when the slave trade was abolished; in 1810, when it became felony; in 1824, when it was stigmatized as piracy, still obliges our Government to maintain the squadron upon the coast of Africa, it becomes the House to see that the ships which still remain shall not be useless in those waters. Either let our consular establishments have all the vigour we can give them, or else withdraw our cruisers into seas in which they may increase the safety of our coasts, and raise the tone of our policy. By any other course we waste the national defences of the country. By any other course we make an unrequited sacrifice of life and of revenue.

Lord Stratheden

My Lords, there is nothing further to remark except as regards the terms of the present Motion. It was open to me, no doubt, to have proceeded in a different manner. A question might have been put to the Government about the reasons of the vacancy. Such a course would not have been irregular, but it did not seem to be the most considerate or friendly. It might have drawn from the Government a statement of intention before the case had been explained, and before others had been heard upon it. The Motion is so framed as to demand a step, without inculpating the Government for not having yet adopted it. It does not even recognize the fact that an established office has been vacant. It takes no advantage of the circumstance that it is still upon our list of consulships. It uses terms which might have been employed if we had never had a Consul at Mozambique. And I am ready to admit that many circumstances go to vindicate the Government in having left the post unfilled, which will not, however, vindicate them should they any longer do so. The Motion only aims at a distinct and satisfactory assurance from the Government of their intention to despatch a Consul to Mozambique in time to meet the coming Viceroy of that settlement. Should such distinct and satisfactory assurance be withheld, the other House of Parliament will probably elicit it. And even if the other House of Parliament fails in its exertions on this point, a case so strong, and bearing on their deepest obligations, however feebly explained, will hardly be forgotten by the press or by the people of this country.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, if he was compelled, on the part of the Government, to object to the Motion of the noble Lord for an Address to the Crown for the appointment of a Consul at Mozambique, he could assure him it was not that they were insensible to the great importance of the question. It was true that the appointment of a Consul was only one small portion of the arrangements that were made for preventing an extension of the slave trade; but that appointment naturally brought the whole question of the slave trade on the east coast of Africa under the consideration of the House, and their Lordships always must take a deep interest in all matters connected with that question. The noble Lord had correctly stated the circumstances that led to the appointment of a Consul at Mozambique at the time that the noble Lord below him (the Earl of Clarendon) was Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The Consul proceeded to his post and remained there until 1858. He was sorry the noble Lord had thought it necessary to enter into detail relative to the conduct of Mr. M'Leod, because—although he had not the least wish to enter into the circumstances that led to his leaving his post—he did not agree with the noble Lord in thinking that the proceedings of Mr. M'Leod were so wise and discreet as he represented. He fully recognized in Mr. M'Leod an active and a zealous person, impressed with the deepest sense of the iniquity of the slave trade, and that he used his best efforts to prevent and suppress it; but he was bound, having carefully read his despatches and the book he had published, to add that he did not think his conduct on all occasions was characterized by judgment, which was quite as necessary as zeal in one whose duty it became, as Consul, to remonstrate against the slave trade in that district. He did not consider it necessary to refer to the particular circumstances that led to the vacancy, further than to say he thought the noble Earl then at the head of Foreign Affairs (the Earl of Malmesbury) was justified in not sending back Mr. M'Leod to his post. He had no wish to disparage the character of Mr. M'Leod as an agent of the Government, but he certainly did not think that gentleman's qualities rendered him peculiarly suited for the post he filled. The question naturally arose, should the Consul at Mozambique be re-appointed? The noble Lord had stated that he thought it absolutely essential for the support of the representations that Her Majesty's Government had to make to the Portuguese Government, and for the support of the Portuguese Government in Mozambique, that there should be a British agent stationed at the capital of the Portuguese possessions. Those of their Lordships who had read the papers that had at various times been presented on the subject of the slave trade on the eastern coast of Africa were probably aware the circumstances attending the possessions of Portugal in that quarter were very peculiar. In point of fact the Portuguese possessed only three or four points upon the coast. The sovereignty they had on that coast had been acknowledged by treaty concluded in 1817 between this country and Portugal. Now, in order to prevent the slave trade from being carried on, it would not only be necessary that the Portuguese authorities should exert themselves, but it was also necessary that those authorities should be in a position to enable them to act with more effect; because it was a matter of fact that the Portuguese Government exercised extremely little control over the native population along the coast; and even though they had the will to prevent the slave trade—and he would not say they had not the desire, for the Government evinced a desire that the slave trade should be stopped—even though they had the will to make strenuous exertions to suppress the slave trade, they would not be able to effect that object. Under these peculiar circumstances it had been a matter of serious consideration in what manner the slave trade, which undoubtedly did prevail to a great extent on the eastern coast of Africa, should be prevented; and he was convinced that the only manner of really suppressing it was by leading the natives who lived in the interior of the country at some distance from the coast, and by whom the slaves were brought down to the coast, to engage in lawful commerce instead of in the slave trade. In order to promote that object, it was necessary to familiarize them with those matters of trade with which we were acquainted, to make them see the advantage of turning the fertility of the soil to account, and to show them that they might drive larger profits from the pursuits of lawful commerce, than from the illicit and infamous commerce of the slave trade. All these objects were sought to be accomplished by the expedition of Dr. Livingstone. He was happy to think that Dr. Livingstone, as was known to the public from his letters and journals, had met in his enterprise with considerable success; and although he could not say so sanguinely that all his anticipations could be fulfilled, yet he thought that what he had done gave very great promise for the future. Under these circumstances the Government thought it was not possible to do better than to encourage and develop further the efforts of Dr. Livingstone, and for that purpose they had this year proposed to the House of Commons, a largely increased Vote in connection with the Livingstone expedition. From the Estimate he found the figures to be as follows:—The present annual expenditure to this year for this expedition had been £3,000. The proposed additional annual expenditure for three years was £2,500; and the extraordinary and temporary expenditure proposed for the present year was £6,000; making a total of £11,500. A portion of that extraordinary expenditure, or about £5,000, was for the construction of a suitable vessel. With this additional aid to Dr. Livingstone's efforts, combined with the attempts to lead the natives to engage in lawful commerce, there would be a fair chance of success; and he thought they should wait to see what were the results of this large expenditure, and of these promising efforts of the Livingstone expedition, before they made further arrangements for the suppression or prevention of the slave trade. He did not say at all that a Consul at Mozambique might not be a very useful assistant in putting down this detestable traffic; but at the same time, working as the Government were in another direction at the present time, and which they thought promised better fruits, he did not think, and the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office did not think, that it was desirable to re-appoint a Consul at Mozambique. He did not say that at some future time it might not be desirable to take such a course; but at present this country had two separate agents there, both holding consular authority, and Dr. Livingstone also holding a consulship, and the appointment might lead to confusion, and rather defeat than promote the object in view. He could not help repeating, that as on the east coast so upon the west, and wherever the slave trade flourished on the continent, the only real way of putting down the slave trade was to make the natives see how greatly it would be to their advantage to engage in ordinary commerce. Prevention by means of cruisers could never be completely successful; but let the natives, as they had already to a great extent, really feel the advantages of lawful commerce, and the foundation of the ultimate suppression of this odious traffic would be securely laid. The real root and source of the evil, however, he might be permitted to say, was to be found on the other side of the Atlantic; and so long as the Spanish Government did not act by their solemn engagements to prevent the slave trade in Cuba—engagements which if they chose they might with perfect facility perform—so long, he grieved to think, our best efforts to prevent and suppress that most iniquitous traffic must fail. He grieved to add that the most recent accounts that they had from Cuba showed that there was a great development in the traffic in slaves, and that it was carried on upon a largely organized scale. That was now the only spot in the world in which the slave trade was carried on upon a large scale, the rest of the world being practically free from it. It was a matter of deep regret and concern to all interested in the question, and who had a spark of humanity, that Spain had not acted by her engagements, or put an end to a traffic that was a disgrace to humanity, and which he believed in the long run would not further her own interests. Upon the grounds he had stated he hoped that his noble Friend would not persevere in his Motion. The subject commanded the best attention of the Foreign Secretary, and whenever his noble Friend thought it would be desirable to re-appoint a Consul at Mozambique he was prepared to do so.

Lord Stratheden

LORD BROUGHAM entirely concurred with his noble Friend in his view of the necessity of cultivating those commercial and agricultural relations with the east coast of Africa, from which, above all other things, the best hope of extinguishing the slave trade arose. But, instead of considering the Motion of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Stratheden) inconsistent with such an object, he believed that the appointment of a Consul was essential for its accomplishment. What prospect was there of inducing the natives to engage in commerce and agriculture if there was a body of Portuguese official agents of high rank and great influence, who, over the whole 1,200 miles of coast, themselves engaged almost openly in the slave trade? That was the fact. The salary of the Governor of Mozambique was paid in such a way that he had a direct interest in this trade. He received a trifling salary of £900 a year, which was greatly less than his necessary expenses, and all the rest was paid by the council, if, indeed, even that poor salary was not so paid, which he believed it was, and the council was composed of notorious slave-traders and their agents. Of the present governor he did not speak, but his predecessor certainly took an active part in the traffic. He was paid so much a head upon all the negroes shipped, and his agents up the country were paid so much a head, in proportion to the success of the slave-traders there. The native slave-traders were suffered to carry on their execrable traffic, by paying to these agents a certain per centage upon the negroes brought down to the coast; and then the agents, their salaries from the Government being insufficient eked them out by the profits of the slave trade, and were, therefore, themselves almost avowedly concerned in these guilty courses. Portugal had engaged to put down the slave trade, but the agents interested in it continued these illegal practices, and there was no vigilance exercised over one side, and no comfort or assistance given to the other. The extension of agricultural and manufacturing knowledge was undoubtedly of the greatest importance as calculated gradually to extinguish the slave trade; but in the mean time it must be recollected that the profits of selling men were far greater than the profits of selling cotton. So long, then, as men were allowed to be sold in the interior, the native chiefs, as was found on the west coast, would not only lend no encouragement to, but would prevent the development of the agriculture of the country, and of the little manufacturing knowledge already possessed by the natives, for they to a certain extent span some of the cotton which they grew. Until the Portuguese honestly and fairly performed the obligations they undertook in respect to the slave trade, so long would the development of the resources of the country be checked. However, it was not merely of the Portuguese Government that complaint had to be made, for there was still more reason to complain of the Spanish Government, against which the case was strong and irresistible. From the papers laid before their Lordships, it would be found that in 1858, according to the statement of the Commissary Judge at the Havannah, fifty slave-traders had left Cuba in two months in that year for the coast of Africa. The average of slaves on board each of these fifty vessels was 600. The number varied from 450 to 1,000, but taking the average at 600, it would appear that in the course of two months vessels were despatched to Africa for the frightful amount of 30,000 slaves. He did not mean to multiply that number by six, and to state that the result would represent the amount of slaves for whom vessels were despatched in the course of the year, for he knew that no such calculation could be made; but it appeared plain that in the course of two months 30,000 slaves were shipped from the coast of Africa. It was stated by Commodore Wise that the slave trade was taking a frightful extension on the coast of Africa; that new and formidable combinations of capitalists and joint-stock companies, called expeditions to Africa, were formed, and so openly, that on the Havannah Exchange the shares of these joint-stock slave trade companies were openly advertised, and the price was 1,000 dollars a share. Thus this infernal traffic was reduced to a system. The way in which it was carried on appeared to be this:—A vessel cleared out from the United States with a crew of naturalized Americans, who, being really foreigners, were not subject to the American law declaring the slave trade piracy. These men aped the manners of the Americans as well as spoke their language, so at the commander of an American cruiser deceived by them, and could not discover that they were foreigners; but when the same commander visited the vessel for the purpose of stopping it, then, of course, the crew suddenly became foreigners. They then proceeded to the Havannah, got a fresh set of papers there, the market price of which was £5 or £6, and after obtaining the requisite fittings up of a slave trader, sailed to the coast of Africa. The extent to which the exportation of slaves from Africa was carried was atrocious. The noble Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in making a statement on the subject, that 10,000 to 40,000 were imported into Cuba yearly, gave vent to his feelings, and his predecessor in the Foreign Office, in a despatch to the British Minister at Madrid, Mr. Buchanan, observed that if Spain honestly performed her treaty engagements, the traffic in human beings would cease, and that the flagrant violation by the Spanish authorities of the engagements contracted with this country must tend seriously to impair those friendly relations which it was so desirable should be maintained. How, it was said, could Spain put a stop to the slave trade? He would answer that question by putting another. How could Brazil put a stop to the slave trade? The Spanish Government had as much power over the authorities of Cuba as the Brazil Government had over its own authorities, and Brazil, to her infinite honour, had completely abolished the slave trade. The number of condemnations in the Vice-Admiralty Court of Sierra Leone before 1851 was sixty. Since 1851, when Brazil abolished the slave trade, the number came down to twelve, and at last to three. In short, as far as captures and condemnations on the coast were a test, the Brazil traffic had ceased. The Brazilian Government and people had showed great kindness and consideration for the negro race, and he thought their example might well be imitated in other parts, particularly in the North. In Brazil a man, be of ever so sable a colour, provided he was emancipated, was capable of enjoying a public trust, and was in all respects, and in legal relations also, on the same footing as a white man. When he mentioned this, he wished he could read to their lordships a letter which his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had lately received from a negro gentleman in Liberia. The gentleman's name was Edward Bryden, and the Consul of Liberia informed him that his respectability was undeniable. He was engaged in the honourable office of teaching, and his quotations from Latin and Greek showed that he had, as he represented, devoted himself to the study of the ancient as well as the modern languages. It was to be hoped that his right hon. Friend would be prevailed upon to give that letter to the public, and it would then be admitted that a better composed or better reasoned letter was never written. It was addressed to his right hon. Friend as a testimony from the author of the respect which he felt for those qualities for which his right hon. Friend was so distinguished, for his eloquence, for his statesmanship, and for his great classical attainments. He concurred in every word of eulogy addressed to his esteemed Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and he had no doubt that in common candour every one who read the letter would feel as he felt as to the ability of the writer, and the justice of his tribute to the Chancellor of the Exchequer's great merits. This was not the only instance. A negro gentleman, who had been educated in this country, at Cambridge, was a distinguished public speaker; and another negro gentleman who came from Cambridge, in the United States, was equally distinguished for the same quality. He had also had the pleasure of receiving a letter from a mulatto gentleman in the island of Barbadoes, which did him great credit for the composition as well as the sentiments which it contained, and that gentleman was in this country, making his way to be called to the bar. When he saw the great prejudices which prevailed in some parts of the world upon a matter of colour—he particularly alluded to the United States of America—he was put in mind of an anecdote which his Friend Lord Lyndhurst as well as himself could mention. There was a Louisianian gentleman of great ability, who was the envoy of the United States, first in the south of Europe, and afterwards at the Hague. In consequence of an acquaintance made abroad, he met Lord Lyndhurst at his (Lord Brougham's) house, and he told them that he had made a tour in Cuba, and having become acquainted with a negro country gentleman, who lived in a magnificent house, was entertained sumptuously for three days. He said to his host, "I am very much obliged to you for the hospitality which I have received, and I thank you for it." The negro Cuban gentlemen replied, "I am a person above all prejudices. When I find a man like you—well educated, well bred, and well principled—I hold out the right hand of fellowship to him, if he be as white as that table cloth.” He hoped and trusted that their friends in the United States would some day adopt the same liberal opinions as this negro country gentleman, and that they would hold out the right hand of fellowship to every well educated, well principled, and well bred man, if as black as the hats on their heads. He knew that some time would elapse before that happened, but he lived in hopes that a gradual improvement would take place. We might fear they were far from it when we read the astounding decision of the Supreme Court, in the United States, in the case of “Scott v. Sanford,” commonly called the Dred Scott case. If he had not read the report with his own eyes he could not have believed it. It had actually been laid down as law, that what was called the Missouri compromise was unconstitutional, and not to be attended to, consequently that the province of Illinois was not to be considered a free state, notwithstanding that compromise. It was also broadly asserted that no African, having once been a slave, or his descendants, however remote, could have the privileges and rights of a native citizen. Their Lordships would hardly believe it unless he read the words of the decision, which he did, from the able work of Mr. Edge, entitled “Slavery Doomed.” The Chief Justice, giving the opinion of the Court, laid it down—

Lord Wodehouse

“That neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves, nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were acknowledged as part of the people; that they had for centuries been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and were altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; that so far inferior were they, that they had no rights which a white man was bound to respect; and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for the white man’s benefit.”

It was on this doctrine, so execrable as to be almost incredible, that some of the States had last year come to a resolution that persons of colour should either be reduced to slavery or driven from their homes. It was in vain to expect any very active co-operation from the United States in the abolition of the slave trade, while they entertained such prejudices. Something they had done. They had made a few captures, but they were very few indeed. They had declared the slave trade to be a capital offence, and if they would really carry the law into effect, all those fraudulent representations as to naturalization, by which offenders generally escaped, would vanish. Let them only bring the captain or some of the crew on board of any of the slavers to trial, and they would very soon discover by previous investigation, that the whole system of fraud was of no avail to them, and that they were in reality American subjects. He by no means desired to see capital punishment resorted to; but one or two sentences, dealing with the prisoners according to the terms of the municipal law, and inflicting the severest punishment short of death, would at once put an end to all frauds. A correspondent had sent him some information as to the slave trade in Cuba. The thing which chiefly attracted his attention, and filled him with horror in that traffic, was the determination of the Cuban planters not to continue the race by breeding, but, for the sake of economy, to work them out. Accordingly, they brought few or no women from Africa. Another thing which struck him very much in the letters he had received, was, that vessels of great value were thrown away, as if of little consequence, after the slaves were disembarked. Owing to the immense profits of the trade, they could afford to lose a ship if they had landed the human cargo. It was calculated that the profits of this detestable traffic amounted to £1,400 per cent on the capital invested. If anything were wanting to increase their horror of such a trade, it would be such an account as he had recently seen reported. A slaver was run ashore in stormy weather to avoid our cruisers. The crew quitted the ship, and when the captain of one of our vessels went on board of it, the sight that met his eyes was, he declared, fearful and heartrending in the extreme. The slaves, escaping from the noisome abode in which they had been confined, rent the air with horrid yells, and flung themselves by hundreds into the sea, so that it was with the utmost difficulty that out of the 1,200 who formed the cargo, 340 or 350 were saved, and of these, forty died in the course of twenty-four hours from the hardships they had suffered. So that 900 miserable beings out of 1,200 were thus sacrificed to this infernal traffic. He remembered only one case worse than that which he had just cited, and that happened upon the East Coast. A vessel full of slaves was chased, and on the point of being taken. The atrocious miscreant who was captain, and his crew got into their boats and left the vessel, after having first set fire to it, with the intention of destroying the poor wretches who were at once the witnesses and victims of their crime. It was a subject of poignant regret that the attempts which had been made to put down the slave trade among our allies, the Portuguese and the Spaniards, should have proved so entirely unsuccessful in alleviating the miseries of the slaves. Atrocities, it was to be feared, were now committed in consequence of the attempts to stop the traffic that exceeded even the horrors of the middle passage. If we had forfeited much of the influence which we might have employed for the suppression of the slave trade, there was at least one influence which it was in our power to exert in regard to the Spaniards. They were entitled by treaty to have their wines and other goods admitted to our country on the footing of the most favoured nations; but they were also bound to abolish the slave trade, and we might very properly refuse them the benefit of the treaty if they did not fulfil their engagement as to the slave trade.

Lord Brougham

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD confessed that he had heard with very great disappointment the announcement made by his noble Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, that it was not considered fitting at present to appoint a Consul at Mozambique. The grounds which he assigned for that decision did not carry conviction to his mind. His noble Friend dwelt principally on the circumstance that at this moment Dr. Livingstone, in the neighbouring quarter of South Africa, was endeavouring by opening up a legitimate commerce to produce the same effect which the residence of a Consul at Mozambique was expected to accomplish. No man felt more than he did the great importance of Dr. Livingstone's efforts, and the singular capacity of the man for bringing them to the most successful issue. But he was convinced, from his own study of the question, that unless Dr. Livingstone's efforts in the interior and up the rivers of that part of Africa were backed by the Consular influence of England at the port of Mozambique, they would practically be almost neutralized. Until Dr. Livingstone had discovered the southern branch of the mouths of the Zambesi, the Portuguese Government had kept us in ignorance that there was a free passage that way, and had sent the whole flow of the slave trade through that channel, and the immediate result of that discovery had been the establishment of a Portuguese Custom-house, as if to impede the flow of legitimate traffic in that direction. It was as plain as possible that the representatives of the Portuguese nation in that quarter desired nothing so ardently as to prevent the rise of any legitimate commerce, knowing that free commerce and the slave trade could not co-exist. Therefore, unless there was an authorized representative of the British Government at that critical point, Mozambique, there was no doubt whatever that the Portuguese would be able to defeat our efforts for the abolition of the traffic. His noble Friend said it should be taken into account that the Portuguese Government had, comparatively speaking, little power to check the efforts of the native chiefs to carry on the slave trade, and that therefore it must not be assumed, from the extent of the trade, that the Portuguese Government were really not anxious to put it down. He feared, on the other hand, there was too much reason to believe that it was the direct influence of the emissaries of Portugal that led the native chiefs to maintain the slave trade. They had refused to do so until officers in the Portuguese uniform went up with the slave dealers. The whole settlement of Mozambique was made ancillary to the slave trade. The line of coast was provided with signals, which were said to be sometimes repeated by the fort of Mozambique itself, giving warning of the approach of the English vessels that were cruising to capture the slavers. There was no doubt the rise of a legitimate trade would be more productive than the unlawful trade, but a strong temptation presented itself to uneducated and unprincipled men of getting large and immediate profits upon the export of slaves; which temptation was further strengthened by the great facilities and encouragement given by the agents of the Portuguese Government to the traffic. It might be that the Portuguese Government at home were kept in the dark; because the only inducement that he could see for continuing the present system was that it enabled that Government to give miserable salaries to their representatives, who made it up by winking at the slave trade. If, however, a representative of the British nation were stationed at Mozambique, these enormities would be exposed in the face of Europe. The Portuguese Government would then send men of higher honour to this coast, and the moment this was done the efforts of the slave traders would be paralysed. If this were done along with the opening of a legitimate traffic through Dr. Livingstone's efforts, the two might, by God's blessing, deliver that part of Africa from the curse of the slave trade. We were now like a man who, in putting out a fire, was content to tread out one patch of flame, which was instantly rekindled from another quarter. The Government were asked for no expensive armaments—for no alteration of policy, for nothing that would endanger our alliances; but on that coast, and for an object for which Great Britain was spending such large sums and lavishing so many lives, Her Majesty's Government were asked to place a consular representative, who might bring to bear upon Portugal these claims of humanity which Portugal had acknowledged in treaties, but which she suffered her governors to set aside. He believed that the material interests of Portugal itself were deeply at stake in this evil being remedied. What had ruined Mozambique itself? Why had there not been poured into Portugal from her African settlement riches far greater than she had obtained from Brazil? Because the slave trade wasted the resources of the country. It was, therefore, as much the interest of Portugal as of any other Power to put a stop to the present system. The English people had incurred a vast and peculiar responsibility in having mainly enabled the Portugueses to keep their almost nominal hold of that coast through the assistance which this country had given them. But for that there would have been revolt against the Portuguese Government; the power now in the hands of the Imaum of Muscat would have spread down the coast; and it would have been a blessing to the natives that a Mahomedan Potentate should be their ruler rather than a Christian Prince. He trusted that the resolution of the Government, as announced by the noble Lord (Lord Wodehouse) would not be final; that it would be reconsidered; and that so great a boon to humanity and justice would not be refused in this critical day of the attempt to ameliorate the condition of the African.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET feared that the eloquent speeches which their Lordships had heard would unfortunately have very little effect in those quarters where only they could be of use; and if treaties and negotiations could have put an end to the slave trade it would have ceased long ago. He wished to set the House and the public right on one point that had been much dwelt upon. The right rev. Prelate had attached an exaggerated value to the appointment of a Consul at Mozambique, and had spoken as though that were the only great thing required to put an end to slavery on one side of Africa. But that was an entirely mistaken view. He had seen reports from many officers, and had conversed with others who had arrived both from the East and West Coast of Africa. He regretted to say they agreed that the slave trade had been increasing on both the coasts of Africa. As long as our cruisers were not able to visit vessels that carried all the appurtenances of the slave trade, because they carried the flag of some Power that claimed exemption from the right of search, the vigilance of our squadron was frustrated. When the American flag was hoisted our cruisers could not touch a vessel and the captain defied them. As long as this went on was not the right rev. Prelate deceiving their Lordships and the public by saying that what was wanted was a British Consul at Mozambique? The east coast of Africa was becoming almost as bad as the west, and the slave trade was almost as rife there as it once was at Sierra Leone. Emigration and other questions of a somewhat delicate character had arisen, and if he went into them he could show the House that the slave trade was in various shapes as rife as ever. The only effectual way of stopping it was at Cuba. Until that was done French and American flags would be hoisted, and our cruisers would be set at defiance. He did not say that these vessels were French or American, but they were nominally so. In many cases they obtained the rights of American citizens in order to carry on their horrible traffic. With these facts established it was idle to attach so much importance to the establishment of a Consul at Mozambique. He did not say that hereafter a Consul might not be appointed on that coast, but the best hope he entertained was from the co-operation of the Americans. They had lately sent out steamers to this coast, and an earnest desire had been expressed on the part of the American Government to co-operate with our cruisers on the west coast, and to deal with the false American vessels that assumed the American flag. If the officers cordially carried out this desire great advantages would result.

The Bishop of Oxford

LORD BROUGHAM wished to call at—

tion to a circumstance which had recently occurred, that the captain of a Cunard steamer—a line of mail packets that had, from first to last, received something like £500,000 of the public money—had positively refused to receive any first-class passenger who had the slightest tinge of African blood. A lady in whose face he (Lord Brougham) could detect no trace of African lineage was lately refused a first-class cabin by the captain on the ground he had stated.

EARL GRANVILLE trusted that his noble Friend (Lord Stratheden) would be induced to withdraw his Motion after the explanation that had been given by his noble Friend (Lord Wodehouse). The question was one which might be left to the discretion of the Executive Government, especially with reference to the time at which a Consul should be appointed. He was unwilling to negative in express terms the Motion of the noble Lord, as it might give an erroneous impression that there existed lukewarmness on the part of the Government with reference to the suppression of the slave trade. No one, he was sure, could doubt the sincerity of the Prime Minister or the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary in their desire to put down that traffic; and he hoped, therefore, that his noble Friend would consent to withdraw his Motion.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he hoped his noble Friend would not assent to the proposal of the noble Earl. The utmost which that House could do was to express its opinion on the question, and if they did so, the country would take it as an expression of the opinion of their Lordships that the appointment of a Consul to Mozambique was a step that should be taken at once. He did think that the evils of introducing subjects of this importance without adequate results were very much aggravated by their being withdrawn without a division. He, therefore, trusted that the noble Lord would press his Motion.

LORD STRATHEDEN said, no Member of the Government had employed language which could lead him to hope that the appointment of a Consul to Mozambique was contemplated as a step likely to be soon taken, and no attempt had been made to show that the slave trade could be checked on that coast till a Consul was appointed. He protested against the version which the noble Lord the Under Secretary had given of his (Lord Stratheden's) opinion, when he endeavoured to treat this as a question of the merit or demerit of our former Consul at Mozambique. He had never raised that question. There was not one remark of the noble Lord which did not point to the dispersion of our naval squadron, and the withdrawal of our Consular Establishment on the African coast, and he could not help expressing his astonishment at the language which had fallen from the noble Lord. He felt that he had no course left to him but to divide the House.

On Question their Lordships divided:—
Contents 11; Not-Contents 6: Majority 5.
Resolved in the Affirmative.

CONTENTS.

Campbell, L. (L. Chancellor.)	Lincoln, Bp.
Minto, E.	Oxford, Bp.
Bangor, Bp.	Brougham and Vaux, L.
Cashel, &c., Bp.	Denman, L. [Teller.]
Chichester, Bp.	Dunfermline, L.
	Stratheden, L. [Teller.]

NOT-CONTENTS.

Somerset, D.	Foley, L. [Teller.]
De Grey, E. [Teller.]	Talbot de Malahide, L.
Granville, E.	Wodehouse, L.

House adjourned at a Quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow,
half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, June 25, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Poor Law Board Continuance.

2° Oxford University (No. 2); Ecclesiastical Commission, &c.; Union of Benefices; Admiralty Court Jurisdiction (No. 2.)

3° Tithe Commutation; Inland Bonding.

INSOLVENCY AND BANKRUPTCY (SALARIES, &c.)—REPORT.

MR. CLIVE having brought up the Report adopted by the Committee of the whole House on the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill, with respect to salaries and compensations.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY remarked that in the discussion which had taken place on this measure a question arose whether any portion of the Bill affected compensations; and he understood the Attorney General to reply distinctly that there was not a word about compensation in the Bill from beginning to end. He (Sir Henry Willoughby) must say that he had read the Bill very differently. In order to fix a compensation on the Consolidated Fund it was necessary that they should pass a Resolution. The question now before the House was a Report on the Resolution; and he submitted to the House that it was not desirable to introduce the word "compensation" into the Resolution, which was worded very generally, because it affected any compensation in the Act passed in the present Parliament. Hon. Members would observe that a very large power of granting compensation was given by the Resolution, and the point he wished to submit to the House was this, that it was not desirable to increase the enormous amount of compensation which now rested on the Consolidated Fund—in other words, on the taxpayers of this country. The way in which compensations had increased of late years was something astounding. In one shape or another this country paid a million and a half in compensations, superannuations, and pensions; and there was nearly £300,000 under the single head of compensation and allowances. In 1856 a return was made to the House, from which it appeared that the Court of Chancery cost £171,000 a year, out of which £92,000 a year was paid in the shape of compensations. The expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy, with which they were more particularly engaged, amounted to £54,000, more than one-half of which was paid in compensation. That was a system which must be kept within some bounds. In 1846 Sir Robert Peel said, if the system was persisted in, no treasury could supply the funds, because they never could make an improvement of the law without appealing to the Consolidated Fund. He objected to compensation in bankruptcy being paid out of the Consolidated Fund. Bankruptcy compensations were ordered by statute to be paid out of a fund to be raised by fees; and what he wanted to know was what right the hon. Gentleman opposite had to transfer the charge for such fund to the Consolidated Fund. For his own part, he did not see why the original arrangement under which these salaries were made chargeable on fees should be departed from, more especially as it had been stated that when the revised scale of fees came into operation, an annual surplus of £15,000 was expected. Believing that upwards of £21,600 would be charged on the Consolidated Fund by the Bill as now framed, he begged to move the omission of the word "compensation."

First Resolution read 2^o;—Amendment

Sir Henry Willoughby

proposed in line 2, to leave out the words "and Compensations."

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE inquired whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to fill up the vacant Commissionship of Insolvency while a probability or possibility existed of the Bankruptcy Bill being passed into law during the present Session.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it certainly was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to fill up the vacancy. Provision had been made for the temporary discharge of the duties of the office until the period at which he trusted the Bill would come into operation, which he hoped would soon be the case. He was not surprised at the alarm which the hon. Baronet had exhibited at the amount of compensation already given. No doubt it was exceedingly large, but the House would perceive that it was the penalty which the country had to pay for former errors. The present Bill, as he had stated, did not contain one word in relation to new compensations. Those which were referred to had been granted in 1831, when the former system for the administration of bankruptcy was put an end to, and under the terms of their appointment compensation had to be provided for seven Commissioners, besides a number of other persons discharging duties in connection with that Court. The aggregate amount of compensation then granted exactly represented the compensation referred to in the present Bill. It was, he might add, anticipated at the time that the administration of the bankruptcy law would undergo great improvement, that a considerable addition would be made to the business of the Court, and it was accordingly provided that compensations should be made from the fee fund. Unfortunately, however, the law was so little in consonance with the wishes of the community that the business of the Court underwent an annual decrease. Under those circumstances, the Commission which had been appointed in 1854, had recommended as an act of justice, that the compensations in question should not be charged on the fee fund. The practical result was that the suitors in the Bankruptcy Court were compelled for all time to come—at least till the compensation should determine—to pay this amount. But with what justice could they demand that creditors or bankrupts should contribute to the payment of a sum which the improvidence of a former Parliament had granted to others. It was an abuse arising out of the former administration of the law, but there was no justice in making the creditors who resorted to the Court of Bankruptcy pay for that abuse. In conformity with the recommendation of the Commission, therefore, the present Bill proposed to transfer the compensations mentioned in its 140th clause to the consolidated fund. Among the persons who received compensation he might mention Mr. Thurlow, the nephew of Lord Chancellor Thurlow, who for the loss of the office he held under the former system received a compensation of £5,700 a year. The former Commissioners of the Bankruptcy Court, and the clerk of the Hanaper Office, also received compensation. If these sums were paid out of the Consolidated Fund the Court of Bankruptcy would be relieved of a burden that was unjustly charged on it. The hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) expressed a desire on a former occasion to have a more detailed account of the state of the finances of the Bankruptcy Court, and he might take the present opportunity of stating from the balance-sheet which he held in his hand, that there would be a surplus of very nearly £14,000 a year, to be derived from the balance of payments to be made in the administration of the law, and the sums received as fees during that administration. With respect to the balance-sheet as between the present Bill and the consolidated fund, the state of the case would be that for a short period of time—so long as the compensations and retiring annuities lasted—they would constitute a charge on the consolidated fund, but it should be borne in mind that those who were in receipt of those allowances had already passed the ordinary limit of human life, and that as they died off so would the charge on the consolidated fund be diminished. The benefit which he expected would accrue to the consolidated fund in consequence of the improvements which he hoped the Bill would effect, would be independent of other considerations that its enactment would enable the Government to carry out—that change in the fees in County Courts which had been long recommended, and which, under the operation of the Bill, might, he thought, be very easily accomplished without any imposition of any additional burden on the country. He trusted that after that explanation the hon. Baronet would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. BARROW said, that he hoped, on the contrary, that the hon. Baronet would divide the House on his Amendment. He had heard so much of compensations and retiring allowances that he was perfectly sick of the words, and he could not see on what principle the taxpayers of this country should be called on to submit to a burden which the framers of the Bill of 1831 had thrown upon the fee fund. If that fund were insolvent, of course the grant would cease, for the taxpayers were not bound to make it good. If the fund were not insolvent, if it was expected hereafter to yield the full amount, well and good; let the hon. and learned Gentleman pay the claimants with bills to be honoured when there should be funds in hand. But he saw no reason why the taxpayers should contribute to the compensation of persons whose offices, when they held them, were little better than sinecures, and he hoped that this further burden on the Consolidated Fund would be strenuously resisted.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he was of opinion that the House could scarcely be aware of the scope of the measure brought under their notice. Compensation had been given in a manner that he must characterize as most extraordinary, inasmuch as men in the prime of life had received compensation to the amount of three times their salaries. But he objected to the Bankruptcy Bill itself, and he wished to ask the House if they had read its provisions. It abolished the distinction between traders and non-traders, so that it would be in the power of a mortgagee to make his creditor a bankrupt, however large the estate might be on which the mortgage was held. It was said the Bill did not apply to Ireland, but though that was true in name it was not so in reality, for an Irish Gentleman contracting a debt in England would be subject to the operation of this law.

MR. HADFIELD said, he did not agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken with regard to the Bill, which, in his opinion, was one of the best measures of law reform which had been brought into that House for a long time. However, he had no sympathy with the persons whom it was proposed to compensate. Great credit was due to the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) for the care he bestowed on questions of the kind; and he (Mr. Hadfield) joined him in thinking that great injustice and wrong was done to the country by those enormous sinecures. There was one gentleman who had been in receipt of the large income of £7,500 a year from 1831; and how long he had received the public money before, he did not know—probably for half a century. But the question was, whether the Consolidated Fund or the bankrupt assets should pay—in other words, whether the misfortune of these enormous sinecures should be inflicted on the country, which had connived at the wrong, or on the suffering creditors. He wished he could join with the hon. Baronet in this Amendment; but he would join with him if he were to bring in a Bill to-morrow to put an end to those sinecures.

Question put, "That the words 'and Compensation' stand part of the Resolution."

The House divided: Ayes 98; Noes 111: Majority 13.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution, so amended, 'That the Salaries, Allowances, Remunerations, and Retiring Annuities, which may become payable to certain persons appointed under or affected by any Act of the present Session for amending the Law relating to Bankruptcy and insolvency in England, shall be charged upon the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.'"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The whole of the Bill is founded on the proposition that compensation shall be taken from the Consolidated Fund, and it will be impossible, therefore, for me to go on with the Bill which stands next on the paper (the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill).

MR. MALINS: I much regret the division which the House has thought proper to come to, but I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has taken the right course. Under the circumstances, it would neither be consistent with his own honour, his position, nor his duty to the country, after that decision, to proceed with the Bill, the principle of which was based on honour and justice. I am quite satisfied that many hon. Members did not know for what they were voting. The question put to me since I came into the House most distinctly proved that to be so; and if hon. Gentlemen will take on themselves to decide questions vitally affecting the existence of a great measure—the introduction of which is a great honour to the Government—without taking the trouble of ascertaining what they are voting about, my hon. and learned Friend has no other course to pursue than to throw up the Bill.

Mr. Hadfield

MR. BRIGHT. The hon. and learned Gentleman brings a charge against hon. Members of this House, which, if true in this case, is undoubtedly true in many others. But there is a remarkable unanimity amongst one section of the House—I mean that section which is represented by the hon. and learned Gentleman. Now, I am willing to believe that the hon. and learned Attorney General has been rather sudden in the determination to which he has come. I have seen law officers before who have not been able to carry all their measures, and other distinguished Members of Government who have been in a like position, but they have not thought it necessary to say that the Bill having been founded on an intimate connection with this or that particular clause, they thought it incumbent on them to withdraw the Bill. I should, therefore, recommend the hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw the statement which he has just made, and, at least, give himself a day's consideration before he intimates to the House that he will not go on any longer with his Bill. I believe there is a strong wish on the part of those who are most concerned—the commercial community—that this Bill, with some Amendments, should pass. At the same time there is a very strong opinion that the Bill provides for persons who are superseded compensations and pensions very much more than is necessary; and that whilst the lawyers have been attempting to do a great service to the mercantile community, they have not forgotten to do a little for themselves. I do not rise for the sake of going into a discussion of what has been passed, but merely to suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman who I presume speaks for the Government, should not conclude the matter to-night, but should give himself at least a day's consideration before he adds to the disasters of the Session the withdrawal of this Bill, and thus inflicts a great disappointment on a large portion of the community.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: I venture to add my entreaties to those of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the Attorney General will reconsider his decision in this matter. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) had accused hon. Members of voting for what they did not understand. I deny the accusation, so far as I am concerned; but I believe many voted in the majority who did not think the question material to the merits of the Bill. It will be trifling with this House and the public if, because we have expressed in an unmistakeable way our opinion against placing these compensations on the Consolidated Fund—a matter which touches only the fringe of the subject of bankruptcy—a Bill of so much interest to the mercantile community is to be withdrawn. If it had been true that there was no source except the Consolidated Fund, from which these compensations could be paid, then the public might have submitted to this charge in exchange for a great improvement of the law. But what is the simple fact? Why, that there is a large fund called "The Banker's Balance," belonging to the Court of Bankruptcy; that that fund amounts to a million and a half sterling, and that the interest upon it has for many years past met, and a great deal more than met, the cost of these compensations. The hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) only asked the House to say that they should be paid out of the fund from which they have been paid for thirty-five years, and I think the House has arrived at the right decision. I entreat the Government not to throw up in a pet, an important measure, which the commercial classes anxiously desire to see passed into law, merely because they have been defeated on a comparatively unimportant point.

MR. MOWBRAY: As one of those who have been censured by the hon. and learned Attorney General and the learned Member for Wallingford, I beg leave to offer a few words to the House. I happen to be in the position of knowing perhaps more of the nature of these compensations than any other hon. Gentleman, except the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote), and it is because I know the enormous charge inflicted on the Consolidated Fund to the extent of nearly £130,000 by the Attorney General and the learned Member for Wallingford, who, although sitting on opposite sides of the House, combined to fix a heavy charge on the public Revenue for a number of years—it is because I have seen the practical working of a system which saddles the Consolidated Fund with hundreds of thousands a year for the benefit of persons in the prime of life who are perfectly competent to discharge any duties which may be imposed upon them—it is because I have seen the difference between the returns of the persons who formerly received compensation to the income-tax, and their claims for compensation that I went into the same lobby with the majority on this occasion. I disclaim the ignorance of the subject which has been ascribed to us, and I shall repeat the vote I have given if the opinion of the House is again tested on this question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, I have not imputed ignorance of the subject to the hon. Gentleman. I have not opened my mouth to impugn the decision of the House, nor have I expressed any censure. If I give any censure at all, it will be to the inaccurate statement made by the hon. Member who spoke last. In the case of the former Bills of this kind I struggled against compensation. Who forced it upon me, and supported it on every division? Why, the hon. Member for Durham.

MR. MOWBRAY: I beg to correct the hon. and learned Gentleman. I say he will not find my name among those who voted for compensation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: It was through the efforts made upon the hon. Member's side of the House, and in spite of the reluctance shown on this side, that compensation was conceded. But another inaccurate statement has been made by the hon. Member for Birmingham. He tells me that this Bill creates compensation, and that there is a feeling in the country against it. Now, not a single shilling of compensation is created by this Bill. Sir, I should be most unwilling to throw away the many months' labour which this measure has cost me; but, unless the recommendation of the Commission be adopted, it will not be in my power to give to suitors in bankruptcy the remission of one farthing of the fees to which they are now subject. In the confidence that this unanimous Report would gain credit with the House, all the calculations and arrangements set forth in the measure have been made upon the footing of this recommendation; and, unless this charge be transferred, the whole Bill must be re-cast and the arrangements entirely re-considered. If the House will pardon the expression, I will give it an opportunity, by not immediately withdrawing the measure, of reviewing its decision. The question before the House is that the Resolution as amended be agreed to, and I propose, Sir, with the permission of the House, to take a division on that question. If that division be in accordance with the last, the result will be that the next Order of the Day must be withdrawn. That course I shall take reluctantly and mournfully—not out of any feeling of spleen or vexation. I have had no other object in framing the Bill but to meet the general wish of the mercantile community, who appear, I venture to say, to be almost unanimous in their approval of this measure. That was my single object, but if these arrangements are rejected by the House, I see no other alternative but to postpone the consideration of the Bill till a future Session, when I trust it may be re-introduced under happier auspices.

MR. ELLICE (Coventry): I have heard with great regret the statement of my learned Friend, to whom the country is deeply indebted for the great labour he has bestowed on this Bill. But since I have had the honour of a seat in this House I have been particularly watchful of all encroachments on the Consolidated Fund. I have voted against the imposition of these charges on that fund in the case of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill and other measures; and, following the same precedent, I have voted to-night with the majority, not desiring that the persons whom it is now proposed to compensate should be deprived of compensation, but thinking that the fund which has already been found ample to meet this charge should continue to be applied to that purpose. I regret to hear from my hon. and learned Friend that if we persevere in our endeavour to protect the public purse we must submit to be charged as parties to the loss of this Bill. That is a situation in which independent Members ought not to be placed. It is a matter of little importance whether the public should continue to pay £20,000 a year in the shape of fees or that the sum should be placed on the Consolidated Fund, but I am shocked to learn that if we vote independently on an incidental point of this kind the Government are to sacrifice a measure of the greatest and most serious importance to the public. Nevertheless, I shall claim the right to exercise my own independent vote, voting again as I voted before, throwing upon the Government the whole responsibility of withdrawing this Bill, upon a ground which I think is utterly untenable and unjustifiable.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY: I trust the House will bear in mind what is effected by its last vote. There is a charge amounting to £21,565, of which £9,000

The Attorney General

is charged on a fee fund by the 1 & 2 of William IV., c. 127, and which always has been and will continue to be paid out of that fee fund. The other charge of £12,000 was also imposed by the 5 & 6 of Vict., on the fee fund. The House has not disturbed these arrangements, but has simply refused to transfer these charges from the fee fund to the Consolidated Fund. In taking that course it has done quite right, and I trust it will stand by its decision.

MR. COLLINS: I hope the House will not be influenced by the threat to withdraw this Bill. In 1857 the hon. and learned Attorney General brought forward an important Bill relating to the probate of wills; and my hon. Friend the Member for York moved the Amendment of a clause giving a local jurisdiction limited to £1,500 by striking out the words of limitation. My hon. Friend was successful in carrying his Amendment. The Attorney General said if the Amendment were insisted upon he would be obliged to withdraw the Bill, but he would give the House one more opportunity of reconsidering its decision. The House, however, was not to be bullied into establishing a limited local jurisdiction in matters of probate; and accordingly, on dividing again, it decided by a majority of two that the jurisdiction of the local courts should be unlimited as to amount. The Attorney General then said he would not proceed with the measure, but would give the House another opportunity of rescinding its decision upon the question that the clause stand part of the Bill. The debate was adjourned till another day, when the Attorney General moved that the clause be rejected; but the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) was fortunately in his place, and he said that the Bill was a valuable one, and that he did not think the particular alteration approved by the House at all inconsistent with its main principle. The Bill passed and became a most useful measure. I hope the House will act in the same spirit with regard to the present measure.

MR. HEADLAM: I can say with the most perfect confidence that the principle now struck at is one of the most essential principles of the Bill, because the one thing of all others sought by the commercial classes of this country is the diminution of the fees paid by suitors. I have no hesitation in saying that, as the principle was essential to the measure of last Session, which was introduced by the noble Lord the Member for London and myself, and which, but for certain circumstances, would have passed into law, so it is essential to that of this; and without that principle it is impossible that the Bill should be proceeded with. My right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) says that it is wrong of the Government to place private Members in the position that they must either accept the Resolution, or lose the Bill for the Amendment of the law of bankruptcy. It does seem so in the first instance, but it really is not so. The two principles are so totally and entirely at variance with each other that it is impossible that any Government should combine them; and, therefore, the House must take either one or the other, not from any desire upon the part of the Government to press the House, but because the two cannot possibly be united.

MR. HENLEY: I rise to protest against the charges which have been made by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) against the Members who voted in the majority. He charged them with two things: first, he accused the whole majority of being ignorant of what they were voting upon.

MR. MALINS: Not the whole majority. I said that the matter had gone off in such a hurry that many hon. Gentlemen did not know what they were to divide about.

MR. HENLEY: My hon. and learned Friend followed it up by charging the majority with injustice. He does not intend to say that he did not use that term; indeed he employed a word which was stronger. I say he has no right to do that, because he would lead hon. Members who did not know what they divided about, if there be any such, to suppose that the majority want to take away compensation altogether. That would be an injustice, but no such matter was involved in the vote, which was merely to decide whether the sum required for its payment should continue to be provided from the source from which it is now raised, or whether the charge should be thrown upon the Consolidated Fund. The assertion that this change in the law of bankruptcy, in which it is said that the public is so much interested, is to depend, whether for good or evil, upon the question from which source a sum of £20,000 per annum is to be paid, is, to me, incredible. If the public is to derive such vast advantages from the change of system, the provision of a sum of £20,000 out of the fees raised upon this vast amount of business can hardly be fatal to the measure. I have voted as I believed to be right, and I shall vote in the same way again.

SIR GEORGE GREY: There is no doubt that the vote to which the House has just come has placed my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General in a position of great difficulty as to the course which he should adopt with regard to the Bankruptcy Bill. Under these circumstances it is desirable that we should not be committed hastily upon a matter which requires some consideration. If the Resolution in its amended form should be absolutely negatived, that, after the vote which has been come to, would decide the salaries and charges of the Bill should be placed upon the Consolidated Fund. At the same time it is desirable that my hon. and learned Friend should, if upon consideration he feels in a position to do so, make some other proposal to the House which will enable him to remedy the serious inconvenience which has been inflicted by the vote of the House upon the future prospects of the Bankruptcy Bill. Under these circumstances I would suggest that this debate should be adjourned until Thursday, in order that my hon. and learned Friend should have time to consider the course which he will take with regard to the future progress of that measure. I move, Sir, that the debate be adjourned till Thursday.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: After the proposal which has been made by the right hon. Baronet, to which I hope the House will agree, I should not think of taking up the time of the House with more than one observation. I do trust that upon consideration my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General will not come to any conclusion which will lead him to abandon the measure for the Amendment of the law of bankruptcy. I think that a debt of gratitude is due to my hon. and learned Friend for the very great pains and trouble which he has taken with the measure which he has introduced into the House; and, speaking from experience, I can tell the House how much trouble and what care and anxiety is involved in dealing with the subject of bankruptcy. I speak quite sincerely when I say that, unless the House passes the present measure in some shape or other, I, for my own part, despair of ever seeing a Bankruptcy Bill become the law of the land. With regard to the

solidated Fund it was necessary that they should pass a Resolution. The question now before the House was a Report on the Resolution; and he submitted to the House that it was not desirable to introduce the word "compensation" into the Resolution, which was worded very generally, because it affected any compensation in the Act passed in the present Parliament. Hon. Members would observe that a very large power of granting compensation was given by the Resolution, and the point he wished to submit to the House was this, that it was not desirable to increase the enormous amount of compensation which now rested on the Consolidated Fund—in other words, on the taxpayers of this country. The way in which compensations had increased of late years was something astounding. In one shape or another this country paid a million and a half in compensations, superannuations, and pensions; and there was nearly £300,000 under the single head of compensation and allowances. In 1856 a return was made to the House, from which it appeared that the Court of Chancery cost £171,000 a year, out of which £92,000 a year was paid in the shape of compensations. The expenses of the Court of Bankruptcy, with which they were more particularly engaged, amounted to £54,000, more than one-half of which was paid in compensation. That was a system which must be kept within some bounds. In 1846 Sir Robert Peel said, if the system was persisted in, no treasury could supply the funds, because they never could make an improvement of the law without appealing to the Consolidated Fund. He objected to compensation in bankruptcy being paid out of the Consolidated Fund. Bankruptcy compensations were ordered by statute to be paid out of a fund to be raised by fees; and what he wanted to know was what right the hon. Gentleman opposite had to transfer the charge for such fund to the Consolidated Fund. For his own part, he did not see why the original arrangement under which these salaries were made chargeable on fees should be departed from, more especially as it had been stated that when the revised scale of fees came into operation, an annual surplus of £15,000 was expected. Believing that upwards of £21,600 would be charged on the Consolidated Fund by the Bill as now framed, he begged to move the omission of the word "compensation."

First Resolution read 2^d;—Amendment

Sir Henry Willoughby

proposed in line 2, to leave out the words "and Compensations."

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE inquired whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to fill up the vacant Commissionship of Insolvency while a probability or possibility existed of the Bankruptcy Bill being passed into law during the present Session.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it certainly was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to fill up the vacancy. Provision had been made for the temporary discharge of the duties of the office until the period at which he trusted the Bill would come into operation, which he hoped would soon be the case. He was not surprised at the alarm which the hon. Baronet had exhibited at the amount of compensation already given. No doubt it was exceedingly large, but the House would perceive that it was the penalty which the country had to pay for former errors. The present Bill, as he had stated, did not contain one word in relation to new compensations. Those which were referred to had been granted in 1831, when the former system for the administration of bankruptcy was put an end to, and under the terms of their appointment compensation had to be provided for seven Commissioners, besides a number of other persons discharging duties in connection with that Court. The aggregate amount of compensation then granted exactly represented the compensation referred to in the present Bill. It was, he might add, anticipated at the time that the administration of the bankruptcy law would undergo great improvement, that a considerable addition would be made to the business of the Court, and it was accordingly provided that compensations should be made from the fee fund. Unfortunately, however, the law was so little in consonance with the wishes of the community that the business of the Court underwent an annual decrease. Under those circumstances, the Commission which had been appointed in 1854, had recommended as an act of justice, that the compensations in question should not be charged on the fee fund. The practical result was that the suitors in the Bankruptcy Court were compelled for all time to come—at least till the compensation should determine—to pay this amount. But with what justice could they demand that creditors or bankrupts should contribute to the payment of a sum which the improvidence of a former Parliament had granted to others. It was an abuse arising out of the former administration of the law, but there was no justice in making the creditors who resorted to the Court of Bankruptcy pay for that abuse. In conformity with the recommendation of the Commission, therefore, the present Bill proposed to transfer the compensations mentioned in its 140th clause to the consolidated fund. Among the persons who received compensation he might mention Mr. Thurlow, the nephew of Lord Chancellor Thurlow, who for the loss of the office he held under the former system received a compensation of £5,700 a year. The former Commissioners of the Bankruptcy Court, and the clerk of the Hanaper Office, also received compensation. If these sums were paid out of the Consolidated Fund the Court of Bankruptcy would be relieved of a burden that was unjustly charged on it. The hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) expressed a desire on a former occasion to have a more detailed account of the state of the finances of the Bankruptcy Court, and he might take the present opportunity of stating from the balance-sheet which he held in his hand, that there would be a surplus of very nearly £14,000 a year, to be derived from the balance of payments to be made in the administration of the law, and the sums received as fees during that administration. With respect to the balance-sheet as between the present Bill and the consolidated fund, the state of the case would be that for a short period of time—so long as the compensations and retiring annuities lasted—they would constitute a charge on the consolidated fund, but it should be borne in mind that those who were in receipt of those allowances had already passed the ordinary limit of human life, and that as they died off so would the charge on the consolidated fund be diminished. The benefit which he expected would accrue to the consolidated fund in consequence of the improvements which he hoped the Bill would effect, would be independent of other considerations that its enactment would enable the Government to carry out—that change in the fees in County Courts which had been long recommended, and which, under the operation of the Bill, might, he thought, be very easily accomplished without any imposition of any additional burden on the country. He trusted that after that explanation the hon. Baronet would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. BARROW said, that he hoped, on the contrary, that the hon. Baronet would divide the House on his Amendment. He had heard so much of compensations and retiring allowances that he was perfectly sick of the words, and he could not see on what principle the taxpayers of this country should be called on to submit to a burden which the framers of the Bill of 1831 had thrown upon the fee fund. If that fund were insolvent, of course the grant would cease, for the taxpayers were not bound to make it good. If the fund were not insolvent, if it was expected hereafter to yield the full amount, well and good; let the hon. and learned Gentleman pay the claimants with bills to be honoured when there should be funds in hand. But he saw no reason why the taxpayers should contribute to the compensation of persons whose offices, when they held them, were little better than sinecures, and he hoped that this further burden on the Consolidated Fund would be strenuously resisted.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he was of opinion that the House could scarcely be aware of the scope of the measure brought under their notice. Compensation had been given in a manner that he must characterize as most extraordinary, inasmuch as men in the prime of life had received compensation to the amount of three times their salaries. But he objected to the Bankruptcy Bill itself, and he wished to ask the House if they had read its provisions. It abolished the distinction between traders and non-traders, so that it would be in the power of a mortgagee to make his creditor a bankrupt, however large the estate might be on which the mortgage was held. It was said the Bill did not apply to Ireland, but though that was true in name it was not so in reality, for an Irish Gentleman contracting a debt in England would be subject to the operation of this law.

MR. HADFIELD said, he did not agree with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just spoken with regard to the Bill, which, in his opinion, was one of the best measures of law reform which had been brought into that House for a long time. However, he had no sympathy with the persons whom it was proposed to compensate. Great credit was due to the hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby) for the care he bestowed on questions of the kind; and he (Mr. Hadfield) joined him in thinking that great injustice and wrong was done to the country by those enormous sinecures. There was one gentleman who had been in receipt of the large income of £7,500 a year from 1831; and how long he had received the public money before, he did not know—probably for half a century. But the question was, whether the Consolidated Fund or the bankrupt assets should pay—in other words, whether the misfortune of these enormous sinecures should be inflicted on the country, which had connived at the wrong, or on the suffering creditors. He wished he could join with the hon. Baronet in this Amendment; but he would join with him if he were to bring in a Bill to-morrow to put an end to those sinecures.

Question put, "That the words 'and Compensation' stand part of the Resolution."

The House divided: Ayes 98; Noes 111: Majority 13.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution, so amended, 'That the Salaries, Allowances, Remunerations, and Retiring Annuities, which may become payable to certain persons appointed under or affected by any Act of the present Session for amending the Law relating to Bankruptcy and insolvency in England, shall be charged upon the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.'"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The whole of the Bill is founded on the proposition that compensation shall be taken from the Consolidated Fund, and it will be impossible, therefore, for me to go on with the Bill which stands next on the paper (the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill).

MR. MALINS: I much regret the division which the House has thought proper to come to, but I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has taken the right course. Under the circumstances, it would neither be consistent with his own honour, his position, nor his duty to the country, after that decision, to proceed with the Bill, the principle of which was based on honour and justice. I am quite satisfied that many hon. Members did not know for what they were voting. The question put to me since I came into the House most distinctly proved that to be so; and if hon. Gentlemen will take on themselves to decide questions vitally affecting the existence of a great measure—the introduction of which is a great honour to the Government—without taking the trouble of ascertaining what they are voting about, my hon. and learned Friend has no other course to pursue than to throw up the Bill.

Mr. Hadfield

MR. BRIGHT. The hon. and learned Gentleman brings a charge against hon. Members of this House, which, if true in this case, is undoubtedly true in many others. But there is a remarkable unanimity amongst one section of the House—I mean that section which is represented by the hon. and learned Gentleman. Now, I am willing to believe that the hon. and learned Attorney General has been rather sudden in the determination to which he has come. I have seen law officers before who have not been able to carry all their measures, and other distinguished Members of Government who have been in a like position, but they have not thought it necessary to say that the Bill having been founded on an intimate connection with this or that particular clause, they thought it incumbent on them to withdraw the Bill. I should, therefore, recommend the hon. and learned Gentleman to withdraw the statement which he has just made, and, at least, give himself a day's consideration before he intimates to the House that he will not go on any longer with his Bill. I believe there is a strong wish on the part of those who are most concerned—the commercial community—that this Bill, with some Amendments, should pass. At the same time there is a very strong opinion that the Bill provides for persons who are superseded compensations and pensions very much more than is necessary; and that whilst the lawyers have been attempting to do a great service to the mercantile community, they have not forgotten to do a little for themselves. I do not rise for the sake of going into a discussion of what has been passed, but merely to suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman who I presume speaks for the Government, should not conclude the matter to-night, but should give himself at least a day's consideration before he adds to the disasters of the Session the withdrawal of this Bill, and thus inflicts a great disappointment on a large portion of the community.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: I venture to add my entreaties to those of the hon. Member for Birmingham, that the Attorney General will reconsider his decision in this matter. The hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) had accused hon. Members of voting for what they did not understand. I deny the accusation, so far as I am concerned; but I believe many voted in the majority who did not think the question material to the merits of the Bill. It will be trifling with this House and the public if, because we have expressed in an unmistakeable way our opinion against placing these compensations on the Consolidated Fund—a matter which touches only the fringe of the subject of bankruptcy—a Bill of so much interest to the mercantile community is to be withdrawn. If it had been true that there was no source except the Consolidated Fund, from which these compensations could be paid, then the public might have submitted to this charge in exchange for a great improvement of the law. But what is the simple fact? Why, that there is a large fund called “The Banker’s Balance,” belonging to the Court of Bankruptcy; that that fund amounts to a million and a half sterling, and that the interest upon it has for many years past met, and a great deal more than met, the cost of these compensations. The hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) only asked the House to say that they should be paid out of the fund from which they have been paid for thirty-five years, and I think the House has arrived at the right decision. I entreat the Government not to throw up in a pet, an important measure, which the commercial classes anxiously desire to see passed into law, merely because they have been defeated on a comparatively unimportant point.

MR. MOWBRAY: As one of those who have been censured by the hon. and learned Attorney General and the learned Member for Wallingford, I beg leave to offer a few words to the House. I happen to be in the position of knowing perhaps more of the nature of these compensations than any other hon. Gentleman, except the hon. Baronet the Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote), and it is because I know the enormous charge inflicted on the Consolidated Fund to the extent of nearly £130,000 by the Attorney General and the learned Member for Wallingford, who, although sitting on opposite sides of the House, combined to fix a heavy charge on the public Revenue for a number of years—it is because I have seen the practical working of a system which saddles the Consolidated Fund with hundreds of thousands a year for the benefit of persons in the prime of life who are perfectly competent to discharge any duties which may be imposed upon them—it is because I have seen the difference between the returns of the persons who formerly received compensation to the income-tax, and their claims for compensation that I went into the same lobby with the majority on this occasion. I disclaim the ignorance of the subject which has been ascribed to us, and I shall repeat the vote I have given if the opinion of the House is again tested on this question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, I have not imputed ignorance of the subject to the hon. Gentleman. I have not opened my mouth to impugn the decision of the House, nor have I expressed any censure. If I give any censure at all, it will be to the inaccurate statement made by the hon. Member who spoke last. In the case of the former Bills of this kind I struggled against compensation. Who forced it upon me, and supported it on every division? Why, the hon. Member for Durham.

MR. MOWBRAY: I beg to correct the hon. and learned Gentleman. I say he will not find my name among those who voted for compensation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: It was through the efforts made upon the hon. Member’s side of the House, and in spite of the reluctance shown on this side, that compensation was conceded. But another inaccurate statement has been made by the hon. Member for Birmingham. He tells me that this Bill creates compensation, and that there is a feeling in the country against it. Now, not a single shilling of compensation is created by this Bill. Sir, I should be most unwilling to throw away the many months’ labour which this measure has cost me; but, unless the recommendation of the Commission be adopted, it will not be in my power to give to suitors in bankruptcy the remission of one farthing of the fees to which they are now subject. In the confidence that this unanimous Report would gain credit with the House, all the calculations and arrangements set forth in the measure have been made upon the footing of this recommendation; and, unless this charge be transferred, the whole Bill must be re-cast and the arrangements entirely re-considered. If the House will pardon the expression, I will give it an opportunity, by not immediately withdrawing the measure, of reviewing its decision. The question before the House is that the Resolution as amended be agreed to, and I propose, Sir, with the permission of the House, to take a division on that question. If that division be in accordance with the last, the result will be that the next Order of the Day must be withdrawn. That course I shall take reluctantly and mournfully—not out of any feeling of spleen or vexation. I have had no other object in framing the Bill but to meet the general wish of the mercantile community, who appear, I venture to say, to be almost unanimous in their approval of this measure. That was my single object, but if these arrangements are rejected by the House, I see no other alternative but to postpone the consideration of the Bill till a future Session, when I trust it may be re-introduced under happier auspices.

MR. ELLICE (Coventry): I have heard with great regret the statement of my learned Friend, to whom the country is deeply indebted for the great labour he has bestowed on this Bill. But since I have had the honour of a seat in this House I have been particularly watchful of all encroachments on the Consolidated Fund. I have voted against the imposition of these charges on that fund in the case of the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill and other measures; and, following the same precedent, I have voted to-night with the majority, not desiring that the persons whom it is now proposed to compensate should be deprived of compensation, but thinking that the fund which has already been found ample to meet this charge should continue to be applied to that purpose. I regret to hear from my hon. and learned Friend that if we persevere in our endeavour to protect the public purse we must submit to be charged as parties to the loss of this Bill. That is a situation in which independent Members ought not to be placed. It is a matter of little importance whether the public should continue to pay £20,000 a year in the shape of fees or that the sum should be placed on the Consolidated Fund, but I am shocked to learn that if we vote independently on an incidental point of this kind the Government are to sacrifice a measure of the greatest and most serious importance to the public. Nevertheless, I shall claim the right to exercise my own independent vote, voting again as I voted before, throwing upon the Government the whole responsibility of withdrawing this Bill, upon a ground which I think is utterly untenable and unjustifiable.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY: I trust the House will bear in mind what is effected by its last vote. There is a charge amounting to £21,565, of which £9,000

The Attorney General

is charged on a fee fund by the 1 & 2 of William IV., c. 127, and which always has been and will continue to be paid out of that fee fund. The other charge of £12,000 was also imposed by the 5 & 6 of Vict., on the fee fund. The House has not disturbed these arrangements, but has simply refused to transfer these charges from the fee fund to the Consolidated Fund. In taking that course it has done quite right, and I trust it will stand by its decision.

MR. COLLINS: I hope the House will not be influenced by the threat to withdraw this Bill. In 1857 the hon. and learned Attorney General brought forward an important Bill relating to the probate of wills; and my hon. Friend the Member for York moved the Amendment of a clause giving a local jurisdiction limited to £1,500 by striking out the words of limitation. My hon. Friend was successful in carrying his Amendment. The Attorney General said if the Amendment were insisted upon he would be obliged to withdraw the Bill, but he would give the House one more opportunity of reconsidering its decision. The House, however, was not to be bullied into establishing a limited local jurisdiction in matters of probate; and accordingly, on dividing again, it decided by a majority of two that the jurisdiction of the local courts should be unlimited as to amount. The Attorney General then said he would not proceed with the measure, but would give the House another opportunity of rescinding its decision upon the question that the clause stand part of the Bill. The debate was adjourned till another day, when the Attorney General moved that the clause be rejected; but the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) was fortunately in his place, and he said that the Bill was a valuable one, and that he did not think the particular alteration approved by the House at all inconsistent with its main principle. The Bill passed and became a most useful measure. I hope the House will act in the same spirit with regard to the present measure.

MR. HEADLAM: I can say with the most perfect confidence that the principle now struck at is one of the most essential principles of the Bill, because the one thing of all others sought by the commercial classes of this country is the diminution of the fees paid by suitors. I have no hesitation in saying that, as the principle was essential to the measure of last Session, which was introduced by the noble Lord the Member for London and myself, and which, but for certain circumstances, would have passed into law, so it is essential to that of this; and without that principle it is impossible that the Bill should be proceeded with. My right hon. Friend the Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice) says that it is wrong of the Government to place private Members in the position that they must either accept the Resolution, or lose the Bill for the Amendment of the law of bankruptcy. It does seem so in the first instance, but it really is not so. The two principles are so totally and entirely at variance with each other that it is impossible that any Government should combine them; and, therefore, the House must take either one or the other, not from any desire upon the part of the Government to press the House, but because the two cannot possibly be united.

MR. HENLEY: I rise to protest against the charges which have been made by my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) against the Members who voted in the majority. He charged them with two things: first, he accused the whole majority of being ignorant of what they were voting upon.

MR. MALINS: Not the whole majority. I said that the matter had gone off in such a hurry that many hon. Gentlemen did not know what they were to divide about.

MR. HENLEY: My hon. and learned Friend followed it up by charging the majority with injustice. He does not intend to say that he did not use that term; indeed he employed a word which was stronger. I say he has no right to do that, because he would lead hon. Members who did not know what they divided about, if there be any such, to suppose that the majority want to take away compensation altogether. That would be an injustice, but no such matter was involved in the vote, which was merely to decide whether the sum required for its payment should continue to be provided from the source from which it is now raised, or whether the charge should be thrown upon the Consolidated Fund. The assertion that this change in the law of bankruptcy, in which it is said that the public is so much interested, is to depend, whether for good or evil, upon the question from which source a sum of £20,000 per annum is to be paid, is, to me, incredible. If the public is to derive such vast advantages from the change of system, the provision of a sum of £20,000 out of the fees raised upon this vast amount of business can hardly be fatal to the measure. I have voted as I believed to be right, and I shall vote in the same way again.

SIR GEORGE GREY: There is no doubt that the vote to which the House has just come has placed my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General in a position of great difficulty as to the course which he should adopt with regard to the Bankruptcy Bill. Under these circumstances it is desirable that we should not be committed hastily upon a matter which requires some consideration. If the Resolution in its amended form should be absolutely negatived, that, after the vote which has been come to, would decide the salaries and charges of the Bill should be placed upon the Consolidated Fund. At the same time it is desirable that my hon. and learned Friend should, if upon consideration he feels in a position to do so, make some other proposal to the House which will enable him to remedy the serious inconvenience which has been inflicted by the vote of the House upon the future prospects of the Bankruptcy Bill. Under these circumstances I would suggest that this debate should be adjourned until Thursday, in order that my hon. and learned Friend should have time to consider the course which he will take with regard to the future progress of that measure. I move, Sir, that the debate be adjourned till Thursday.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: After the proposal which has been made by the right hon. Baronet, to which I hope the House will agree, I should not think of taking up the time of the House with more than one observation. I do trust that upon consideration my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General will not come to any conclusion which will lead him to abandon the measure for the Amendment of the law of bankruptcy. I think that a debt of gratitude is due to my hon. and learned Friend for the very great pains and trouble which he has taken with the measure which he has introduced into the House; and, speaking from experience, I can tell the House how much trouble and what care and anxiety is involved in dealing with the subject of bankruptcy. I speak quite sincerely when I say that, unless the House passes the present measure in some shape or other, I, for my own part, despair of ever seeing a Bankruptcy Bill become the law of the land. With regard to the point upon which the division of the House has been taken—at which division I regret that I was not present, because I should certainly have voted with my hon. and learned Friend—I must remind the House of a circumstance which I do not think has been stated. It is not very many years since a Royal Commission was appointed to consider the whole question of the law of bankruptcy. Upon that Commission were men of the greatest eminence, both in the legal and commercial world, and one of its recommendations was, that that should be done with regard to this £20,000 which my hon. and learned Friend has proposed. And although my right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) says that £20,000 is not a large sum of money, I must remind the House that £20,000, when taken in relation to the other costs of bankruptcy proceedings, is by no means an insignificant sum. Besides that, I do think that a case of greater injustice than this was never found in the course of the administration of the law. Observe what is done. Several years ago, a generation ago almost, you thought it right to abolish certain judicial officers in bankruptcy. Of course they were entitled to compensation, and you are now making the unfortunate persons who are obliged to have recourse to the Court of Bankruptcy, the present suitors, pay a sum to the fixing and disposal of which they have not been concurring parties. Therefore, if the vote is to be taken again, I shall support the proposal of my hon. and learned Friend, which I believe is founded upon justice, and I am extremely glad that he has been able to prevail upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer to consent to the transfer of this sum to the fund upon which it ought always to have been placed. I trust that, whatever course my hon. and learned Friend may take, he will not abandon the Bankruptcy Bill, which I am quite sure may now become the law of the country, and which, if it does, will redound very much to his honour and to that of the Government of which he is a Member.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

EXCISE AND ASSESSED TAXES ACTS. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

MR. LAING moved the following Resolutions:—

Sir Hugh Cairns

(In the Committee.)

“1. That, in lieu of the Duties now payable on Game Certificates in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, there shall be charged the following Duties of Excise:—

For a Licence in Great Britain, or a Certificate in Ireland, to be taken out by every person who shall use any dog, gun, net, or other engine for the purpose of taking or killing any game whatever, or any woodcock, snipe, quail, or landrail, or any conies, or any deer, or shall take or kill by any means whatever, or shall assist in any manner in the taking, by any means whatever, of any game, or any woodcock, snipe, quail, or landrail, or any coney, or any deer:—

£. s. d.

If such Licence or Certificate shall be taken out after the 5th day of April and before the 1st day of November,

To expire on the 5th day of April in the following year 3 0 0

To expire on the 31st day of October in the same year in which the Licence or Certificate shall be taken out 2 0 0

If such Licence or Certificate shall be taken out on or after the 1st day of November,

To expire on the 5th day of April following 2 0 0

“2. That any person having the right to kill game on any lands in England or Scotland shall be entitled to take out a Licence to authorise any servant, for whom he shall be chargeable to the Duty of Assessed Taxes, as a Game-keeper, to kill game upon the same lands, upon payment of the Duty of 2 0 0

“3. That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to Game Certificates and Licences to deal in Game.”

MR. CAIRD said, he should propose that the word “coney” be omitted from the Resolution, as he was of opinion that, according to the present wording of the clause, a certificate would have to be taken out to kill rabbits. Rabbits were most destructive vermin on a farm—more so than bats or rooks—and, therefore it was desirable that farmers should be allowed to kill them on their own land without a licence.

MR. LAING said, the only object proposed was to alter the amount of money to be paid for a licence, but not in any other way to affect the existing law. The words of the Resolution were a literal transcript of the words of the Act. None of the exceptions provided under the present Act would be interfered with.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that if the words were left in it would be imperative on every person killing rabbits to take out a game certificate. Now, it was well known to agriculturists that there was no nuisance to which the farmer was subjected equal to rabbits, and in many districts it was necessary to employ men to keep them down; but this clause would render all persons so employed liable to a tax.

Mr. HENLEY said, he understood the hon. Secretary to the Treasury to say that the only change proposed by the Government was an amended scale of duties. He supposed, therefore, that the Act of Parliament to be founded on these Resolutions would contain all the exemptions and exceptions contained in the existing statute. If that were so the Resolution appeared to him to be right enough, and it was not necessary to have these words left out, so that people might go into other people's land to shoot rabbits. The exemption would enable farmers and others to shoot rabbits on their own grounds, and there was nothing in the Act to render keepers liable. If the Secretary of the Treasury would undertake to bring the Bill in in that form, he thought it safer to let the words stand as they now did.

Mr. PALK said, he objected to importing words of dubious meaning into the Resolution, when by a slight alteration they could make it perfectly plain to the commonest understanding. He was also sorry to find that the Resolution was to be carried without discussing its principle, because he confessed that he saw no reason for altering the scale of certificates at all. He did not suppose it would bring in a larger revenue, and therefore he wanted to know what was the object of this Resolution. It was not very clearly drawn, because the hon. Gentleman opposite had found it necessary to explain that the words in the Resolution did not mean what they appeared to mean. The present style of legislation was not very easy to understand, and he trusted that the hon. Gentleman or some supporter of the Government would explain why this alteration was proposed, and why, if it were actually necessary, it could not be put in a plainer and more intelligible shape.

Mr. LAING explained that an Act of Parliament to carry out these Resolutions would be necessary, so that the effect of passing the Resolution would not be to give validity to the alterations in the scale of licences. When the Bill was before the House it would be for hon. Gentlemen, who considered the existing exemptions did not go far enough, to move such Amendments as they might think proper. With regard to the objects of the measure, the Government had been advised by the officers of Inland Revenue that by making the proposed reduction in the charge facilities would be afforded to many persons to take out game licences, which they would be likely to avail themselves of, and that consequently a considerable increase in the revenue derived from game certificates might be expected, while the constant evasions of the duty which now took place, owing to the high rate imposed, would be to a great extent avoided.

Mr. DIVEIT said, he had known persons fond of sporting who ran serious risks rather than pay £4. Many such would doubtless take out certificates under the new system. In his opinion the reduction might be carried further with advantage.

Mr. BLACKBURN said, he understood it was intended that it would still be competent for persons to shoot rabbits on their own farms, and therefore he would advise the withdrawal of the Amendment. It was said there was to be no alteration in the existing law, but there appeared to be some, because for the killing deer a licence was to be required for the first time.

Mr. JOHN LOCKE remarked that under the existing law no game certificate was necessary for destroying rabbits by the owner or occupier, or by his servants; but it was necessary to guard against persons going upon enclosed land, and, under the pretence of shooting rabbits, beating up for game, for which purpose persons so trespassing were liable to be proceeded against under the game laws. The owner of any enclosed land could give leave to as many persons as he pleased to kill rabbits, and no game certificates would be requisite, and he did not see, therefore, that it would make any difference if the word "coney" were struck out.

Mr. BARROW said, he held that it was essential owners and occupiers should have the right to kill rabbits either by themselves or their servants, on their own lands, but he was satisfied with the assurance that the exemptions in the existing law would be continued.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE observed that he did not understand that any alteration in the existing Game Laws was proposed. The only question was, whether it was politic or not to reduce the rate of game licences. He thought it was; for there were many persons, as commercial men, clerks, and others, of unquestionable respectability, who were able, perhaps, to take only a short holiday in the year, and who would gladly take out licences to kill game during that holiday, if they could do so at a moderate cost. He looked upon the proposal as a great boon to those classes, and should support it. If the word "coney" were omitted, it would, he feared, invite people of improper character from neighbouring towns to enter and trespass upon enclosed lands, under the pretence of shooting rabbits, knowing that they could only be proceeded against for the trespass.

MR. WALTER said, that after the declaration which had been made on both sides, that there was no intention to afford any protection to rabbits, he thought the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Caird) would do well not to press his Amendment; because it might lead to misconception out of doors as to the feeling which actuated hon. Gentlemen in voting upon the question. He apprehended that the same facilities would be given for the destruction of rabbits, so far as they were considered noxious to agriculture, as under the existing law; and he hoped the hon. Member for Stirling would rest satisfied with that assurance on the part of the Government. With respect to the financial part of the question, the only fault he had to find with the Resolutions was, that they did not go far enough. He believed that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have derived a great financial advantage from reducing the certificates to one guinea, or, at all events, to two guineas. At present, a considerable number of gentlemen, who were in the habit of shooting every year, never dreamt of taking out a licence. The sum was very large, and, in the case of a gentleman with a numerous family of sons, it became a serious tax. He was satisfied, therefore, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would gain by making a uniform charge of one guinea.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, after the explanations which had been given, he felt constrained to join in the advice to his hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. CAIRD said, he could not accede to the recommendation which had been made to him. As a practical agriculturist, he had seen so much damage done by rabbits, that he thought the Government would do well to offer a premium for their destruction.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he considered the wisest course to be to leave the law in the exact state in which it was. No change whatever was proposed. The only effect, so far as he could see, of carrying the Amendment, would be to make it necessary for parties to take out separate 4*l.* certificates to kill rabbits. It was true that rabbits were destructive; but he thought that proper persons only should be permitted to destroy them.

MR. CAIRD said, that under the third Resolution the laws relating to Game certificates might be so altered as to obviate the result stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Nor could he agree in the opinion that no change was proposed, because it was "a Bill to Amend the Law," and the word "deer" was introduced.

Amendment negatived.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he wished to call attention to the fact, that the names of all persons who took out certificates at present were advertised at a very heavy expense in the newspapers, and to ask whether they would continue to be so advertised when certificates were taken out two or three times in the season, and when it was expected that a much larger number of persons would take them out than at present.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had mentioned, at an early period of the Session, that a remission to the amount of nearly £50,000 would take place in the price of the certificates; but by the increase in their number, it was expected that there would be a gain to the revenue of perhaps £10,000 a year. He was not able to give any answer as to the publication of the names of the holders; but he quite agreed with the hon. Baronet that it was a matter which required consideration: especially as the certificate might be for part of a season; and thus the question might arise whether the process of advertising should be repeated. There was always more or less of petty jobbing connected with the whole system of Government advertisements, and it was not easy to discover how this could best be remedied. It was obviously desirable that advertisements should not be inserted on behalf of the Government, for which there was no real necessity; but he was not able to say to what extent, under the new system, the Treasury would be able to dispense with the assistance which those publications were supposed to give. It was proposed to effect an important change with regard to Game certificates, which had hitherto belonged to the class of assessed taxes, and were under the jurisdiction, not of the magistrates, but of the

Sir John Trollope

Commissioners of Taxes. By the Bill which he was about to introduce, they would be removed into the class of Excise duties, and from the much larger body of officers connected with that department, a more efficient and powerful supervision would be exercised; and he was informed that they would likewise be brought under the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and possibly in that way the system of advertising might be dispensed with. Another change which he had been led to propose, at the suggestion of a high authority, whose opinion was much respected in that House, was that, in the event of a person trespassing in pursuit of game, his certificate should become absolutely void. This would go far to counteract any injurious effects that might follow from reducing the price of certificates, which some persons urged would give increased encouragement to poaching of a certain description.

In reply to Sir BALDWIN LEIGHTON, THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his impression was that the existing Game certificates did not expire till early in July. Care would be taken to have the new certificates ready before the expiration of those at present in force.

MR. M'CANN said, a person might trespass in pursuit of game unintentionally, and it would be too bad to deprive him of his certificate under such circumstances.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The hon. Member is not called upon to pledge himself by this Resolution.

MR. M'CANN said, the forfeiture of the licence, in addition to the penalty to which persons were liable for trespassing, would be viewed in Ireland with much disfavour.

MR. DIVE'TT expressed his approval of the plan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The present mode of issuing certificates was inconvenient and clumsy.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, he apprehended the licence would only be forfeited in cases where persons were convicted of trespassing. He wished to know whether the privilege of selling game would be extended to persons taking out licences for the limited period.

MR. W. R. O. GORE asked whether it was proposed to empower the county police in England and the constabulary in Ireland to superintend the new licences?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had communicated with the Irish Government, who were opposed to the employment of the constabulary in that manner. He did not propose to make any alteration in the law with respect to the sale of game.

VISCOUNT GALWAY asked whether it would be requisite for a landowner to take out separate certificates for each of the manors of which he might happen to be possessed, or whether, as at present, a general certificate would suffice?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he apprehended that one certificate would be sufficient.

Resolutions agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION, &c., BILL.—SECOND READING.

ADJOURNED DEBATE. THIRD NIGHT.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [6th June.]

“ ‘ That the Bill be now read a second time ; ’ and which Amendment was to leave out the word ‘ now,’ and at the end of the Question to add the words ‘ upon this day six months.’ ”

Question again proposed, “ That the word ‘ now ’ stand part of the Question.”

Debate resumed.

MR. G. C. BENTINCK said, that he principally objected to the Bill because it proposed to transfer all Chapter property to the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, without making any provision for those whose claims were condemned unheard in 1840. Those claims were most just, and the Bill ought not to pass without their recognition, especially after what had taken place before the Cathedral Commission issued in 1852, under the Earl of Derby's Government, when those claims were fully considered and their equity satisfactorily established. It was in the knowledge of those who had paid attention to the question that many of the cathedrals of the country were not like those of the old foundation, but were Protestant establishments, founded by Henry VIII., and confirmed by Queen Elizabeth, for three distinct purposes. First, for religious instruction and the celebration of Divine worship; next, for educational purposes; and third, for purposes of charity, or for public works. For the first of those purposes—that of religious instruction and the celebration of Divine Service, there was a staff of dean and canons, prebendaries, minor canons, and lay clerks. For the second purpose there were head masters and under masters with a certain number of boys who were to be educated free of expense. For the purposes of charity there were a certain number of old men to be maintained; and comparatively large sums were also set apart for public works. Regular stipends were allotted to the various officials, and on looking into the statutes he found that the head master, who was next in dignity to a prebendary or canon, was to receive two-thirds of a prebendal income; the under master was to receive one-half, and the lay clerks one-third. The college boys and choristers were to receive from four to six times the sum of a prebendal income to be distributed among them for their maintenance; for public works a sum was set apart ten times the prebendal income. But changes had taken place in the course of time, and though the property of the Dean and Chapter was considerably reduced, they were still in receipt of considerable incomes, while the minor canons, upon whom the duty of performing Divine worship mainly rested, scarcely received anything at all. Before the Act of 1840 the minor canons had been stripped of their emoluments to such a degree that they barely had the income of the poorest curate, while those at Westminster Abbey were reduced to live on the sums realized by showing the Church, and the painful spectacle might be seen of a clergyman standing at the door to check the numbers that went into the Abbey as if they were going to a concert. He believed that since, by a reduction of the number, the salaries of those who remained were now made up to £150 a year; but as the value of the cathedrals was at last discovered, and thousands flocked to hear Divine service performed there where only hundreds attended before, the reduced staff was inadequate for the performance of the additional duties. And yet if they were to apply to the Ecclesiastical Commission for an augmentation it was certain they would meet with a direct refusal. The next body who were entitled to consideration was the lay clerks, upon whom the solemnity in the mode of conducting public worship depended, and yet he believed there never was a class of men more ill-treated. They were entitled to one-third of a prebendal income, but they had been so plundered that they did not receive the pay of an ordinary menial servant, or a journeyman mechanic. In the cathedral church of Canterbury the lay clerks till very lately received only £40 a year. The Dean and Chapter had recently made the munificent arrangement of allowing them £25 a year certain, with half-a-crown or three shillings for every day they attended, so that if they never missed a day through the whole twelve months, their income would be increased to about £70 a year. But that pittance again was fettered with the condition that they were bound to retire whenever called upon on an allowance of £25 a year. The case of the choristers, whom it was imperative on the chaplain to maintain and educate, was equally pitiable. A collegiate church, one of the most noble foundations in England, within a short distance of that House, gave £14,000 or £15,000 annually towards the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but all it could spare to the 15 or 16 boys who were upon its foundation was £130 a year. These lived in a distant suburb, and being obliged to attend morning and afternoon service, they had to spend the intervening time as best they could, and which certainly was not in a manner creditable to the Church. At Canterbury affairs were just in the same state, and the state of Westminster and Canterbury was that of every cathedral body throughout the kingdom. That was a scandal to the Church, and it was a scandal to the Ecclesiastical Commission. He did not blame the Dean and Chapter for it; the Ecclesiastical Commission had taken all power out of their hands. The educational purposes for which these foundations had been made were defeated in the same manner. All the cathedrals were bound to maintain and educate from forty to fifty boys, the most promising of whom were afterwards to be sent to the University. In such of the schools as still existed—for some of them had vanished altogether—those arrangements were shamefully set at nought. In Westminster School, where he was educated, as well as the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, the head master, who ought to have two-thirds of a prebendal income, received only £39, and the under master only £15 a year. The consequence was, that the remuneration of the masters was a tax upon the forty boys, who, according to the statutes, ought to be maintained free of all expense. Westminster was the only one of the collegiate schools that had attained to any eminence, but at Canterbury there was a school for fifty boys which was founded by Henry VIII., and in which Charles I. took so much interest that he ordained that in the election of boys for the Chapel Royal the boys from that school should have a preference. Yet the salary of the head master from the cathedral funds was only £100; the rest of his salary being a mere tax on the boys. He maintained that these schools, if preserved in vigorous operation, would be of incalculable advantage, more especially in the poorer parts of the country. The head master of the cathedral school of Carlisle, the Dean and Chapter of which, by the way, had surrendered all their property to the Ecclesiastical Commission, had made a touching appeal to that body on behalf of his school, and the advantages it might afford in the education of a poor district like that diocese, but that appeal had hitherto produced no results. He came next to the third purpose—the works of charity and public works. It was not, indeed, to be expected that the cathedrals should now pay the expense of public works. But there was also provision made for aged persons, chiefly for old soldiers; and many of these had vanished altogether, like the schools. Now in all these cases, if application was made to the Ecclesiastical Commission for augmentation, the answer was invariably that was not the proper place to apply—in fact, they would not entertain the proposition. He was told that the Ecclesiastical Commission was very liberal to those cathedrals that surrendered their property to them; but that was not always the case. One of the most remarkable instances of an edifice being suffered to languish from want of needful supplies from its own funds was that of St. Paul's Cathedral. The riches attaching to that foundation were proverbial, and one would be disposed to think the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would recognize it as an imperative duty to preserve the body of the church in repair. Mr. Penrose, however, the surveyor of St. Paul's, a gentleman much looked up to in his profession, had written him an interesting letter, in which it was stated that the total income of the cathedral for last year was £1,166, of which, after deducting the cost of fire insurance, with the salaries of clerk, organist, &c., only £827 was left to keep this vast building in repair in the trying atmosphere of London. That small sum would be wholly inadequate to arrest the progress of decay, if it were not for the most painful economy, which only permitted repairs to be undertaken at those points where they were urgently needed. At least £500 additional would be requisite for the purposes of this building. Hon. Members would remember the fee of 2*d.* which used to be paid to the vergers for admission into St. Paul's. That question, which had given rise to many warm discussions at the time, was settled by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who, in lieu of these fees, gave the vergers £100 a year each. He had lately heard, however, that the Commissioners were inclined to discontinue this payment, in which case either the 2*d.* admission fee must be reimposed, or the Dean and Chapter would have to supply the necessary funds from their own pockets. He thought that was a proper duty which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners might take upon themselves. Again, what was called the "cupola money"—the fee charged for showing the whispering gallery and cupola of St. Paul's—now constituted one of the principal sources of income of the lay clerks and minor canons. Surely it was very improper that any portion of the cathedral authorities should be paid by show money; and he should be glad to see a proper provision made by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for doing away with this scandal. Go to what cathedral they would, they generally found part of the church furniture falling into decay, and the reason given was, "We can get nothing from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners." That body paid their secretaries and surveyors handsomely, but were very averse from contributing towards objects of this kind. Now, nobody at the present day could deny the utility of cathedrals. The congregations in many cases were largely increasing, and with proper care the cathedral schools throughout the country might be made of the greatest use. But the Bill contained no provision for carrying out any of these objects. He did not wish that more money should be given to the Deans and Chapters, but he did want to see the cathedrals utilized and the schools improved, and he appealed to hon. Members who were anxious for the spread of education to aid him in endeavouring, if the Bill got into Committee, to provide for the expenditure of a reasonable sum in this way. It was a principle of English law to carry out the intention of founders, and faith ought to be kept with the dead as well as with the living. Therefore, unless such provisions as he had referred to were introduced, he should feel it his duty to oppose the Bill.

[Third Night.

Mr. G. C. Bentinck

[Third Night.]

for twenty-four years, and the unfortunate lessee would find that property wrested from him which he expected to hand down to his family. He implored Parliament not to permit such an injustice as that. If they were determined upon vesting all this property in one great public body like the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who would certainly fail in the performance of their duty as landlords, at all events let them do it on fair principles, and not, because it was for public convenience to change a certain description of tenure, discard the principles of public justice. On these grounds he should oppose the second reading of the Bill.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I did not intend to take any part in this debate, and I will not now enter into a discussion of any of the details of this measure. I think the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), when this Bill was last under discussion a few days ago, sufficiently answered the objections stated to it by the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge University. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken, however, has put forward some principles from which I cannot forbear to express my dissent. He has put out of sight the original object of these measures. That object was out of the large incomes of the Bishops in some cases, and out of the estates of Deans and Chapters in others, to make some provision for the augmentation of the smaller livings, and for the relief of the spiritual destitution of those populous districts which the ancient distribution of Church property left either insufficiently provided for, or not provided for at all. For that purpose it was necessary to consider in what manner this property was distributed, and how its distribution might be improved. For example, it was found that the Bishop of Durham had formerly £23,000 a year. The Ecclesiastical Commission thought that sum was excessive, and that £8,000 a year would suffice. The Commissioners also felt that as the Bishop was only to receive the reduced income of £8,000, it would be an absurd arrangement that he should have the management of the whole £23,000. Then you have the proposal of the Bill as it stands, with an alternative, which is this, that the £23,000—or rather the £21,000, for £2,000 a year was previously taken—should go to the Ecclesiastical Commission; that lands to the amount of £8,000 a year should be settled on the

Mr. Malins

Bishop of Durham, and that the remaining estates should be at the disposal of the Commissioners. So, likewise, with regard to the Chapter estates. The hon. and learned Gentleman takes the case of Ely, in which four-fifths are to remain with the Chapter. But in the case of the Chapter of Durham, there being twelve canons, four only were to remain; eight parts were to be devoted to the increase of smaller livings, and to the relief of spiritual destitution. It would be absurd to leave the whole twelve parts at the disposal of the Dean and Chapter, when eight out of the twelve, or two-thirds of the whole, were to be paid over to the Ecclesiastical Commission. It was, therefore, a reasonable and practical proposal that the income of the Dean and Chapter should form four parts out of the twelve, and that the eight parts should be in the hands of the Commissioners. The hon. and learned Gentleman says, "But what an immense amount that makes in the hands of a centralized body." Now, you are to consider to what purposes these funds are to be applied. You find a clergyman with £75 or £80 a year, and you add £50 to his income. In another instance you create a new benefice, with £150 or, perhaps, £200 a year attached to it. It would be absurd to divide large Church estates, so as to assign small pieces of land to each benefice, with a view of raising these small incomes. It is, therefore, necessary that there should be a general management for this purpose.

Then the hon. and learned Gentleman comes to the great question of all, namely, whether it would be just to make an alteration with respect to the tenure of Church property; and instead of leases lasting for a certain number of lives, to change them into a fixed term not exceeding, for the present, the limit of twenty-two years. The hon. and learned Gentleman—I will not say misrepresents, but misapprehends the principle on which these estates rest. He says that the representatives of the Church, that is, the Bishops, Deans and Chapters, have no other right over this property except to receive fines on the renewal of leases. Formerly the case stood thus:—It was supposed in the time of Elizabeth that a life equalled twenty-one years, and Church estates were leased by ecclesiastical bodies for three lives. The lessees could not put in a new life when a previous one expired, and therefore the absolute right was not in the lessee but in the Church, and it depended on the merest accident whether or not a lessee had a property nearly equivalent to a freehold, or an interest of a very limited nature. For example, where an old Bishop died a Prime Minister might recommend a very young man, of twenty-five or thirty, to succeed him. The new Bishop, on succeeding to the see, finds a lease in which there are three old lives of seventy or seventy-five. He is asked to put in a new life; he refuses, preferring to take his chance of running his life against the three named in the lease. In the end, if he outlives, he has a most valuable lease, which he can give to his own family for three lives, actually enriching himself or his relatives. Or when the first two lives dropped he might set his life against the third, and refuse to renew except at an enormous fine, which he knew would not be given. This shows that the right is not in the lessee but the lessor, and the hon. and learned Gentleman must know that in several cases, by an abuse of this power, bishops in former days allowed old lives to expire, and gave a lease of three young lives to members of their own family. Having rendered Church property of very little value for the next sixty years, they next obtained an Act of Parliament by which, for a small sum, they transferred the estates from the Church to the lessee, defrauding the Church of its property. Does the hon. and learned Gentleman wish that system to be restored? He proposes that instead of the right being in the lessor, as it always has been, it should be transferred to the lessee, and instead of the lessee being entirely at the mercy of the Bishop, or of the Dean and Chapter, that he should have an absolute right secured to him, actually as good as a freehold. This is what I should call confiscation, for it would take away the right from that body in which it exists, and transfer it to another who has only a limited right which at a certain period must expire. The hon. and learned Gentleman's plan, therefore, is to confiscate the property of the Church for the benefit of the lessee. What was the case formerly with land the property of the Crown? A great many of the Crown estates were held in the same manner as those belonging to the Church. They brought little to the revenues of the Crown, because the leases were usually renewed, and the tenants favoured. In this state of things, what did Mr. Pitt do? Did he transfer the whole right in the property to the lessees? On the contrary, he claimed for the lessor the entire benefit, giving the lessee no more than his actual right. Thus by a beneficial Act the whole of the income derived from a rack-rent was received by the Crown. But in the case of the Church which, not being so powerful as the Crown, and having no such patron as Mr. Pitt who could thus deal with its property, the general arrangement has been this:—The Church offered the lessee his choice, either to sell to the Church the whole of his interest in the unexpired term, or to buy the property, and pay to the Church the value of the reversion. That was the proposal made in the Committee of the House of Lords—I need not enter into the precise terms as they have nothing to do with the Bill before us—and it was a perfectly fair one. A great deal of property was held during the whole of the last century under the disadvantage that, although a man held the property, and expected to renew the lease, he had no such security for building and planting, as if it had been freehold, and very often, besides interfering with building and planting, he was unable to dispose of it as he wished. A great portion of that property has become freehold, and is now held in fee by country gentlemen, yeomen, farmers, and other proprietors, and the property itself is improved to an extent which never would have been the case if it had been held under the old tenure. This is the general intention of the Bill, and, as I believe it to be a perfectly fair intention, I really think the House ought to read it a second time. With regard to particular clauses, into which I shall not enter now, it may be quite possible to propose improvements in Committee. I do not deny that the Bill may be susceptible of Amendment, but I believe that it is based on sound principles, and that it will effect improvements beyond those which have already taken place. For my own part, I have always thought it desirable in every way, that the Bishops and Deans and Chapters should hold landed property. I have no doubt that if the whole of their landed property were sold and the money paid into the funds the Bishops and Deans and Chapters would have a more certain income for the time, but they would not have such a thorough dependence on the landed property of the country, nor so fixed a status, and I should be very sorry to see that change. That a body managing £200,000 of landed property may commit many mistakes is possible, and that they do not see the property very often is no doubt an inconvenience, but I believe that to be inseparable from any great scheme. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Malins) has himself said he was concerned in a case in which a private gentleman had not seen a particular portion of his property for twenty-five years, having estates, I presume, in various counties; but no one will argue that private gentlemen should not possess large estates. The hon. Gentleman said it was an inconvenience to be regretted. I say the same thing with regard to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that it is an inconvenience that they cannot visit each of their estates; but when a large scheme is proposed, if not for a final settlement, for a settlement of the general principles, I think the House should either assent to or dissent from the plan upon those general grounds.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, the noble Lord who had just addressed the House had put the measure in as fair a light as possible; he had shown the House what could be said in favour of the Bill, and he had also made admissions and held out expectations which might succeed in modifying some points of objection. At the same time he was sorry that a measure of so much importance should have been accidentally, and in consequence of an unexpected alteration in the proceedings of the House for the evening, brought forward while many hon. Members who were interested in the question were absent. The importance of this Bill was great, whether they considered the amount of property involved, or the mode in which they were called on to deal with it—that was to say, contrary to the wishes of the reputed owner and occupier—or to the manner in which the estates were in future to be managed. They were not dealing with the whole of the property that belonged to the Church, and he should not raise the question with respect to that portion of property disposed of by previous arrangements. The real point for consideration was whether they should proceed in the same course as they had already proceeded in with respect to the estates of the Bishops—whether they would act in the same way with reference to the estates of the capitular bodies? It was obvious, however, that Bishops and Chapters did not stand on the same footing. The Ecclesiastical Commission comprised several

Lord John Russell

Bishops, and they had a substantive voice in all the operations of that body; they enjoyed the opportunity of speaking their sentiments; but the House was called upon to deal with the estates of gentlemen who had never been consulted in the matter, and respecting whom he thought he might venture to say that their sole object, as it was declared to him when they waited upon the Government of the day, twelve months ago, was not to ask that Government to withdraw their hands, but merely to give them an opportunity of telling their own story. All that was asked, then, was that they might be put in communication with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. They said, “We have a story to tell, and we want an opportunity to tell it; hold the hands of Parliament till we have had that opportunity, which we promise we will not abuse.” From that time, however, the opportunity, not unfairly asked, had never been afforded to them. One of the main grounds of objection he had to this Bill was that it proposed to make use of the machinery of the Ecclesiastical Commission, not merely for the sale, but actually for the future management and possession of these estates. It could not be disputed that they proposed to take powers within a certain time to sell the estates belonging to the capitular bodies, and out of those estates, or the money received from them, to re-endow at a subsequent time the Chapters with a certain portion of landed property. There was a great deal of force in what the noble Lord said as to landed property. There were good reasons why Chapters and Bishops should be in possession of landed estates. There was a greater stability in the possession of land than of money in the funds, and he did not like the idea of a Bishop or a Chapter being reduced to the position of mere salaried stipendiaries of the State. If it were proposed to deal with the property of any private individual as was now proposed in regard to the property of the capitular bodies, a cry of confiscation would at once be raised. What was the distinction between a lessee who held under a capitular body, and one who held under the corporation of a municipality or college? Yet municipal or college property had never been treated in the manner proposed in the Bill. The manner in which the estates belonging to the Church were formerly managed was far preferable to the modern system. He believed the holding of land by such a body as the Ecclesiastical Commission to be much more objectionable than the holding of land in mortmain by Bishops or Chapters, impolitic as that mode of possession had always been regarded. Since the time of Queen Elizabeth, whenever ecclesiastical corporations had had occasion to let out their property they had done so on easy terms, and the lessee had practically fulfilled the duties attached to ownership. But if these estates were now let out at rack-rent, the total annual value would, of course, be required from the persons who held them. How was hospitality to be exercised, charity administered, and schools or other benevolent institutions maintained, unless the lessees held the estates on easy terms? His right hon. Friend (Sir George Lewis) would say, no doubt, that the Commission were not to exercise the rights of ownership permanently, but only in transitu, and that they would have to sell a portion of the property and re-endow either the Bishops or the caputular bodies with so much land. But that was the great defect of the Bill. It did not state definitely the manner in which the change was to be effected. The question of Bishops' property had been dealt with, but not in such a manner as to inspire great confidence for the future. There never arose a discussion with respect to the Ecclesiastical Commission without fault being found with the administration of the funds arising from the Bishops' estates. He had no doubt the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, of whom he entertained the highest opinion, would endeavour to avoid future mistakes; but Parliament was called upon to grant them, not only a prolongation of, but an addition to, their powers. That was the third time they had had the Bill under discussion. He was of opinion that the House would think that those who had something further to say upon the subject, as was his own case, should postpone further observation till they got into Committee. Perhaps his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Selwyn) would permit him to suggest that it would be well not to press for a division at that time, but reserve his objections for a future stage in Committee, when those who objected to particular clauses would have the opportunity of calling them in question. He should reserve any further remarks till the next stage, though he could not express his approval of the second reading of the Bill.

MR. SELWYN said, the House had been taken by surprise by the Bill being proceeded with that evening, and he felt that under the circumstances it would be useless to press the Amendment. He would therefore withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn; Main Question put and agreed to; Bill read 2^o and committed for Friday.

MINES REGULATION AND INSPECTION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 4 to 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (Mines to which Part 2 of Act is to extend. Interpretation of Terms).

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the object of the clause was to bring under inspection iron as well as coal mines. He proposed to move an Amendment, excluding all iron mines except those worked in connection with coal. There was no peculiar danger connected with the working of iron mines, and no case had been made out for their inspection. The loss of life, as compared with the number of tons of ironstone and rubbish taken out of the iron mines, was so small that he was satisfied these mines, when unconnected with the coal measures, did not require the special interference of the Government. In a mine with which he was connected there had been only one death to 498,000 tons of ore raised. There was this difference also, that accidents in coal mines occurring in consequence of want of ventilation involved the death of many persons, while accidents in mines not subject to explosion only endangered the life of the awkward or careless workman upon whom some mass of rubbish might fall. He should, therefore, move, instead of the words "or coal measures"—to substitute the words "associated with coal and worked in connection therewith."

MR. CLIVE said, the hon. Gentleman was, like many other persons—he thought inspection a very good thing when it was applied to all his neighbours, so that it did not touch himself. A system of inspection was imperatively required for those iron mines which were included in the clause. It was the unanimous opinion of the inspectors of coal mines that inspection ought to be applied to all iron mines. He had, however, yielded to the representations made to him that inspection was not wanted where the iron was not connected with coal measures, and the words of the clause

£200,000 of landed property may commit many mistakes is possible, and that they do not see the property very often is no doubt an inconvenience, but I believe that to be inseparable from any great scheme. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Malins) has himself said he was concerned in a case in which a private gentleman had not seen a particular portion of his property for twenty-five years, having estates, I presume, in various counties; but no one will argue that private gentlemen should not possess large estates. The hon. Gentleman said it was an inconvenience to be regretted. I say the same thing with regard to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, that it is an inconvenience that they cannot visit each of their estates; but when a large scheme is proposed, if not for a final settlement, for a settlement of the general principles, I think the House should either assent to or dissent from the plan upon those general grounds.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, the noble Lord who had just addressed the House had put the measure in as fair a light as possible; he had shown the House what could be said in favour of the Bill, and he had also made admissions and held out expectations which might succeed in modifying some points of objection. At the same time he was sorry that a measure of so much importance should have been accidentally, and in consequence of an unexpected alteration in the proceedings of the House for the evening, brought forward while many hon. Members who were interested in the question were absent. The importance of this Bill was great, whether they considered the amount of property involved, or the mode in which they were called on to deal with it—that was to say, contrary to the wishes of the reputed owner and occupier—or to the manner in which the estates were in future to be managed. They were not dealing with the whole of the property that belonged to the Church, and he should not raise the question with respect to that portion of property disposed of by previous arrangements. The real point for consideration was whether they should proceed in the same course as they had already proceeded in with respect to the estates of the Bishops—whether they would act in the same way with reference to the estates of the capitular bodies? It was obvious, however, that Bishops and Chapters did not stand on the same footing. The Ecclesiastical Commission comprised several

Lord John Russell

Bishops, and they had a substantive voice in all the operations of that body; they enjoyed the opportunity of speaking their sentiments; but the House was called upon to deal with the estates of gentlemen who had never been consulted in the matter, and respecting whom he thought he might venture to say that their sole object, as it was declared to him when they waited upon the Government of the day, twelve months ago, was not to ask that Government to withdraw their hands, but merely to give them an opportunity of telling their own story. All that was asked, then, was that they might be put in communication with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. They said, "We have a story to tell, and we want an opportunity to tell it; hold the hands of Parliament till we have had that opportunity, which we promise we will not abuse." From that time, however, the opportunity, not unfairly asked, had never been afforded to them. One of the main grounds of objection he had to this Bill was that it proposed to make use of the machinery of the Ecclesiastical Commission, not merely for the sale, but actually for the future management and possession of these estates. It could not be disputed that they proposed to take powers within a certain time to sell the estates belonging to the capitular bodies, and out of those estates, or the money received from them, to re-endow at a subsequent time the Chapters with a certain portion of landed property. There was a great deal of force in what the noble Lord said as to landed property. There were good reasons why Chapters and Bishops should be in possession of landed estates. There was a greater stability in the possession of land than of money in the funds, and he did not like the idea of a Bishop or a Chapter being reduced to the position of mere salaried stipendiaries of the State. If it were proposed to deal with the property of any private individual as was now proposed in regard to the property of the capitular bodies, a cry of confiscation would at once be raised. What was the distinction between a lessee who held under a capitular body, and one who held under the corporation of a municipality or college? Yet municipal or college property had never been treated in the manner proposed in the Bill. The manner in which the estates belonging to the Church were formerly managed was far preferable to the modern system. He believed the holding of land by such a

body as the Ecclesiastical Commission to be much more objectionable than the holding of land in mortmain by Bishops or Chapters, impolitic as that mode of possession had always been regarded. Since the time of Queen Elizabeth, whenever ecclesiastical corporations had had occasion to let out their property they had done so on easy terms, and the lessee had practically fulfilled the duties attached to ownership. But if these estates were now let out at rack-rent, the total annual value would, of course, be required from the persons who held them. How was hospitality to be exercised, charity administered, and schools or other benevolent institutions maintained, unless the lessees held the estates on easy terms? His right hon. Friend (Sir George Lewis) would say, no doubt, that the Commission were not to exercise the rights of ownership permanently, but only in transitu, and that they would have to sell a portion of the property and re-endow either the Bishops or the caputular bodies with so much land. But that was the great defect of the Bill. It did not state definitely the manner in which the change was to be effected. The question of Bishops' property had been dealt with, but not in such a manner as to inspire great confidence for the future. There never arose a discussion with respect to the Ecclesiastical Commission without fault being found with the administration of the funds arising from the Bishops' estates. He had no doubt the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, of whom he entertained the highest opinion, would endeavour to avoid future mistakes; but Parliament was called upon to grant them, not only a prolongation of, but an addition to, their powers. That was the third time they had had the Bill under discussion. He was of opinion that the House would think that those who had something further to say upon the subject, as was his own case, should postpone further observation till they got into Committee. Perhaps his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Selwyn) would permit him to suggest that it would be well not to press for a division at that time, but reserve his objections for a future stage in Committee, when those who objected to particular clauses would have the opportunity of calling them in question. He should reserve any further remarks till the next stage, though he could not express his approval of the second reading of the Bill.

MR. SELWYN said, the House had been taken by surprise by the Bill being proceeded with that evening, and he felt that under the circumstances it would be useless to press the Amendment. He would therefore withdraw it.

Amendment withdrawn; Main Question put and agreed to; Bill read 2^o and committed for Friday.

MINES REGULATION AND INSPECTION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 4 to 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (Mines to which Part 2 of Act is to extend. Interpretation of Terms).

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, the object of the clause was to bring under inspection iron as well as coal mines. He proposed to move an Amendment, excluding all iron mines except those worked in connection with coal. There was no peculiar danger connected with the working of iron mines, and no case had been made out for their inspection. The loss of life, as compared with the number of tons of ironstone and rubbish taken out of the iron mines, was so small that he was satisfied these mines, when unconnected with the coal measures, did not require the special interference of the Government. In a mine with which he was connected there had been only one death to 498,000 tons of ore raised. There was this difference also, that accidents in coal mines occurring in consequence of want of ventilation involved the death of many persons, while accidents in mines not subject to explosion only endangered the life of the awkward or careless workman upon whom some mass of rubbish might fall. He should, therefore, move, instead of the words "or coal measures"—to substitute the words "associated with coal and worked in connection therewith."

MR. CLIVE said, the hon. Gentleman was, like many other persons—he thought inspection a very good thing when it was applied to all his neighbours, so that it did not touch himself. A system of inspection was imperatively required for those iron mines which were included in the clause. It was the unanimous opinion of the inspectors of coal mines that inspection ought to be applied to all iron mines. He had, however, yielded to the representations made to him that inspection was not wanted where the iron was not connected with coal measures, and the words of the clause had been, in fact, suggested by the owners. The workmen in iron mines took great interest in the establishment of a system of inspection, in proof of which he might refer the hon. Gentleman to the Mining Journal, in which the inspection was warmly advocated on behalf of the miners. The inspectors of coal mines in many districts found the coal and iron so blended together that it was almost impossible to separate them in their inspection. He believed that the great majority both of owners and men were in favour of the Bill. The deaths in Great Britain from accidents in mines were 1 in 64,000. In Durham the deaths were only 1 in 114,000; in Scotland they were 1 in 95,000, while in South Wales they were 1 in 47,000. This greater proportion of deaths in South Wales showed that the accidents were more frequent where coal and iron were mixed together. He had now, he thought, shown the Committee why the Amendment ought not to be adopted.

MR. TAYLOR said, he wished to exclude those cases only in which iron was not worked in conjunction with coal, and he thought that not an unreasonable proposition.

MR. CAYLEY said, he thought the clause was exactly framed to meet the case suggested by the hon. Member (Mr. Taylor), and that there was no necessity for the insertion of the words proposed by him.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, it was true that the accidents in South Wales exceeded the average for the whole country, but they occurred for the most part in collieries where coal was simply worked for exportation.

Amendment negatived.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he would then move the omission of the following words from the clause descriptive of a class of works to which the Act should extend—

“And every shaft in the course of being sunk, and every level or inclined plane in the course of being driven for commencing or opening any such mine, and all the works belonging thereto respectively.”

MR. CLIVE opposed the Amendment, which was negatived without a division.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 8 (Power to Secretary of State to appoint Inspectors of Mines).

MR. AYRTON said, he would propose an Amendment to the effect that sub-inspectors should be appointed as well as inspectors, so as to provide for a more efficient inspection, which it was natural to suppose would be gained by the sub-inspectors performing the main portion of the duty under the superintendence of, and subject to the report of, the superior officer and inspector. He would move to insert the words “or sub-inspectors” after the word inspectors.

Mr. Clive

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought the scope of the clause was sufficiently extensive to enable the appointment of officers of different grades, which would compass the object the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ayrton) had in view.

MR. INGHAM said, he thought they should have some assurance from the Government that the inspection under the Bill would be of an efficient character. At present the number of pits which each inspector had to visit were so many that a considerable interval elapsed between his visits, and it was at those times generally that accidents took place. He did not want that the sub-inspectors should be men of great scientific attainments, but he considered that it would be an advantage to have a class of officers connected with the inspection with whom the pitmen could frankly and easily communicate.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the best course would be for the hon. Gentleman not then to press his Amendment, but to let it stand over until the bringing up of the Report.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 9.

Clause 10 (General Rules to be observed in Coal and Iron Mines).

MR. AYRTON said, he proposed in line 22 to add, after the word “places,” “and all other accessible places,” in order that the proprietors of mines might be compelled to ventilate places which were not being worked, but which became reservoirs of foul air in communication with the workings where men were employed.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 22, after the word ‘places,’ to insert the words ‘and all other accessible places where possible.’

MR. KER SEYMER suggested the addition of the words “if possible” to the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets.

MR. CLIVE said, that this was one of the most disputed portions of the Bill. He was bound to say that the Commissioners had recommended the Amendment, but he was told that there would be a difficulty in applying it in all instances. He had, therefore, thought it best to make the clause run as it did.

MR. AYRTON suggested, that it must surely be possible to stop off those places which were difficult to ventilate, and which if left open might admit gas in quantities large enough to endanger the miners.

MR. CAYLEY suggested, that the words "where possible" might get rid of the difficulty.

MR. AYRTON said, he would accept the suggestion.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, there were circumstances in which an attempt to ventilate might be dangerous, because the gas was only explosive when mixed with more than three times and less than fourteen times its own bulk.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 185; Noes 18: Majority 167

MR. AYRTON said, that accidents were frequently caused through the tramways in mines being too narrow. He would, therefore, propose as an Amendment on rule 8, that places of refuge should be provided at intervals of not less than ten yards, or that the drift or passage for the tramways should be made so wide as to allow room for men to pass the trucks, which ran down with great rapidity.

MR. H. H. VIVIAN said, he thought it undesirable to take the responsibility of avoiding accidents off the owners or workers of mines. Serious accidents had to be reported to the Secretary of State, and that of itself was a great safeguard. If the drifts were widened there would be greater danger of the fall of the roof—a most fruitful source of accident. He thought it desirable to have places of refuge, but not at shorter intervals than twenty yards. A wide drift without refuges would be highly dangerous.

MR. AYRTON said, he had no objection to twenty yards.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. AYRTON said, he next moved, that instead of the words "cover overhead," in rule 9, there should be inserted the words "covered safety cage." That was an ingenious mechanical contrivance for saving the lives of the workmen as they ascended or descended the pit. They had been adopted in several well-regulated mines, and he thought the others ought to be made to use them.

MR. H. H. VIVIAN said, he had found from repeated experiments that "safety cages" were a fertile source of danger. Every mechanical contrivance of this sort was likely to get out of order. He believed all cases of this kind to be impracticable, but, even if they were practicable, they would probably lead to a false security, arising from mistaken economy. Less attention would be paid to the due inspection of the state of the ropes. He thought to pass a law in favour of safety cages would lead to increased injury and loss of life. He must deprecate discussions on details of a practical character in the House of Commons.

LORD LOVAINE said, he also objected to the Amendment as impracticable.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he was astonished to hear it laid down by the hon. Member (Mr. Vivian), that the House of Commons was not a fit arena for the discussion of points affecting the lives of thousands of operatives. On the contrary, he maintained that it was the only place to which they could carry their appeal for protection, the House of Lords and the Courts of law alike having laid it down that a workman by the terms on which he entered into the service of his master deprived himself of his remedy at law for any accident which he might suffer while in that employment.

MR. H. H. VIVIAN said, he never said that. What he said was that that House was not the arena for discussing practical points of mining detail.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he must protest against the crude statement of the law which they had just heard from the hon. and learned Gentleman. It was true a man obtained no right of action against his master for an injury which he suffered from his fellow-workman, provided his master had exercised care and diligence in the selection of those in his employment; but, on the other hand, a master was undoubtedly liable for any accident arising from his negligence in not having provided proper ropes and machinery.

MR. CLIVE said, that the question of the safety cages had been very carefully considered, and he hoped the Committee would consent to adopt the use of the overhead cover.

MR. H. A. BRUCE hoped that the Committee would not force upon miners the adoption of this plan. The hon. Member for Glamorganshire and other hon. Members who had tried it were of opinion that in some cases, at least, it would not be suitable.

MR. BUTT said, he acquiesced in the view taken by his hon. Friend (Mr. James) of the law affecting the subject.

MR. AYRTON said, that "safety cages" had been adopted in a great number of mines, and he thought where the expense was comparatively trifling, they ought to be generally used. His hon. Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Mr. Craufurd) had, doubtless, in view, in the statement he had made, the Scotch law on the subject, for certainly it would surprise employers in England to be told that they were liable for damages to their workmen.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he would recall to the recollection of the hon. Member for Ayrshire a case tried on the Home Circuit, which was brought by a labourer against Sir Charles Fox for having an improper rope at the construction of one of the towers at the Crystal Palace. The case was reserved for the opinion of the Court of Exchequer, and the law was distinctly laid down that, inasmuch as the plaintiff was a labouring man, he had taken the risk of the work, and Sir Charles Fox was therefore not responsible.

MR. J. L. RICARDO said, he thought it was preposterous that the House of Commons should force on practical men the further trial of an experiment which they had found to be unsuccessful. The Inspectors and the Committee had given it as their opinion that no particular rule should be laid down in this case, but that it should be left to the mine-owners, who were responsible for those they employed, and were anxious for the safety of the men's lives to use the safest and best means for securing the safety of their workmen.

MR. KINNAIRD objected to the doctrine that the House was to have its decision in the matter fettered by the decision of a Committee.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he would advise his hon. Friend who had moved the Amendment to give way to the opinion of other Members with greater practical knowledge, and not attempt to enforce on all parts of the country a contrivance which might perhaps answer only in a certain district, lest the result should be to destroy life instead of saving it.

MR. AYRTON said, that the cage was in general use in the mines. ["No, no!"] He asked his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Home Department whether that was not the fact.

MR. CLIVE said, that those cages were in general use; but he recommended his hon. Friend not to press his Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Butt

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he wished to move in line 5 of the same rule, after the word "shaft" to insert the words "except upon occasions when repairs are being effected," the object of his Amendment being to dispense with the use of the cover over the cage when repairs were being effected in the shaft.

Amendment proposed, in line 5, after the word 'shaft,' to add the words 'except on occasions when repairs are being effected.'

MR. CLIVE said, it appeared to him that the use of the cover might be more necessary at the time during which the hon. Member proposed to dispense with it.

MR. H. H. VIVIAN said, he thought that its use was not necessary during repairs.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 47; Noes 127: Majority 80.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to move the insertion into the clause of an additional rule requiring a proper weighing machine or measuring apparatus to be placed at the bank of every mine, for the purpose of accurately testing the quantities of coal, ironstone, or other material brought to the surface. He understood that false weights and measures were sometimes used, to the detriment of the workmen, who were thereby deprived of the full amount of their earnings.

MR. H. A. BRUCE said, he saw no objection to the adoption of weighing machines, but he could not understand how measuring machines were to be used with respect to iron-stone. He had never heard of their application to such a purpose.

MR. AYRTON explained that his object was to secure to the workmen payment for all the ore or coal that was brought to bank.

MR. CAYLEY said, he hoped the claim would not be objected to by the Government. In the two Committees which had sat on the subject, no point was more insisted upon than the necessity of having weighing machines as between the workmen and the employers.

MR. H. H. VIVIAN said, he did not see any objection to that fair and just regulation, but he thought that words should be introduced by which the gauging of barges should be excepted.

MR. CLIVE said, he understood that the proposition was permissive, but he would suggest that it should be deferred until the Report. It could do no harm, but he believed it had been tried, and it had been found that the workmen did not avail themselves of it.

Mr. NEWDEGATE said, he thought it important that there should be a weighing machine easy of access.

Mr. KINNAIRD moved that the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress, to sit again on Tuesday next, at Twelve of the clock.

House adjourned at a Quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, June 26, 1860.

Movms.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Tithe Commutation; Inland Bonding.

2^d Ecclesiastical Commission.

3^d Church Temporalities (Ireland) Acts Amendment; Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland).

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, the object of the Bill of which he now moved the second reading was simply to give authority to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in making additional provision for the cure of souls, to give due consideration to the wants and circumstances of the places from which they derived revenues from any lands or hereditaments. The Ecclesiastical Commission Act of 1840 contained a provision similar to this as far as it went, inasmuch as it directed that due provision should be made for local wants out of the tithes arising in the respective localities; and a Select Committee of their Lordships' House had reported in favour of the principle of expending the Revenues received by the Commissioners in the places wherein they had been received, and of attending, as a first duty, to the spiritual wants of the people of such districts. The diocese of Durham, over which he had formerly presided, was very deeply interested in the decision of this question, and, no doubt, other dioceses and parishes in various parts of the country were similarly affected. He would, however, illustrate the peculiarities of the case from the circumstances affecting the diocese of Durham, and with which, therefore, he was personally acquainted. The condition of the diocese of Durham was this:—The average population in each benefice or parish in other counties was 1,398, while in the county of Durham the average population was 2,708. The average number of acres in the parishes of other dioceses was 3,277; the average number in the parishes of the diocese of Durham was 7,566. The increase in population in the county of Durham between 1841 and 1851 was 27 per cent; and the increase in Lancashire during the corresponding period was 22 per cent, and in Middlesex 20 per cent. In the five most populous places in the diocese of Durham — namely, Newcastle, Gateshead, Tynemouth, Shields, and Darlington — the population in each parish or district exceeded 7,000; while in Salford, Manchester, and Liverpool, it was in each parish or district not more than 5,400. With these facts before them he thought it was absolutely necessary that something should be done to remedy the great evils which existed in the diocese of Durham. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners were abstracting a large sum annually from that diocese — which they applied to the general purposes of the Commission; last year they received no less than £55,000 from it. The consequence was that in those parts of the diocese in which there was Church property, the people were just to that extent deprived of that relief which they would have received if that property had been continued in ecclesiastical hands. The present state of the law was such that it acted very unfavourably indeed against those parts of the kingdom in which there were local claims. This state of things being well ascertained, a large meeting was some time ago held in Newcastle, and a deputation appointed to wait on the Prime Minister. The result was extremely satisfactory. The answer of the noble Lord at the head of the Government was, "It is quite obvious and equitable that a preferential consideration should be given to local claims." To the principle of the Bill now before them their Lordships had already assented. A general Bill had been before Parliament since the 2nd of February in the present year. Five months had elapsed since that date, and it had only been read a second time in "another place" last night. The Bill which he now asked their Lordships to read a second time was, in fact, a supplemental measure, to provide a remedy for existing evils, in the event of the Bill now in the Lower House not being passed during the present Session. The promoters thought that those miners and other operatives who, by the sweat of their brow, increased the revenues of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, should have their spiritual wants provided for before the money passed into the Common Fund. It might be said that spiritual destitution prevailed in other parts of the country, and that the people in those places would suffer if this Bill passed; but as he still contended that those who provided the revenues had the first right to the benefit of them, and as the passing of the Bill in the other House was a matter of uncertainty, he asked their Lordships to accede to his Motion.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF CHICHESTER said, he felt himself compelled, though reluctantly, to oppose the Motion of the most rev. Prelate, who he knew had strong feelings as to the justice of this measure, but he should be wanting in his duty to the House if he did not frankly but shortly state the reasons which convinced him that the Bill now before the House ought not to be passed into law. The great difference between the Bill before the other House of Parliament and that now before their Lordships was, that the former was a general measure, by which powers were given to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to deal more largely and efficiently with Church property, in order to meet the spiritual wants of the whole country; whereas the object of the latter was only to give certain places a claim before all others for assistance from the common fund. He would not venture to say what would be the effect on this fund, but it was clear that to whatever extent certain districts had a preference given to them in the distribution of the funds, other districts which were excluded from that preference must suffer in proportion. Their claims, however urgent, would have to be postponed. The measure of the most rev. Prelate practically created a number of new charges upon the Common Fund without doing anything to increase the resources from which that fund was supplied. The larger measure contained similar clauses with respect to local claims, but then its other provisions would tend to increase the value of Church property, and so augment the means at the Commissioners' disposal. He could not approve of these special provisions in favour of local claims being separately enacted, as proposed by the Bill of the most rev. Prelate.

EARL GRANVILLE suggested that the Bill should be postponed until their Lordships saw reason to doubt whether the Bill would come up from the other House in time to pass during the present Session.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK would not object to the suggestion of the noble Earl, provided the present Bill had the precedence.

EARL GREY said, the subject was one which had been discussed on former occasions. Two Select Committees had sat; clauses such as were in the present Bill had passed their Lordships' House, and had only failed to pass the other House through want of time. For some time the diocese of Durham had been suffering grievously from the want of some measure of this kind, because while it remained in abeyance it interfered with the current of private benevolence. In order to prevent the evil from enduring for another year, the right rev. Prelate proposed that this Bill should be read a second time, so that if the larger measure now in the other House failed to come up to their Lordships they might proceed with this Bill. The noble Earl the President of the Council asked his right rev. Friend to postpone the Bill, which the right rev. Prelate was willing to do, upon the understanding that this Bill should be passed if the larger measure should fail. If the noble Earl would give an assurance that the Government would support this Bill in case the other did not come up to that House within a reasonable time, he would heartily concur in requesting the right rev. Prelate to postpone the second reading of this Bill.

LORD PORTMAN observed that this was a most important measure, and for the first time it was proposed to make it imperative upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to apply the funds exclusively within the districts in which they were raised. The measure before the other House was permissive in this respect. It was decided in 1840 that a Common Fund should be formed, and that the wants of the poorer dioceses should be supplied from the riches of the wealthier dioceses. He strongly objected to the imperative principle contained in this measure.

The Archbishop of York

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, as the noble Earl the President of the Council had failed to give any assurance in respect to the future treatment of this measure in the event of its being postponed, he (Lord Ravensworth) felt himself called upon to submit a few observations for their Lordships' consideration. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Chichester) represented the Ecclesiastical Commission there, and appeared to entertain objections to this important Bill, on the ground that it made it imperative upon the Ecclesiastical Commission to give a preference to local claims in certain parts of the kingdom. Now, all that the supporters of the present Bill desired was that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should no longer have the opportunity of making an apology or excuse for not attending to the wants of the local population. The principle of this Bill had been affirmed over and over again by both Houses, not simultaneously but on separate and respective occasions. The terms of the Bill which passed the House of Commons on the 6th April, 1840, were precisely in accordance with the provisions of the present measure. A clause provided that in each case the Commissioners should consider whether the funds raised within a particular diocese ought not to be applied in making exclusive provision for the spiritual wants of that diocese. He saw no reason for refusing to give this Bill a second reading. He did not object to the measure in the House of Commons, but it was one which dealt with a vast amount of property and with complicated interests, and it was doubtful whether it would pass in the present Session. No harm could be done by acceding to the present Bill until the fate of the measure in the other House was ascertained, and he hoped that by assenting to the second reading their Lordships would acknowledge the great principle, that those portions of the kingdom which contributed the largest share to the funds in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners should have the first claim in the distribution of those funds.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY understood that the Bill deprived the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of any discretion in this matter, and made it imperative on them to apply the funds derived from the dioceses of London and Durham in first supplying the wants of those districts. The effect of the measure thus would be that not a single sixpence derived from the sale of property in those two dioceses could be applied out of the Common Fund for the relief of destitute places in other parts of the country, at all events until every case of destitution in Durham and London had been first provided for.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, his object was that in a given place, where there was a large population who were earning for the Ecclesiastical Commissioners revenues which now went into the Common Fund, the population there should have their spiritual wants first provided for before the money went into the Common Fund.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that was a principle to which Parliament had repeatedly refused its assent, declaring that the Common Fund should be applicable to the whole country at large. Seeing that a measure on this subject was now before the other House, he thought it would be a work of supererogation to proceed with the present Bill; which he hoped, therefore, would not be pressed.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners received £50,000 a year out of the diocese of Durham, while at the same time he believed that in no county were there more small livings than in Durham or a larger population. The population had enormously increased there, and it seemed but reasonable that the surplus funds derived from the diocese should be applied in providing for the local clergy. The present Bill made it imperative to provide for local wants; and in a diocese like that of Durham, where the local destitution was so great, the population so large, and the livings so small in point of income, it was not unfair that a part at least of the funds derived from the diocese should be applied in relief of its necessities. It was said that in point of practice the Ecclesiastical Commissioners did take the local claims into consideration. But, he was sorry to say, that was not so in his own district. He knew of a case in which application for aid for a population of 5,000 had been made and refused. He should give all the support in his power to the Bill.

LORD REDESDALE said, that as connected by property with the diocese of Durham, he had been asked on a former occasion to give his support to this movement; but he felt incapable of doing so because the measure was a diocesan one, and one which he considered too extensive. But in the Bill before the House the measure was a parochial one, and did not assume so extensive a position. It was important that the question should be distinctly understood, and whether the claim was a parochial or a district claim. He thought there was a strong case in favour of a parochial claim; but beyond that he considered that the property of the Church was universal as regarded the whole kingdom, and he did not think that to property arising from one parish a neighbouring parish had any greater claim than a parish in any other part of the kingdom. The parish itself, however, had, in his opinion, a strong and distinct claim. As the Bill was drawn, the word "place" was inserted, and if by that were meant "diocese," he should object to it. If, on the other hand, the Bill was distinctly of a parochial character, and the demand was on the Commissioners for property in the parish itself, then he was prepared to support the Bill.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH drew attention to a discrepancy between Clauses 1 and 2. The first had reference to properties vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and forming part of their property, and was an extension of the principle that was sanctioned by Parliament with regard to tithes. It was also a reaffirmation of the principle laid down in their Lordships' Committee, and embodied in a Bill now in the other House. In Clause 2 there was a very important enlargement and extension, and the property was to be the surplus revenue belonging to ecclesiastical corporations. He thought that the House should be careful not to allow such a nice distinction to exist, for he conceived that by the present measure an endeavour might be made to treat the surplus revenues of ecclesiastical corporations as property not so much belonging to the Common Fund as to the Commissioners. He was afraid, too, that if the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were tied up in the manner proposed the purposes for which the Common Fund was established would be imperilled. Properties would be considered of a local and special character, and the great objects for which the Commission was instituted would be to some extent overlooked. But it was not his intention to oppose the second reading of the Bill, although he thought it would require mature consideration in Committee.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought the noble

Lord Redesdale

Duke had misapprehended the object and force of these two clauses. He should be as much indisposed as any of their Lordships to place any unnecessary restriction upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with the view of localizing the revenues arising from any particular diocese; but he did not think the Bill as it stood would have that effect. It only rendered it incumbent upon the Commissioners to give a fair and reasonable consideration to local claims. He hoped the Government would pledge themselves, in the event of the larger measure now before the other House being thrown out or unduly delayed, to take up the present Bill. If they agreed to do so, the second reading might be postponed. If not, he hoped the right rev. Prelate who had charge of the Bill would proceed to a division. If he did so, he should vote for it.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there was one great difference between the present Bill and that before the other House—namely, that while the latter was permissive this was imperative as to local claims. The main object of the Bill before the House of Commons was to augment the funds applicable to the whole of England, and he need not state that those funds must suffer if, as proposed by the present measure, favour were shown to particular districts. He was not prepared to give the pledge asked by the noble Earl opposite. The Bill before the other House having been read a second time, he had every reason to believe that it would pass successfully through the remaining stages, and eventually become law; but he did not see how Her Majesty's Government could make themselves answerable for carrying the Bill through the other House, or anticipate what might be the decision of that branch of the Legislature upon this or any Bill. Under these circumstances he trusted that their Lordships would not be forced to a division upon the second reading of the present Bill.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that it was desirable that there should be nothing to prejudice the discussion on the other Bill when it came up to their Lordships; and equally so that there should be no misunderstanding on the subject. As the noble Earl had alluded to the difference between this and the other Bill in respect that the one was permissive and the other imperative, in the recognition of local claims, he had to say that the right rev. Bench had been induced to promise their support to the Bill now before the House of Commons upon the distinct understanding that the permissive clause as to local claims should be made imperative. There was another point on which it was important there should be no misunderstanding. He agreed that, in the recognition of local claims, a diocesan division would be too extensive, but he did not think that a parochial division should be adopted. He was prepared to show that in many instances the Church possessed property in one parish, and there was great destitution in another parish in the same place, and he was of opinion that it was proper the destitute parish in the same place should receive due consideration before the funds were carried off to another part of the kingdom. There was some exaggeration as to local claims. It was not proposed to endow the parishes or places which had such claims largely. The utmost that would be done would be to give the clergyman the pittance of £300 a year. It would, therefore, be very unfortunate if it were supposed that the whole of the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission would be dried up because those persons were given £300 a year out of the funds possessed by the Church in their own locality. It was very likely that the Bill in the other House would come to an untimely end, and he should deeply regret if the discontent already raised by the neglect of local claims should grow stronger and stronger. He felt assured that nothing alienated the people so much from the administration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as knowing that they were drawing large revenues from Church property in populous districts in which great spiritual destitution existed, but from which the poor population of the locality was not permitted to derive any benefit. He could not see the difference between tithes and other property in this matter. Where there was large property, and where there was great spiritual destitution, the majority of thoughtful men would concur in the opinion that the Commissioners ought to provide moderately, not exorbitantly, for those localities before the funds were carried off to distant parts of the kingdom.

LORD BROUGHAM entirely agreed that nothing caused so much discontent as the withdrawing of funds which ought to provide for the spiritual instruction and necessities of the district for the use of other districts. He did not think that the provisions of the Bill before their Lordships were compulsory. The parties charged with these duties were not compellable to act—they were only compellable well to consider the question, and to give aid in those cases where urgent necessity could be made out. It was not so much legislative compulsion as legislative sanction and suggestive of such a proceeding. With regard to the Bill now in the other House, he did not share the confident expectation that because it had been read a second time without a division it would therefore pass through all its stages and reach their Lordships' House. He had known in history—he would not say in very ancient history, but in times within the period of legal memory, times since the reign of Richard I., he would not say in whose reign—of a measure of no small importance and of great interest to the community which was read a second time without a division, and by some accident never proceeded a step further. He had looked in their Lordships' Votes and could find no trace of it, and he saw that it somehow or other dropped altogether out of the Votes elsewhere. He could not help thinking that the same fate might attend this measure, and therefore they would do well to be prepared for that event.

LORD WENSLEYDALE objected to "place," as an ambiguous term. It might mean a whole district, or the whole country of Durham. The rule ought to be to apply the revenue to the spiritual destitution of the particular parish whence it was derived, and any departure from that rule ought to be mentioned by clear and definite words, such as "or in special cases to an adjoining parish."

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, it was very difficult to find a more definite word. If they used the word "parish" it might lead to great injustice, for a mine might be opened on the borders of one parish and the people working it might live in the neighbouring one. The word "place" had been adopted after much consideration.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to ask the most rev. Prelate to postpone the Committee on the Bill for a short time to see what progress was made with the Bill in the other House.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK had no objection to the postponement of the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly.

CHURCH TEMPORALITIES (IRELAND)
ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved the insertion of a clause to follow Clause 34, as giving to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Ireland power to restore to the parochial clergy of the Diocese of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh a certain portion of the tithe rent charge called the quarta pars episcopalis, and which now formed a portion of the income of the Commissioners. The clergy of every other part of Ireland were in full possession of their tithe rent charges, and it was but just to reinstate the principle in this portion of Ireland. The Bishops of Clonfert had always admitted the right of the clergy to be relieved from this reduction of their incomes under certain circumstances. It might, perhaps, be said that the clergy of Clonfert were not in want of this income so much as those in some other parts of Ireland, but he maintained that that was no good ground for the course that had been taken; and beyond this he was not asking their Lordships to decide that this portion of tithes should be restored, but only that the Commissioners should have power to restore it if they should think fit. His Bill was permissive only, not mandatory. He had heard it said that there was only one clergyman in the diocese whose income was under £200 a year; but this was not the fact; he himself was acquainted with a rector whose income did not exceed £100 a year. He urged upon their Lordships that nothing could be more unwise than to destroy the connection between the parochial tithes and the parochial clergy, and he trusted that the House would adopt the clause.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S reminded their Lordships that the object of this Bill was not to redistribute the revenues which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Ireland administered, or to enable them to deal with any portion of their funds in any new manner; its object being simply to improve the constitution of that Board and its form of procedure. He thought that even admitting for the sake of argument the facts stated by the noble Marquess, this circumstance furnished sufficient grounds for not adopting the clause, and he rested his opposition to it on that ground alone. The tithes of Ireland were originally divided into four parts, one part of which went to the rector and one part went to the Bishop. That division had long ceased; but that did not apply to the present case, because this payment had always formed part of the revenues of the successive Bishops of Clonfert.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY said, he felt bound to oppose the clause. These funds were given to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the general benefit of the Church. He hoped the noble Marquess would not press the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AND REGISTRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD moved the omission of the clauses of the Bill relating to Courts of appeal. He had supposed that this was purely an Irish Bill, and had no idea until now that these clauses formed part of it, nor did he think that their Lordships had any notion that such clauses were to be found in the measure. They would alter in a very important way the composition of the ultimate Court of appeal, respecting the doctrines of the Church of England. So important a change ought to have been distinctly notified when the Bill was brought in, and the attention of the House ought to have been called to it. The new proposal might be an improvement or an injury, but, at all events, it effected a considerable change in the present system. As these clauses were worded—and he did not object to propriety of the provision—the Archbishop from whose Court the appeal came could not sit in the Court of appeal. But the consequence would be that there would be a larger representation of the sister Establishment than of the Bishops of the English Establishment. He had another objection to the Bill. If matters of doctrine were now brought before this Court of appeal, the justification of such a proceeding was that the Court was not an ecclesiastical one, exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but simply heard these matters on appeal from the subject to the Sovereign in the last resort, and gave an interpretation of the existing law, which was the proper province of the highest Court of law in the kingdom. But it ought to be clearly understood that this was not an ecclesiastical court, because, if it were such a tribunal, its present constitution would be opposed to all the rules of the Church. At present the Court told its own tale. The three English Prelates who now sat there were experts called in to assist the law Lords in these matters, the law Lords deciding the legal points at issue. If, however, the Judicial Committee were reinforced on such occasions by other Prelates of the United Church, as this Bill proposed, there was a danger lest its decisions should be misunderstood, and lest men should suppose that they were called on to accept those decisions as binding on their consciences, instead of being merely an exposition and an interpretation of the law. For these reasons he thought more time should be given for the consideration of these clauses, and therefore moved their omission, in order that they might be made the matter of direct and substantive legislation.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN said, he must be allowed to express great surprise at the unusual course taken by the right rev. Prelate. Not only was this Bill brought in last year with the sanction of Lord Derby and his colleagues, but the right rev. Prelate on that occasion commented on the very clauses which he now wished should be expunged. The title of the Bill was then precisely the same as now; and these clauses, though not perhaps identical, had the same object in view. The Bill was read a second time on the 11th of June, it had been committed, and the Report had been received; and on each occasion some discussion had taken place upon it. The measure, therefore, had now been five weeks before their Lordships, and had been discussed on three or four occasions. It was a little too much, therefore, to say that due notice had not been given of its provisions; and the demand for further postponement on the 26th of June, when the Bill had to undergo the ordeal of passing through the House of Commons, was rather unreasonable. Then, the clauses which the right rev. Prelate wished to omit, formed the most important part of the Bill, without which it would be almost valueless. There were now four Courts of appeal in ecclesiastical matters—the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, sitting with the assistance of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishop of London, in cases which arose under the Church Discipline Act; the Judicial Committee sitting alone in other cases; their Lordships' House, which heard appeals from the Queen's Bench, in cases of mandamus, and the like; and lastly, the Court which this Bill purposed to supersede, the Court of Delegates in Ireland, the decisions of which were as final and as binding on the Church, as those of any one of the other tribunals. Now, it had always been deemed advisable that there should be one Court of appeal in all ecclesiastical matters, both for the Churches of England and Ireland, not to mention India and the Colonies, and that was the object of the clauses to which the right rev. Prelate objected. Why was there on his part this jealousy and distrust of his Irish brethren? No such feelings animated them. They enjoyed the same status as the English Bishops; and he could not at all understand why the right rev. Prelate felt such apprehension at the introduction of one or two Irish Bishops into the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Of course, the Bill did not interfere with the right of the Crown to make Privy Councillors. It only provided that every Archbishop and Bishop, being members of the Privy Council, should, ex-officio, be members of the Judicial Committee. He hoped their Lordships would not agree to this Amendment; because it would be to perpetuate a system, which the object of this Bill was to abolish. He had always believed that it was better to legislate so as to consolidate and cement together the two Churches of England and Ireland, instead of doing aught which might create a distinction between them.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, it was far from the intention of his right rev. Brother to draw any marked distinction between the two Churches; but the objections which he had put forward against those clauses had pressed a good deal upon the right rev. Bench. He (the Bishop of London) however, doubted whether it would be worth while to press the Amendment to a division.

LORD CRANWORTH said, this Bill in no way affected the doctrine or discipline of the Church of England. Appeals in all ecclesiastical matters under the Church Discipline Act were to the Privy Council, which was on those occasions increased by the presence of every Archbishop and Bishop, being members of the Church of England and Ireland, and also being Members of the Privy Council, and there would be no alteration made in that respect by this Bill. The only alteration proposed was this—that whereas appeals in matters ecclesiastical in Ireland were now made to an inconvenient tribunal—namely, to the Court of Delegates in Ireland, under this Bill they would be made to the Privy Council. Therefore, all that was proposed was to abolish the very inconvenient Court of Delegates in Dublin, and enable appeals in ecclesiastical matters in Ireland to be submitted to the Judicial Committee in England, which was the same tribunal to which appeals arising in the Church of England were carried, and thus the united Church of England and Ireland would have, as it ought to have, only one court of ultimate appeal, whereby the decisions in matters of doctrine in the two countries would be uniform. That was a matter which could not create alarm in the mind of any person, and he could not see why there should be any objection raised to this Bill.

THE EARL OF BANDON said, he trusted that the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) would not persevere with his Amendment. The course of legislation of late years had been of a character to consolidate together England and Ireland, and he would urge upon their Lordships now not to take a step which would make a distinction between the Churches; for why, he would ask, should the united Churches of England and Ireland be an exception to the general rule? He confessed he could not conceive why the right rev. Prelate should display a feeling of jealousy of the heads of the Church on the other side of the Channel. This Bill merely provided for the abolition of an inconvenient tribunal, and for the substitution of one of a more simple character. He could not resist making those observations in defence of a Church to which he was deeply attached, and expressing the opinion that this measure, if passed, would tend to the advantage of both branches of the united Church of England and Ireland.

Amendment negatived.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned, at a Quarter past
Eight o'clock, till To-morrow,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 26, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Heritable Securities, &c., (Scotland); Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Scotland); Local Government

Lord Cranworth

Act Amendment; Corrupt Practices at Elections; Militia.

2° Sale of Gas Act Amendment (No. 2.)

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 21 agreed to.

Clause 22 (Maintenance of Improvements.)

MR. BUTT said he wished to inquire of the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Deasy) whether it was intended that the annuity charge, created for improvements under the Bill, should take precedence of all previous incumbrances, for such he apprehended was at present the effect of the clause. He would move that the word "first" be omitted.

MR. DEASY said, that such was not the intention with which the clause was drawn. The object of the Government was to enable landowners to raise money for the improvement of their estates, and it would not be doing them a kindness to alarm the existing incumbrancers. By the omission of a single word, any apparent ambiguity might be removed.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he thought it would be necessary to give the annuity precedence, otherwise persons would not be willing to advance their money for making the improvements which might be desirable.

MR. GEORGE contended that the annuity ought to be a first charge on the land, and said he hoped the alteration proposed would not be made.

MR. DEASY said, it was originally intended to make this charge take precedence of all incumbrances, but after careful consideration it was apprehended that by so doing they might create alarm in the minds of those who had incumbrances already existing, and under these circumstances it was thought better not to give the annuity precedence.

LORD NAAS said, no person would lend his money in this way unless repayment were made a first charge on the estate.

MR. CARDWELL said, that after the expression of opinion which had been given, he thought it would be advisable to leave the clause as it stood, and accordingly the alteration proposed would not be insisted upon.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 23 and 24.

Clause 25 (Mode of obtaining the sanction of Court).

MR. GEORGE said, this was a very important part of the Bill, as it related to the leasing powers to be granted for improvements. He objected to the chairman of quarter sessions being appointed to make preliminary inquiries into the nature of such leases, as he thought it would be wise to let no machinery interpose between the limited owner and the tenant in the granting of leases except such as the Court of Chancery provided in the case of fraud and injury. He would, therefore, propose as an Amendment that in lieu of the leasing clauses in the Bill, there be inserted the clauses 1 to 31 inclusive, of the Leasing and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Bill, brought in by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) which stood next on the order of the day. Greater facilities for the granting of leases were bestowed by that Bill than by that which had been introduced by the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

Amendment proposed in page 8, line 14, to leave out from the word "restrictions," to the word "chairman," inclusive.

MR. DEASY defended the provisions of the Government Bill, as much simpler and more convenient than those of the Bill introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. With regard especially to the leasing of ecclesiastical property, the effect of the latter Bill would be to encumber the operation with so many checks and restrictions as to prevent its being of any advantage. There was also, in his Bill, a very objectionable laxity with regard to leases of mines. The difference between this kind of property and cultivable lands was that, by granting the lease of a mine for thirty or forty years, a person having only a life interest might really be making away with the whole valuable part of the inheritance, since the mine would be worked out by the tenant within that period. The interest of the remainder man should be considered, as well as those of the tenant and of the limited owner. It was, therefore, most essential in such cases to make the preliminary sanction of a competent tribunal necessary before granting the lease.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he thought it could hardly be expected that the Committee should be ready to compare in globo thirty-one sections of a rival Bill with those of the present Bill, so as to give a preference to one over the other. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman therefore appeared to him to be an unsatisfactory mode of proceeding. He thought that by a few careful Amendments the Bill might be made a most satisfactory measure. To whatever tribunal they gave the power of interfering with the making of leases, whether it was to the Quarter Sessions or the supreme courts, the effect would be to cause expense, while no additional security would be given against fraud. Under the Act of 1856, application was to be made to the Rolls Court for power to grant a lease of settled estates; but so vexatious were the delays and expenses thereby incurred, that only one lease had yet been granted, he (Mr. Longfield) being himself concerned in that case, which occupied many months, to the disgust of everybody. Therefore it would be far better to interpose no obstacles to the making of leases beyond requiring the best rent to be reserved, but leaving the demises when effectuated to any subsequent impeachment in a court of equity in case of fraud.

MR. GEORGE said, that in deference to the opinion of his learned Friends he would not insist on the first part of his Amendment, of which he had given notice—namely, to substitute for the leasing clauses the clauses in the Leasing and Improving of Lands Bill, and, therefore, with the permission of the Committee, he would withdraw that Amendment; but he proposed that they should leave out in clause 25, line 15, the words "and no improvement leases," the effect of which would be to prevent the preliminary inquiry on granting improvement leases proposed by the clause.

The first portion of the Amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

LORD FERMOY said, he was favourable to the preliminary investigation. He wished to see the leasing powers clogged with as few obstacles as possible, but he really thought that it would be a protection to the tenant that a cheap and easy investigation of the title should be first made. He would ask the Government whether they were now, at the eleventh hour, determined to adhere to their preliminary investigation before the chairman of the quarter sessions. With regard to leasing powers, he maintained that if every landlord in Ireland who had now the power to grant a lease would, instead of looking for English or Scotch, or Protestant tenants, grant leases to the poor, industrious, hard-working persons, who had been born and bred on the land, Ireland would be in a very different position from that which she occupied at present. The great fault of the landlords of Ireland was that they were too tenacious in keeping possession of the land. They seemed to think that the granting of a lease to a tenant would surrender their power over the land, and they therefore kept hold of half-cultivated, badly-tilled land, and by their ignorance—and he vowed to Heaven he thought they were the most ignorant class in Ireland—they kept their estates unimproved, the people discontented, and the country itself an opprobrium among nations. No matter what powers the Legislature might give, unless the landlords changed their policy, and had the sense to see their own interests, no leasing powers granted by Parliament would do any good.

LORD NAAS said, no man travelling through Ireland could tell from the appearance of the land what was held under lease and what was not. Leases had no effect one way or other in regard to general improvements. These depended on mutual confidence between landlord and tenant. He objected to any preliminary inquiry in cases of improvement leases taking place before the chairman of the quarter sessions; it would lead to expense and delay, and would give no security against litigation afterwards, and, besides, questions might arise that a chairman of quarter sessions was not competent to decide.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he must express his belief, in opposition to the noble Lord, that there would be nothing very difficult in the matters to be submitted to the chairman of sessions or assistant magistrates in giving their sanction to the lease.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he was in favour of retaining this portion of the clause, in order to give the tenant, as the strongest guarantee of the validity of his lease, the sanction of legal tribunal on which he might rely with as much certainty as on a Parliamentary title from the Incumbered Estates Court. On the other hand, the inquiry before the quarter sessions would be a security against trick and fraud in the preparation of leases. It would also be a cheap and effective tribunal, while an inquiry carried on in Dublin would be necessarily a prolonged and expensive one.

MR. LONGFIELD said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down seemed to mistake the nature of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the county of Wexford (Mr. George). The Amendment was not the difference between a cheap and costly tribunal, but the doing away with all tribunals.

Lord Fermoy

MR. CARDWELL said, he admitted that the Amendment was brought forward in a fair spirit. While it proposed to do away with the tribunal provided for in the Bill, it did not propose the establishment of any other description of tribunal. Now, something had been said of the delays and expenses attendant upon obtaining the sanction of the Master of the Rolls to a lease of settled estates under the Act of 1856, but that inconvenience arose from the number of assents to be procured from the various parties concerned, and there would be no such tedious formality in the leases now contemplated. General rules were to be framed for the guidance of the chairman of counties, and instead of any precise statutory provisions with regard to the terms on which these leases should be sanctioned, the system would be an elastic one, capable of being adapted to the circumstances of different parts of the country, or of the whole country at different times. It was the opinion of the Government that the intervention of the chairman of counties would provide a cheap, an accessible, and an expeditious local tribunal for this purpose, and he therefore trusted that the clause, as it stood, would receive the favourable consideration of the House.

MR. M'MAHON said, that the tenant would not feel secure under the Bill, but that his lease might be void because the prescribed stipulations were not complied with, or because the rent fixed by the lease was not the highest that could reasonably be got from the land. The value of land and of improvements was a matter which the chairman or assistant magistrate, as a barrister, could not well inquire into.

MR. BUTT said, he thought they ought not to give a limited owner of an estate power to execute an improvement lease without the sanction of the chairman of the county, but in the case of an ordinary agricultural lease for twenty-one years he thought such a sanction might fairly be dispensed with. In granting an improvement lease, the landowner accepted not the highest rent that could be got from the land, but a smaller rent in consideration of the improvements to be made by the tenant.

If the validity of the lease should be disputed on that ground, perhaps many years afterwards, when the reversion of the property fell in, it would be some protection to the tenant to have the sanction of the legal tribunal on record to justify the terms on which the lease was granted.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he was of opinion that there ought to be the protection afforded by the sanction of the chairman of the sessions, not for the sake of the tenant, but for the sake of the persons who would be bound by the leases, and for the sake of the successor. Looking at the clause in connection with the 28th section, by which those leases were made binding on the successor, he was inclined to give his support to it as it now stood, though he confessed that he had had considerable difficulty in arriving at a conclusion on the subject. But if the 28th section were omitted, he would not make it necessary for the tenant to go through this expensive process.

COLONEL DUNNE said, if hon. Gentlemen went on making speeches they would never get through the Bill. He thought the effect of the clause, as it stood, would be to prevent leases altogether. He should prefer to have the matter left to a competent tribunal, but as he did not think the Quarter Sessions Court would be a tribunal of that kind he would vote for the Amendment.

Question put, "That the words 'no improvement lease,' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—The Tellers being come to the Table, it was stated by Mr. Brand, one of the Tellers, that the Tellers were not agreed as to the number who voted with the Ayes:—Whereupon the Chairman directed the Committee to proceed to a second division:—The Committee accordingly again divided: Ayes 82; Noes 79: Majority 3.

MR. M'MAHON said, he would then move as an Amendment that the word "twenty" as applied to leases should be omitted, and the word "forty" inserted.

Amendment proposed, in line 23, to leave out the word "twenty," in order to insert the word "thirty."

—instead thereof.

LORD FERMOY said, he would suggest to the hon. Member to substitute thirty for forty years in his Motion. That was a term of lease which would give great satisfaction in Ireland.

MR. LEFROY said, he thought the term of twenty-one years should be adhered to.

That was the term usual in England and Scotland, and he thought the law should be as uniform as possible in all the three kingdoms.

LORD NAAS remarked that in the clause there was no precise definition with regard to the term for which building leases should be granted, and he thought it desirable that some accurate definition should be laid down in regard to that matter.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he concurred with the noble Lord opposite that it was very desirable that the term of building leases should be definite.

MR. DEASY said, he would take into consideration the suggestion of the noble Lord (Lord Naas) on the bringing up of the Report.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he hoped the hon. Member (Mr. M'Mahon) would adopt the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, and make the term thirty years.

MR. CARDWELL said, the present measure gave power to grant a forty-one years' lease in certain applications coming before the Court; but it merely retained the powers at present allowed the corporate, ecclesiastical, and other bodies, to grant, without the preliminary sanction of the Court, leases for twenty-one years.

Question put, "That the word 'twenty' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes 117; Noes 45: Majority 72.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 26. House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Friday, at Twelve of the clock.

COMMISSIONS OF PATENTS OFFICES. QUESTION.

MR. TITE said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any, and, if so, what progress has been made in erecting offices for the accommodation of the Commissioners of Patents, and of the collection of Books and Models relating to Inventions in their custody?

MR. COWPER said the Office of the Commissioners of Patents was at present very inconveniently placed—for it was situated in Southampton Buildings, while the Museum was at South Kensington. Inquiries had been instituted with a view of finding a new site, but no place had yet been found sufficiently adapted for the purpose. He hoped, however, that before long an arrangement would be effected which would be convenient to all parties.

SOLDIERS' KNAPSACKS.

QUESTION.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he has received any Report respecting the efficiency of the knapsack invented by Mr. Berington and Colonel Spiller; and also if the report is true that it is intended to provide the Volunteer Force with knapsacks, or to grant them a certain sum in lieu?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, the question of the superiority of the knapsacks had been referred, not to a Committee of Officers, but to a number of the men themselves, whose opinions, on the whole, were unfavourable to that invented by Mr. Berington, and favourable to that introduced by Colonel Spiller. The latter, therefore, was in use, and would continue to be so for three months—the usual time of trial. As regarded the Volunteers, power was given by the Act of Parliament, in case of invasion, to supply a knapsack and kit or two guineas to each; but he did not apprehend that it would be necessary to take any measure in that direction.

IRISH APPOINTMENTS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. CONOLLY said, that regarding as he did the opportunity of bringing forward accusations, whenever it became necessary, against any officer of the Crown, no matter how exalted his rank or dignity, as one of the most valuable privileges of a Member of that House, he would be careful that in calling attention, as a matter of serious duty, to the appointments made by the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, he would not allow a word derogatory to the private character of that illustrious individual to pass his lips. He should not follow the example set in the other House of reflecting on the personal qualities of a man whom Her Majesty had honoured by choosing him as the representative of the Crown in that portion of the country. But he would say this, that if his Motion were well grounded—if the accusations which he had to bring against that distinguished individual were founded in fact, and the policy of the Government in Ireland were such as to make him indignantly reclaim against it, then it was high time that that nobleman should be recalled from the office of Lord Lieutenant which he was not fit to hold. Hon. Gentlemen might say these were bold words, but he had great provocation. He was not now speaking of the appointment of Mr. Acheson Lyle to be Lord Lieutenant of the county of Derry, but he must say that a grosser and more desperate insult had never been offered to the inhabitants of a free country. No man who held the commission of the peace in England could suffer such an insult without reclaiming against it. Why should they be less esteemed in Ireland than in England, and have burdens placed on their shoulders too heavy for them to bear? There were burdens placed on the minds of men that were much heavier than any that were placed on their bodies. When a great and leading county, which had played no undistinguished part in the history of Ireland, was subjected to this gross and studied insult by the representative of the Sovereign, every one who had the good of the country at heart felt the insult and indignantly resented it. He had a right to feel warmly on this subject, because his ancestors had once held that valued post which was now dragged in the mire. He said it was studiously dragged in the mire. Whether intentionally or not, it seemed to be the sad office of a Whig Government to lower these appointments from time to time. The office was formerly given to a man below the rank of all who had held it before him, he meant the late Sir Robert Ferguson. ["Oh!"] He was, no doubt, an excellent man, in all the relations of life unimpeachable. Yet he took it upon himself to say that he was not of the rank of those who ought to hold that office. It seemed, by a strange fatality, that everything a Whig Government and a Whig Lord Lieutenant could do was done to irritate and dishonour that free and faithful county. He saw an hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench (Mr. Bagwell) laughing. How did he know that the turn of his own county might not come next? He seemed to rejoice at this slight being cast on the county of Derry; let him see to it that the same odious game was not attempted to be played on the banks of the Suir. Sure he was that there were noble spirits in Tipperary who would not sit down patiently under such an insult. Well, he would now open his case; and first, with regard to this notorious case of Mr. Acheson Lyle. He could state of his own knowledge that whether the absolute estate of Mr. Acheson Lyle in the county of Derry was £1,600 or £1,800 a year, he was not of that order of men from whom Lords Lieutenant were ten. He believed that the system of appointments was calculated to perpetuate in Ireland grievous evils; it was a system which had formerly been the cause of much suffering, and which he hoped had been abandoned for ever—the system of dividing the north against the south—of leading on the Protestants against the Roman Catholics, and dividing them, so that English ascendancy might trample on both. It was not to be tolerated that abuses of the description to which he was then directing the attention of the House should be revived in Ireland merely for the purpose of bolstering up a decaying faction. The real object of these practices was to ensure the return of Whig candidates at Parliamentary elections in Ireland. He was not specially alluding to the amount of property held by Mr. Lyle. That was not the point he wished to make. But he contended that Mr. Lyle was not of that class from which the Lord Lieutenant of a high spirited county like Londonderry ought to be chosen. He was the chief taxing officer in the Court of Chancery. He had obtained that office through the favour of the present Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who had ever since taken care that his nest should be well feathered. He had got for himself an appointment worth £2,500 a year, another for his son worth £800 a year, and another for his son-in-law which brought in £1,000 a year. And was it fitting that that well-salaried gentleman should be placed at the head of the unpaid magistracy of a loyal and distinguished county? The very moment he had been raised to that high position, he had gone down to Londonderry and recorded his vote—which he had not dared to do before—for Mr. Greer, who had been reprobated by every independent and respectable person in the county. He and his son and his son-in-law, the three stipendiaries of the Government, had voted for Mr. Greer, for whom his fellow-citizens had shown such an estimation that he was not likely to stand again on the hustings. For Mr. Lyle, personally, he entertained a feeling of the most incomplete respect—[Laughter.]—he begged pardon—it was a mere slip of the tongue—he had meant to say that he held that gentleman in considerable estimation as one who was most competent to fill the office of Master in Chancery, and who was most zealous in his attention to business. There was, however, in his opinion, a wide chasm between sitting behind a high stool in Dublin for the purpose of taxing bills in Chancery and occupying the position of Lord Lieutenant of a county such as Londonderry, with the power of selecting militia officers, and other important functions. That the position was one which could hardly be very agreeable to Mr. Lyle himself was proved by the fact that when he had gone down to Londonderry, burst forth with his new plumes fresh upon him, and had announced himself in the room in which the grand jury of the county was assembled as the recently appointed Lord Lieutenant, the intelligence was received in perfect silence, no member of the grand jury having risen from his seat. Now, a more unfortunate position for a gentleman to be placed in he could scarcely conceive, although he must say that that of Lord Carlisle was pitiable in the extreme. It was, he thought, quite evident, from what he had already stated, that it was exceedingly impolitic, as well as unjust, for a Whig Government to adopt the pettifogging system of appointing to high office men professing their own political creed simply because they happened to have the power. The feeling of the people of Londonderry was, at all events, opposed to such a system, and Mr. Lyle was looked upon there as the single black sheep in the whole flock. He and Mr. Greer had coupled themselves together, and the result was that when they took one side of the street every honest man bent his steps along the other. The man by whom such an appointment had been made was, then, he should contend, not deserving of the name of a statesman, and Lord Carlisle, whatever he might say about his probity and integrity, had, in making that appointment, done more harm than by all the folly he had ever talked in the course of his life. Having said thus much of the case of Mr. Lyle, he should pass to that of another Lord Lieutenant of a county, who with consequences more calamitous still, had been chosen as the object of Lord Carlisle's favour; he alluded to Mr. Tension, a gentleman well known in that House, who had lately been transferred from the Lord Lieutenancy of the county of Leitrim to that of Roscommon. Now in the latter instance, as in the former, fitness had not been regarded as the prime qualification for office—a line of policy which, if it continued to be acted upon, must prove to be eminently prejudicial to the public service. The first extraordinary piece of intelligence with respect to

and one which he considered too extensive. But in the Bill before the House the measure was a parochial one, and did not assume so extensive a position. It was important that the question should be distinctly understood, and whether the claim was a parochial or a district claim. He thought there was a strong case in favour of a parochial claim; but beyond that he considered that the property of the Church was universal as regarded the whole kingdom, and he did not think that to property arising from one parish a neighbouring parish had any greater claim than a parish in any other part of the kingdom. The parish itself, however, had, in his opinion, a strong and distinct claim. As the Bill was drawn, the word "place" was inserted, and if by that were meant "diocese," he should object to it. If, on the other hand, the Bill was distinctly of a parochial character, and the demand was on the Commissioners for property in the parish itself, then he was prepared to support the Bill.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH drew attention to a discrepancy between Clauses 1 and 2. The first had reference to properties vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners and forming part of their property, and was an extension of the principle that was sanctioned by Parliament with regard to tithes. It was also a reaffirmation of the principle laid down in their Lordships' Committee, and embodied in a Bill now in the other House. In Clause 2 there was a very important enlargement and extension, and the property was to be the surplus revenue belonging to ecclesiastical corporations. He thought that the House should be careful not to allow such a nice distinction to exist, for he conceived that by the present measure an endeavour might be made to treat the surplus revenues of ecclesiastical corporations as property not so much belonging to the Common Fund as to the Commissioners. He was afraid, too, that if the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were tied up in the manner proposed the purposes for which the Common Fund was established would be imperilled. Properties would be considered of a local and special character, and the great objects for which the Commission was instituted would be to some extent overlooked. But it was not his intention to oppose the second reading of the Bill, although he thought it would require mature consideration in Committee.

THE EARL OF DERBY thought the noble

Lord Redesdale

Duke had misapprehended the object and force of these two clauses. He should be as much indisposed as any of their Lordships to place any unnecessary restriction upon the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with the view of localizing the revenues arising from any particular diocese; but he did not think the Bill as it stood would have that effect. It only rendered it incumbent upon the Commissioners to give a fair and reasonable consideration to local claims. He hoped the Government would pledge themselves, in the event of the larger measure now before the other House being thrown out or unduly delayed, to take up the present Bill. If they agreed to do so, the second reading might be postponed. If not, he hoped the right rev. Prelate who had charge of the Bill would proceed to a division. If he did so, he should vote for it.

EARL GRANVILLE said, there was one great difference between the present Bill and that before the other House—namely, that while the latter was permissive this was imperative as to local claims. The main object of the Bill before the House of Commons was to augment the funds applicable to the whole of England, and he need not state that those funds must suffer if, as proposed by the present measure, favour were shown to particular districts. He was not prepared to give the pledge asked by the noble Earl opposite. The Bill before the other House having been read a second time, he had every reason to believe that it would pass successfully through the remaining stages, and eventually become law; but he did not see how Her Majesty's Government could make themselves answerable for carrying the Bill through the other House, or anticipate what might be the decision of that branch of the Legislature upon this or any Bill. Under these circumstances he trusted that their Lordships would not be forced to a division upon the second reading of the present Bill.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that it was desirable that there should be nothing to prejudice the discussion on the other Bill when it came up to their Lordships; and equally so that there should be no misunderstanding on the subject. As the noble Earl had alluded to the difference between this and the other Bill in respect that the one was permissive and the other imperative, in the recognition of local claims, he had to say that the right rev. Bench had been induced to promise their support to the Bill now before the House of Commons upon the distinct understanding that the permissive clause as to local claims should be made imperative. There was another point on which it was important there should be no misunderstanding. He agreed that, in the recognition of local claims, a diocesan division would be too extensive, but he did not think that a parochial division should be adopted. He was prepared to show that in many instances the Church possessed property in one parish, and there was great destitution in another parish in the same place, and he was of opinion that it was proper the destitute parish in the same place should receive due consideration before the funds were carried off to another part of the kingdom. There was some exaggeration as to local claims. It was not proposed to endow the parishes or places which had such claims largely. The utmost that would be done would be to give the clergyman the pittance of £300 a year. It would, therefore, be very unfortunate if it were supposed that the whole of the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission would be dried up because those persons were given £300 a year out of the funds possessed by the Church in their own locality. It was very likely that the Bill in the other House would come to an untimely end, and he should deeply regret if the discontent already raised by the neglect of local claims should grow stronger and stronger. He felt assured that nothing alienated the people so much from the administration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners as knowing that they were drawing large revenues from Church property in populous districts in which great spiritual destitution existed, but from which the poor population of the locality was not permitted to derive any benefit. He could not see the difference between tithes and other property in this matter. Where there was large property, and where there was great spiritual destitution, the majority of thoughtful men would concur in the opinion that the Commissioners ought to provide moderately, not exorbitantly, for those localities before the funds were carried off to distant parts of the kingdom.

LORD BROUGHAM entirely agreed that nothing caused so much discontent as the withdrawing of funds which ought to provide for the spiritual instruction and necessities of the district for the use of other districts. He did not think that the provisions of the Bill before their Lordships were compulsory. The parties charged with these duties were not compellable to act—they were only compellable well to consider the question, and to give aid in those cases where urgent necessity could be made out. It was not so much legislative compulsion as legislative sanction and suggestive of such a proceeding. With regard to the Bill now in the other House, he did not share the confident expectation that because it had been read a second time without a division it would therefore pass through all its stages and reach their Lordships' House. He had known in history—he would not say in very ancient history, but in times within the period of legal memory, times since the reign of Richard I., he would not say in whose reign—of a measure of no small importance and of great interest to the community which was read a second time without a division, and by some accident never proceeded a step further. He had looked in their Lordships' Votes and could find no trace of it, and he saw that it somehow or other dropped altogether out of the Votes elsewhere. He could not help thinking that the same fate might attend this measure, and therefore they would do well to be prepared for that event.

LORD WENSLEYDALE objected to "place," as an ambiguous term. It might mean a whole district, or the whole country of Durham. The rule ought to be to apply the revenue to the spiritual destitution of the particular parish whence it was derived, and any departure from that rule ought to be mentioned by clear and definite words, such as "or in special cases to an adjoining parish."

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK said, it was very difficult to find a more definite word. If they used the word "parish" it might lead to great injustice, for a mine might be opened on the borders of one parish and the people working it might live in the neighbouring one. The word "place" had been adopted after much consideration.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to ask the most rev. Prelate to postpone the Committee on the Bill for a short time to see what progress was made with the Bill in the other House.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK had no objection to the postponement of the Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^d accordingly.

CHURCH TEMPORALITIES (IRELAND)
ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE moved the insertion of a clause to follow Clause 34, as giving to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Ireland power to restore to the parochial clergy of the Diocese of Clonfert and Kilmacduagh a certain portion of the tithe rent charge called the quarta pars episcopalis, and which now formed a portion of the income of the Commissioners. The clergy of every other part of Ireland were in full possession of their tithe rent charges, and it was but just to reinstate the principle in this portion of Ireland. The Bishops of Clonfert had always admitted the right of the clergy to be relieved from this reduction of their incomes under certain circumstances. It might, perhaps, be said that the clergy of Clonfert were not in want of this income so much as those in some other parts of Ireland, but he maintained that that was no good ground for the course that had been taken; and beyond this he was not asking their Lordships to decide that this portion of tithes should be restored, but only that the Commissioners should have power to restore it if they should think fit. His Bill was permissive only, not mandatory. He had heard it said that there was only one clergyman in the diocese whose income was under £200 a year; but this was not the fact; he himself was acquainted with a rector whose income did not exceed £100 a year. He urged upon their Lordships that nothing could be more unwise than to destroy the connection between the parochial tithes and the parochial clergy, and he trusted that the House would adopt the clause.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMANs reminded their Lordships that the object of this Bill was not to redistribute the revenues which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in Ireland administered, or to enable them to deal with any portion of their funds in any new manner; its object being simply to improve the constitution of that Board and its form of procedure. He thought that even admitting for the sake of argument the facts stated by the noble Marquess, this circumstance furnished sufficient grounds for not adopting the clause, and he rested his opposition to it on that ground alone. The tithes of Ireland were originally divided into four parts, one part of which went to the rector and one part went to the Bishop. That division had long ceased; but that did not apply to the present case, because this payment had always formed part of the revenues of the successive Bishops of Clonfert.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY said, he felt bound to oppose the clause. These funds were given to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for the general benefit of the Church. He hoped the noble Marquess would not press the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS AND REGIS-TRIES (IRELAND) BILL.

THIRD READING. BILL PASSED.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD moved the omission of the clauses of the Bill relating to Courts of appeal. He had supposed that this was purely an Irish Bill, and had no idea until now that these clauses formed part of it, nor did he think that their Lordships had any notion that such clauses were to be found in the measure. They would alter in a very important way the composition of the ultimate Court of appeal, respecting the doctrines of the Church of England. So important a change ought to have been distinctly notified when the Bill was brought in, and the attention of the House ought to have been called to it. The new proposal might be an improvement or an injury, but, at all events, it effected a considerable change in the present system. As these clauses were worded—and he did not object to propriety of the provision—the Archbishop from whose Court the appeal came could not sit in the Court of appeal. But the consequence would be that there would be a larger representation of the sister Establishment than of the Bishops of the English Establishment. He had another objection to the Bill. If matters of doctrine were now brought before this Court of appeal, the justification of such a proceeding was that the Court was not an ecclesiastical one, exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction, but simply heard these matters on appeal from the subject to the Sovereign in the last resort, and gave an interpretation of the existing law, which was the proper province of the highest Court of law in the kingdom. But it ought to be clearly understood that this was not an ecclesiastical court, because, if it were such a tribunal, its present constitution would be opposed to all the rules of the Church. At present the Court told its own tale. The three English Prelates who now sat there were experts called in to assist the law Lords in these matters, the law Lords deciding the legal points at issue. If, however, the Judicial Committee were reinforced on such occasions by other Prelates of the United Church, as this Bill proposed, there was a danger lest its decisions should be misunderstood, and lest men should suppose that they were called on to accept those decisions as binding on their consciences, instead of being merely an exposition and an interpretation of the law. For these reasons he thought more time should be given for the consideration of these clauses, and therefore moved their omission, in order that they might be made the matter of direct and substantive legislation.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, he must be allowed to express great surprise at the unusual course taken by the right rev. Prelate. Not only was this Bill brought in last year with the sanction of Lord Derby and his colleagues, but the right rev. Prelate on that occasion commented on the very clauses which he now wished should be expunged. The title of the Bill was then precisely the same as now; and these clauses, though not perhaps identical, had the same object in view. The Bill was read a second time on the 11th of June, it had been committed, and the Report had been received; and on each occasion some discussion had taken place upon it. The measure, therefore, had now been five weeks before their Lordships, and had been discussed on three or four occasions. It was a little too much, therefore, to say that due notice had not been given of its provisions; and the demand for further postponement on the 26th of June, when the Bill had to undergo the ordeal of passing through the House of Commons, was rather unreasonable. Then, the clauses which the right rev. Prelate wished to omit, formed the most important part of the Bill, without which it would be almost valueless. There were now four Courts of appeal in ecclesiastical matters—the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, sitting with the assistance of the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishop of London, in cases which arose under the Church Discipline Act; the Judicial Committee sitting alone in other cases; their Lordships' House, which heard appeals from the Queen's Bench, in cases of mandamus, and the like; and lastly, the Court which this Bill purposed to supersede, the Court of Delegates in Ireland, the decisions of which were as final and as binding on the Church, as those of any one of the other tribunals. Now, it had always been deemed advisable that there should be one Court of appeal in all ecclesiastical matters, both for the Churches of England and Ireland, not to mention India and the Colonies, and that was the object of the clauses to which the right rev. Prelate objected. Why was there on his part this jealousy and distrust of his Irish brethren? No such feelings animated them. They enjoyed the same status as the English Bishops; and he could not at all understand why the right rev. Prelate felt such apprehension at the introduction of one or two Irish Bishops into the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Of course, the Bill did not interfere with the right of the Crown to make Privy Councillors. It only provided that every Archbishop and Bishop, being members of the Privy Council, should, ex-officio, be members of the Judicial Committee. He hoped their Lordships would not agree to this Amendment; because it would be to perpetuate a system, which the object of this Bill was to abolish. He had always believed that it was better to legislate so as to consolidate and cement together the two Churches of England and Ireland, instead of doing aught which might create a distinction between them.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, it was far from the intention of his right rev. Brother to draw any marked distinction between the two Churches; but the objections which he had put forward against those clauses had pressed a good deal upon the right rev. Bench. He (the Bishop of London) however, doubted whether it would be worth while to press the Amendment to a division.

LORD CRANWORTH said, this Bill in no way affected the doctrine or discipline of the Church of England. Appeals in all ecclesiastical matters under the Church Discipline Act were to the Privy Council, which was on those occasions increased by the presence of every Archbishop and Bishop, being members of the Church of England and Ireland, and also being Members of the Privy Council, and there would be no alteration made in that respect by this Bill. The only alteration proposed was this—that whereas appeals in matters ecclesiastical in Ireland were now made to an inconvenient tribunal—namely, to the Court of Delegates in Ireland, under this Bill they would be made to the Privy Council. Therefore, all that was proposed was to abolish the very inconvenient Court of Delegates in Dublin, and enable appeals in ecclesiastical matters in Ireland to be submitted to the Judicial Committee in England, which was the same tribunal to which appeals arising in the Church of England were carried, and thus the united Church of England and Ireland would have, as it ought to have, only one court of ultimate appeal, whereby the decisions in matters of doctrine in the two countries would be uniform. That was a matter which could not create alarm in the mind of any person, and he could not see why there should be any objection raised to this Bill.

THE EARL OF BANDON said, he trusted that the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) would not persevere with his Amendment. The course of legislation of late years had been of a character to consolidate together England and Ireland, and he would urge upon their Lordships now not to take a step which would make a distinction between the Churches; for why, he would ask, should the united Churches of England and Ireland be an exception to the general rule? He confessed he could not conceive why the right rev. Prelate should display a feeling of jealousy of the heads of the Church on the other side of the Channel. This Bill merely provided for the abolition of an inconvenient tribunal, and for the substitution of one of a more simple character. He could not resist making those observations in defence of a Church to which he was deeply attached, and expressing the opinion that this measure, if passed, would tend to the advantage of both branches of the united Church of England and Ireland.

Amendment negatived.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

House adjourned, at a Quarter past
Eight o'clock, till To-morrow,
half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, June 26, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Heritable Securities, &c., (Scotland); Refreshment Houses and Wine Licences (Scotland); Local Government

Lord Cranworth

Act Amendment; Corrupt Practices at Elections; Militia.

2^o Sale of Gas Act Amendment (No. 2.)

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 21 agreed to.

Clause 22 (Maintenance of Improvements.)

MR. BUTT said he wished to inquire of the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Deasy) whether it was intended that the annuity charge, created for improvements under the Bill, should take precedence of all previous incumbrances, for such he apprehended was at present the effect of the clause. He would move that the word "first" be omitted.

MR. DEASY said, that such was not the intention with which the clause was drawn. The object of the Government was to enable landowners to raise money for the improvement of their estates, and it would not be doing them a kindness to alarm the existing incumbrancers. By the omission of a single word, any apparent ambiguity might be removed.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he thought it would be necessary to give the annuity precedence, otherwise persons would not be willing to advance their money for making the improvements which might be desirable.

MR. GEORGE contended that the annuity ought to be a first charge on the land, and said he hoped the alteration proposed would not be made.

MR. DEASY said, it was originally intended to make this charge take precedence of all incumbrances, but after careful consideration it was apprehended that by so doing they might create alarm in the minds of those who had incumbrances already existing, and under these circumstances it was thought better not to give the annuity precedence.

LORD NAAS said, no person would lend his money in this way unless repayment were made a first charge on the estate.

MR. CARDWELL said, that after the expression of opinion which had been given, he thought it would be advisable to leave the clause as it stood, and accordingly the alteration proposed would not be insisted upon.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 23 and 24.

Clause 25 (Mode of obtaining the sanction of Court).

MR. GEORGE said, this was a very important part of the Bill, as it related to the leasing powers to be granted for improvements. He objected to the chairman of quarter sessions being appointed to make preliminary inquiries into the nature of such leases, as he thought it would be wise to let no machinery interpose between the limited owner and the tenant in the granting of leases except such as the Court of Chancery provided in the case of fraud and injury. He would, therefore, propose as an Amendment that in lieu of the leasing clauses in the Bill, there be inserted the clauses 1 to 31 inclusive, of the Leasing and Improvement of Lands (Ireland) Bill, brought in by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) which stood next on the order of the day. Greater facilities for the granting of leases were bestowed by that Bill than by that which had been introduced by the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

Amendment proposed in page 8, line 14, to leave out from the word "restrictions," to the word "chairman," inclusive.

MR. DEASY defended the provisions of the Government Bill, as much simpler and more convenient than those of the Bill introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. With regard especially to the leasing of ecclesiastical property, the effect of the latter Bill would be to encumber the operation with so many checks and restrictions as to prevent its being of any advantage. There was also, in his Bill, a very objectionable laxity with regard to leases of mines. The difference between this kind of property and cultivable lands was that, by granting the lease of a mine for thirty or forty years, a person having only a life interest might really be making away with the whole valuable part of the inheritance, since the mine would be worked out by the tenant within that period. The interest of the remainder man should be considered, as well as those of the tenant and of the limited owner. It was, therefore, most essential in such cases to make the preliminary sanction of a competent tribunal necessary before granting the lease.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he thought it could hardly be expected that the Committee should be ready to compare in globo thirty-one sections of a rival Bill with those of the present Bill, so as to give a preference to one over the other. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman therefore appeared to him to be an unsatisfactory mode of proceeding. He thought that by a few careful Amendments the Bill might be made a most satisfactory measure. To whatever tribunal they gave the power of interfering with the making of leases, whether it was to the Quarter Sessions or the supreme courts, the effect would be to cause expense, while no additional security would be given against fraud. Under the Act of 1856, application was to be made to the Rolls Court for power to grant a lease of settled estates; but so vexatious were the delays and expenses thereby incurred, that only one lease had yet been granted, he (Mr. Longfield) being himself concerned in that case, which occupied many months, to the disgust of everybody. Therefore it would be far better to interpose no obstacles to the making of leases beyond requiring the best rent to be reserved, but leaving the demises when effectuated to any subsequent impeachment in a court of equity in case of fraud.

MR. GEORGE said, that in deference to the opinion of his learned Friends he would not insist on the first part of his Amendment, of which he had given notice—namely, to substitute for the leasing clauses the clauses in the Leasing and Improving of Lands Bill, and, therefore, with the permission of the Committee, he would withdraw that Amendment; but he proposed that they should leave out in clause 25, line 15, the words "and no improvement leases," the effect of which would be to prevent the preliminary inquiry on granting improvement leases proposed by the clause.

The first portion of the Amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

LORD FERMOY said, he was favourable to the preliminary investigation. He wished to see the leasing powers clogged with as few obstacles as possible, but he really thought that it would be a protection to the tenant that a cheap and easy investigation of the title should be first made. He would ask the Government whether they were now, at the eleventh hour, determined to adhere to their preliminary investigation before the chairman of the quarter sessions. With regard to leasing powers, he maintained that if every landlord in Ireland who had now the power to grant a lease would, instead of looking for English or Scotch, or Protestant tenants, grant leases to the poor, industrious, hard-working persons, who had been born and bred on the land, Ireland would be in a very different position from that which she occupied at present. The great fault of the landlords of Ireland was that they were too tenacious in keeping possession of the land. They seemed to think that the granting of a lease to a tenant would surrender their power over the land, and they therefore kept hold of half-cultivated, badly-tilled land, and by their ignorance—and he vowed to Heaven he thought they were the most ignorant class in Ireland—they kept their estates unimproved, the people discontented, and the country itself an opprobrium among nations. No matter what powers the Legislature might give, unless the landlords changed their policy, and had the sense to see their own interests, no leasing powers granted by Parliament would do any good.

LORD NAAS said, no man travelling through Ireland could tell from the appearance of the land what was held under lease and what was not. Leases had no effect one way or other in regard to general improvements. These depended on mutual confidence between landlord and tenant. He objected to any preliminary inquiry in cases of improvement leases taking place before the chairman of the quarter sessions; it would lead to expense and delay, and would give no security against litigation afterwards, and, besides, questions might arise that a chairman of quarter sessions was not competent to decide.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he must express his belief, in opposition to the noble Lord, that there would be nothing very difficult in the matters to be submitted to the chairman of sessions or assistant magistrates in giving their sanction to the lease.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he was in favour of retaining this portion of the clause, in order to give the tenant, as the strongest guarantee of the validity of his lease, the sanction of legal tribunal on which he might rely with as much certainty as on a Parliamentary title from the Incumbered Estates Court. On the other hand, the inquiry before the quarter sessions would be a security against trick and fraud in the preparation of leases. It would also be a cheap and effective tribunal, while an inquiry carried on in Dublin would be necessarily a prolonged and expensive one.

MR. LONGFIELD said, the hon. Gen-

Lord Fermoy

tleman who had just sat down seemed to mistake the nature of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the county of Wexford (Mr. George). The Amendment was not the difference between a cheap and costly tribunal, but the doing away with all tribunals.

MR. CARDWELL said, he admitted that the Amendment was brought forward in a fair spirit. While it proposed to do away with the tribunal provided for in the Bill, it did not propose the establishment of any other description of tribunal. Now, something had been said of the delays and expenses attendant upon obtaining the sanction of the Master of the Rolls to a lease of settled estates under the Act of 1856, but that inconvenience arose from the number of assents to be procured from the various parties concerned, and there would be no such tedious formality in the leases now contemplated. General rules were to be framed for the guidance of the chairman of counties, and instead of any precise statutory provisions with regard to the terms on which these leases should be sanctioned, the system would be an elastic one, capable of being adapted to the circumstances of different parts of the country, or of the whole country at different times. It was the opinion of the Government that the intervention of the chairman of counties would provide a cheap, an accessible, and an expeditious local tribunal for this purpose, and he therefore trusted that the clause, as it stood, would receive the favourable consideration of the House.

MR. M'MAHON said, that the tenant would not feel secure under the Bill, but that his lease might be void because the prescribed stipulations were not complied with, or because the rent fixed by the lease was not the highest that could reasonably be got from the land. The value of land and of improvements was a matter which the chairman or assistant magistrate, as a barrister, could not well inquire into.

MR. BUTT said, he thought they ought not to give a limited owner of an estate power to execute an improvement lease without the sanction of the chairman of the county, but in the case of an ordinary agricultural lease for twenty-one years he thought such a sanction might fairly be dispensed with. In granting an improvement lease, the landowner accepted not the highest rent that could be got from the land, but a smaller rent in consideration of the improvements to be made by the tenant.

If the validity of the lease should be disputed on that ground, perhaps many years afterwards, when the reversion of the property fell in, it would be some protection to the tenant to have the sanction of the legal tribunal on record to justify the terms on which the lease was granted.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he was of opinion that there ought to be the protection afforded by the sanction of the chairman of the sessions, not for the sake of the tenant, but for the sake of the persons who would be bound by the leases, and for the sake of the successor. Looking at the clause in connection with the 28th section, by which those leases were made binding on the successor, he was inclined to give his support to it as it now stood, though he confessed that he had had considerable difficulty in arriving at a conclusion on the subject. But if the 28th section were omitted, he would not make it necessary for the tenant to go through this expensive process.

COLONEL DUNNE said, if hon. Gentlemen went on making speeches they would never get through the Bill. He thought the effect of the clause, as it stood, would be to prevent leases altogether. He should prefer to have the matter left to a competent tribunal, but as he did not think the Quarter Sessions Court would be a tribunal of that kind he would vote for the Amendment.

Question put, "That the words 'no improvement lease,' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—The Tellers being come to the Table, it was stated by Mr. Brand, one of the Tellers, that the Tellers were not agreed as to the number who voted with the Ayes:—Whereupon the Chairman directed the Committee to proceed to a second division:—The Committee accordingly again divided: Ayes 82; Noes 79: Majority 3.

MR. M'MAHON said, he would then move as an Amendment that the word "twenty" as applied to leases should be omitted, and the word "forty" inserted.

Amendment proposed, in line 23, to leave out the word "twenty," in order to insert the word "thirty."

—instead thereof.

LORD FERMOY said, he would suggest to the hon. Member to substitute thirty for forty years in his Motion. That was a term of lease which would give great satisfaction in Ireland.

MR. LEFROY said, he thought the term of twenty-one years should be adhered to.

That was the term usual in England and Scotland, and he thought the law should be as uniform as possible in all the three kingdoms.

LORD NAAS remarked that in the clause there was no precise definition with regard to the term for which building leases should be granted, and he thought it desirable that some accurate definition should be laid down in regard to that matter.

LORD JOHN BROWNE said, he concurred with the noble Lord opposite that it was very desirable that the term of building leases should be definite.

MR. DEASY said, he would take into consideration the suggestion of the noble Lord (Lord Naas) on the bringing up of the Report.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY said, he hoped the hon. Member (Mr. M'Mahon) would adopt the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, and make the term thirty years.

MR. CARDWELL said, the present measure gave power to grant a forty-one years' lease in certain applications coming before the Court; but it merely retained the powers at present allowed the corporate, ecclesiastical, and other bodies, to grant, without the preliminary sanction of the Court, leases for twenty-one years.

Question put, "That the word 'twenty' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes 117; Noes 45: Majority 72.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 26. House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Friday, at Twelve of the clock.

COMMISSIONS OF PATENTS OFFICES. QUESTION.

MR. TITE said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether any, and, if so, what progress has been made in erecting offices for the accommodation of the Commissioners of Patents, and of the collection of Books and Models relating to Inventions in their custody?

MR. COWPER said the Office of the Commissioners of Patents was at present very inconveniently placed—for it was situated in Southampton Buildings, while the Museum was at South Kensington. Inquiries had been instituted with a view of finding a new site, but no place had yet been found sufficiently adapted for the purpose. He hoped, however, that before long an arrangement would be effected which would be convenient to all parties.

in these appointments an absolute power, consulting no one, advising with no one, but making every appointment according to his own personal feelings and predilections. Now, Sir, my right hon. Friend will forgive me for stating that if the Lord Lieutenant makes any improper appointments, it is far more the fault of the Chief Secretary than his own. I know when I was in the office now filled by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Cardwell), the Earl of Carlisle made a rule which no Lord Lieutenant ever made before, most characteristic of his own generous disposition—that, as his Chief Secretary in the House of Commons had to defend the appointments of the Lord Lieutenant, it was but fair he should be consulted on them; and, having laid down this rule, having done it voluntarily and conscientiously, I must say he did most faithfully and loyally adhere to it. There was not one vacancy that occurred during the two years I was Chief Secretary on which the Earl of Carlisle did not communicate with me, asking me to get all the information to enable him to make a safe and good selection, and to avoid falling into a mistake; not only that, but I will say that if on any occasion from personal feeling of his own he might have been about to make an injudicious or improper appointment, it was only necessary to point out the fact to induce him to cancel it. The only rule he laid down was personal fitness, overriding every other consideration, political partisanship not being a sufficient qualification. I need not say that I am cognizant of, and to a great extent responsible for, the appointment to which my hon. Friend alluded, on the vacancy in the Lieutenancy of the county of Roscommon. It occurred while I was in Ireland, about Christmas. The Earl of Carlisle was in Ireland when the vacancy occurred, but he immediately afterwards went to England. I know all the information was communicated to him in writing. I was in correspondence with him for some weeks on the subject. I am cognizant of all that occurred. I laid before him all the grounds of his decision, and I can certainly undertake to say that nothing whatever occurred in regard to that appointment but after full deliberation, and taking the advice of other parties of higher position and more entitled to give advice than I was myself. I am also cognizant of what took place with regard to the Sligo case, and the right hon. Gentleman who last addressed us has correctly stated the facts. Is it not, then, I say, rather strange that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who was the first to put restrictions on his own patronage, and who acknowledged his responsibility to Parliament, should be to-day dragged before the House of Commons as one wanting in fairness and conscience, and whose administration is so corrupt that it ought to be visited with the censure of Parliament? I would only make one remark with reference to the observation of the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Colonel French) that the whole administration of Ireland, from top to bottom, is dirty and corrupt; my opinion is, after a good deal of thought, that, taking not Dublin alone, but Ireland as a whole, there is no part of Her Majesty's dominions, at home or abroad, in which there is so little abuse and so little corruption in its administration as in Ireland. The time was when abuses did exist to such excess, all parties got such a bad character, that I believe of late years there is no appointment which the heads of the Administration are so careful in making as that of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and I believe that both parties in making their selection have been fortunate in their choice. I believe that the noble Viscount (Viscount Palmerston) could not have fixed on a noble Lord who has so many high qualifications for the office as the Earl of Carlisle, and I believe the party opposite could not have chosen any one who could have performed the duties with greater satisfaction than the Earl of Eglintoun. I believe it is not the least recommendation of these two noblemen that while they are strong partisans they are free from anything like political animosity or sectarian and religious prejudices, and that while they have the confidence of their own friends they have that which is a great gift in Ireland—that conciliatory disposition which is likely to secure the good-will and respect of their opponents, and to bury in oblivion those rancours and party heats which my right hon. Friend so justly described as being at one time the curse of that country.

Mr. Horsman

MR. DEASY said, he should not have risen to address the House but for the reference made by the hon. Member for Donnegal to his respected friend Judge Perrin. He had heard that reference with considerable pain; for he had imagined that nobody could mention the name of that eminent person in the House in any other terms but those of respect and commendation. The hon. Gentleman not having thought proper to give the slightest intimation that he intended to impugn the recommendations made by Judge Perrin for the office of sheriff in Donegal, Londonderry, and the north-western circuit of Ireland generally, it was impossible for him to enter then into the details connected with those recommendations. He could only meet the charge of the hon. Gentleman, as far as Judge Perrin was concerned, with the most emphatic denial. He believed there was no man in Ireland more incapable than that distinguished person of acting from any other than the purest and most honourable motives; and he thought he was only expressing the common opinion of the bench, the bar, and the people of that country in giving utterance to that conviction. Judge Perrin, now retired at the close of a long, arduous, and successful career, was among the many able, upright, and constitutional Judges who had adorned the Bench of Ireland, and there were few abler, and none more upright or more constitutional, than that eminent person.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I cannot allow what has been stated by my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) to pass uncontradicted. That hon. Member said he wished that when I was called upon to form a Government I had adhered to my original intention not to recommend the Earl of Carlisle for the office he now holds. I assure my hon. Friend he has been totally misinformed as to what were my intentions; for, from the first moment it became my duty to consider by whom Her Majesty should be represented in Ireland, my thoughts and intentions immediately turned to the Earl of Carlisle, and they never for an instant varied. My decision was founded on the experience we had of his former administration, upon my knowledge of his character, and my conviction that the welfare and prosperity of the Irish was the most earnest desire of the Earl of Carlisle's heart. And, differing entirely in opinion from my hon. Friend on this point, I am quite sure that that appointment was not only most gratifying to the Earl of Carlisle himself, but was most popular in Ireland. I shall not now enter into the main question. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and my right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman) have, I think, convincingly shown that there is no foundation whatever for the charges brought forward by the hon. Member for Donegal.

MR. CONOLLY replied. He had seen the noble Viscount drag so many of his friends out of scrapes that he was not surprised at the course he had pursued on that occasion. The noble Viscount had met his statements with a blunt denial, which would go for what it was worth. None of the charges that he had brought forward had been refuted. His object had been entirely answered. He had called the attention of the House to these scandals, and it would go forth to the British public that such things existed. The right hon. Member for Stroud had met his allegations Pharisaically. Whatever eulogies might be pronounced upon the Earl of Carlisle, the north of Ireland rang with accusations against him. Having done his own duty in this matter, he left the House to pursue the course it thought best.

Motion made, and Question,

"That this House, having regard to certain appointments made by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, is of opinion that fitness has not been primarily considered in these appointments:

"That this House is further of opinion that the incautious and inconsiderate use of the prerogative of the Crown is prejudicial to the Public Service."

Put, and negatived.

DISTRESS IN IRELAND.—ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to submit a Motion to the House relative to the distress now prevailing in Erris and other parts of Ireland. When that subject was brought before the House in the middle of April, the right hon. Chief Secretary fully recognized its importance, and on a subsequent occasion the right hon. Gentleman described the distress of this district as extreme. Since then, however, the evil had increased, and yet, as far as he knew, nothing had been done by the Government to remedy it. He was informed that on the 3rd of May there were in the district of Erris 800 families totally destitute, and receiving aid from a private relief committee. On the 9th of June the number had risen to 400; on the 17th of the same month it was 640; and a letter he had received that day from the Archdeacon of Killala stated that the number of destitute families had now reached 900. The right hon. Gentleman a few weeks ago dwelt upon the Poor Law system as the only and proper remedy for this state of things. But the Poor Law in Ireland differed from that of England in one important particular—that whereas in England out-door relief was given in cases of sudden and urgent necessity, or where one or more members of a family were sick, in Ireland, on the other hand, such relief was not given to any able-bodied person as long as the workhouses were not full. If the Irish Poor Law system were identical with that of England, these 900 destitute families would be entitled to out-door relief, not only in virtue of the sudden and extreme urgency of their distress, but because illness had unfortunately broken out extensively among them as the consequence of famine. The small quantities of meal which had been supplied to them by the private relief committee had only sufficed to keep them alive. Dysentery and fever now raged among them to a fearful extent, and he was informed that distress also prevailed among the small farmers and occupiers of land who possessed a few cattle, but who, owing to the destruction of the hay crop and the total want of fodder, had lost their means of subsistence. The parish priest as well as the Protestant rector confirmed these statements. He had suggested some time ago that the destitute poor should be employed upon public works, but the suggestion had been met by the Secretary for Ireland with sneers. Now, however, it was too late. The people had lost their strength and could not labour. He therefore asked that the English system, so far as cases of urgent necessity were concerned, might be adopted in that district, and that thus something might be done to preserve the people, and to prevent the emigration which would otherwise follow their recovery from the fever and dysentery from which they were now suffering. The hon. Member moved that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty might be graciously pleased to direct that steps might be taken to relieve the great distress now prevailing in Erris and other parts of Ireland.

THE O'DONOGHUE, in seconding the Motion, said, that the question really was whether the Government should maintain the letter of the Irish system or depart from it, and save the people from starvation. The emptiness of the workhouses was no proof of the absence of distress, because the people in all parts of Ireland had the greatest objection to go into the poorhouse. There was no question that great destitution existed in Erris, while instant relief was required, and he knew of no way by which the distress could be dealt with except by the giving out-door relief.

Mr. Hennessy

MR. CARDWELL said, that he had always admitted the prevalence of distress in Erris, and had expressed in proper terms, he hoped, his sincere feelings of regret that it existed, and his sympathy with the sufferers, at the same time he had endeavoured to put the House in possession of the real facts of the case. He now had all the papers connected with this matter with him, and if the hon. Gentleman thought that either the Government, the Poor Law Commissioners, or the guardians had been remiss in the discharge of their duties, and that it was desirable that these papers should be laid upon the table, he should be quite ready to produce them, and to give every possible information. What had occurred in Erris was, that a liberal subscription had been raised and administered by a relief committee, the consequence of which was, that the Poor Law had been to a considerable degree in abeyance or reserve. In a workhouse in the district which was capable of containing 600 persons there had never during the prevalence of this distress been more than 125 inmates. The hon. Member said he (Mr. Cardwell) had sneered at the idea of out-door relief on public works; but he (Mr. Cardwell) was sure he never did sneer at anything connected with this distress, though he expressed his disapproval of adopting certain means to meet that distress which might be attended with more mischief than benefit. He had a letter from the Commissioners, dated the 8th of May, and he firmly believed that a liberal use by the guardians of the power of admission to the poor-house, and of affording out-door relief, and a proper use of the provisional powers vested in them, were sufficient to meet the present emergency. That showed that the Commissioners were not discouraging the use by the guardians of the powers which they possessed under the law to mitigate the distress; and he had that day received a letter from the Poor Law Inspector stating that there were only 120 persons in the workhouse, that the proportion of sick persons was not great, and that there was no fever or infectious disease in the house; and adding, that he had visited the most distressed part of the district, and had found that relief was accessible to all who needed it. The hon. Gentleman was wrong in supposing that the Government had at all changed their policy, or that they were giving funds to public works which were before withheld. The real state of the case was this:—There was a sum standing to the credit of the county of Mayo in the Irish Reproductive Fund, and, early in the spring, the hon. Member for the county applied to have it employed in the improvement of two important bays within the district of Erris. The sum, which amounted to £1,150, was applied by the Treasury to that purpose in the regular course. The only step which he had taken upon the part of the Government which could be considered to be at all of an unusual character was to induce the Treasury to remit a sum of £6,000 due from certain distressed districts, especially Gweedore, on account of the constabulary, as it did appear to him an extreme hardship to levy that sum under the circumstances. He should be extremely happy to lay on the table the whole of the correspondence if any hon. Gentleman connected with Ireland wished to see it, and he was sure they would be convinced that there had been no lukewarmness or indifference on the part of those who administered the Poor Law. But, if the hon. Gentleman meant to prejudge the question whether the provisions of the Irish Poor Law were or were not what they ought to be, he must object to the Motion. There was a Bill upon the subject now waiting for discussion. He had no objection to any Gentleman stating any arguments upon that measure, although they might not be those of the Government, but he certainly thought it inexpedient to bring them in incidentally, and to prejudge the general law upon the peculiar circumstances of this case. His answer to the hon. Gentleman was, that he would find when he looked to the evidence that every step which ought to have been taken had been taken by the Poor Law Commissioners and by the Government. With regard to how the law ought to stand as to indoor and outdoor relief, the time to raise that discussion would be when they were considering the general subject of the relief of the poor. But there was nothing in the circumstances of the district of Erris, as known to him, which led him to believe that a firm, humane, and fair administration of the Poor Law as it existed would not enable any person in distress to receive relief both with regard to sustenance and medical attendance.

MR. M'EVROY said, the people who were in distress in Erris were small farmers, who, in consequence of the very severe season, had not their cattle in a condition to turn them into money. Although they had property it did not follow that they were not in a most distressed state, and that they would not bear any amount of privation rather than go into the workhouse. He hoped the Government would take some further steps to endeavour to mitigate the sufferings of those unfortunate persons.

Notice taken that Forty Members were not present; House counted, and Forty Members being present.

LORD FERMOY said, that while they were reforming the Poor Law, one portion of the people of Erris were dying of starvation and the other portion were living on the capital which they ought to use to make the land productive. The Treasury had forgiven the police-rate, but that was making a present of £6,000 to the landowners instead of assisting the people. The Poor Law was futile. The people of Ireland would rather die than go into a workhouse, and those who went in, as a general rule, were never useful subjects afterwards. There could be no doubt that great destitution prevailed in this part of Ireland, and the Government were bound to act as a paternal as well as a ruling power. The Poor Law as administered in Ireland was not of the slightest use, and the money which was to be given to the landlords ought rather to be spent in feeding and employing the starving people.

MR. BRADY said, he shared the opinion that the Poor Law of Ireland, by withholding all out-door relief, was necessarily inadequate to the requirements of an emergency like that which had been brought under their notice. The poor Irishman, struggling to gain a livelihood from the merest patch of land, would on no account enter the workhouse in the hour of distress. Some other mode of relief must be provided, and he hoped the Government would not remain inactive. It was an Imperial and not merely an Irish question if the apathy of the Government drove these people to emigrate, while a little assistance properly applied would necessarily make them comfortable, and enable them to carry out their obligations to society in their own country.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he believed that this was a case of real and grave distress, which was hourly growing worse. The Government were bound to relieve these wretched people by all the feelings of humanity, if not by the principles of political economy. On a former occasion the Government consented to interfere only after repeated demands, and the result was that their remedy came too late. When employment was provided for the people they were in too reduced a state to avail themselves of it. The Government were now called upon to act promptly and vigorously. There must be some alteration in the Poor Law of Ireland to meet such cases as this, which were constantly arising. We could not command propitious weather, or ward off the murrain from the cattle and the blight from the crops; and when these calamities occurred the most deadly privations fell on certain classes. As one of these who administered the law in the city in which he lived, he could testify to the aversion which the poor entertained to entering the workhouse. It must be remembered, too, that the distress in this instance had fallen on the farming classes, who could not go into the workhouse, as those who held a certain quantity of land were not entitled to admission. The law must be amended, but in the meanwhile what were the people to do? There were hundreds of families perishing from starvation; how many more must be sacrificed before the sympathies of the Government were aroused? The law was inoperative as long as its administration was confided to cold-blooded guardians, and nothing but a suspension of the law would meet the requirements of this case. He called on the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland to break through the trammels of official routine, and to give a ready and generous response to the appeal of these 900 starving families for relief.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that ever since the Poor Law had been introduced into Ireland he had endeavoured to promote it, but he did not think it was either just or fair to expect that the existing system of Poor Law could meet the extraordinary exigencies of a case of distress so awful as that which had been described. It was alleged that the poorhouses were not full; but if they were filled, what a miserable state of things would ensue. An extraordinary combination of incidents beyond the power of man had supervened—distress in the fisheries, drought, and disease of cattle, and consequent high prices of provisions, together with general sickness. No ordinary Poor Law could meet such a state of things. Who, he would ask, were the class that suffered? Were they not the farmers and ratepayers themselves? The small farmers could not go into the poorhouse until they had got rid of all their property. If they sold all their stock and entered the poorhouse with their families, the farm paid no rates, and thus the circle of misery was widened, because the difficulty of raising the rates was increased. It was said there was a reluctance to go into the poorhouse; but those who did not, probably held aloof in expectation of being able to do better, and once there it was scarcely possibly for them to get out again, excepting as paupers. If they once went in how were they to establish themselves again as ratepayers, and how were the rates to be paid? Would it not be wise on the part of the House to meet this local evil and emergency as in 1846 they met a general one, by resorting to extraordinary means? If not, they destroyed the productive resources of the country as well as its future prosperity. The proposers of the Motion did not ask for a grant of money, but for an address to the Crown that steps might be taken to relieve the existing distress. In a former instance the House had taken extreme steps, and a rate in aid was made. It was impossible to read the accounts from those districts, and not see that however great the amount of charity and exertion, it was not adequate to meet the emergency; and if steps were not taken there might be a loss of life that might be bitterly deplored. He hoped the Motion would be conceded.

Mr. Maguire

MR. CLIVE said, he must admit that the Poor Law authorities were not responsible in the matter, the question of outdoor relief being disposed of by the fact that the tenantry themselves in the district were paupers. The distress had arisen in consequence of the indisposition of the small farmers to sell their stocks owing to the low prices, and then came the bad weather and the drought, and the cattle perished. The persons who should apply themselves to relieve the existing distress were the landlords, who received the profits and rents of the land upon which it prevailed. He was himself a proprietor in the district, and he had sent over meal and money to relieve the distressed people, and a tenant of his, an English gentleman, who employed a considerable amount of labour, had also sent over meal; but he wrote that morning to say that he must give the meal to the cattle, as the poor people could not use it. The particular district in which his pro-

erty was situate was perhaps better off than the northern portion, but still he entertained the belief that the landlords were the proper persons to provide a remedy for any distress that prevailed, though of course he should not object if, under the circumstances, a grant of public money were made in aid, because he believed that a portion of it would return to himself as a landlord.

MR. LONGFIELD said, it had been shown that distress prevailed to an alarming extent, and that the present law was insufficient to meet that distress. It was said the poor did not go into the unions, but in Erris the poorhouse was twenty miles distant from some portions of the district. They were told that seventy families in one small district were suffering from fever and dysentery, and yet, because they did not go into the poorhouse, it was suggested that they must be in a good position. He thought it most reasonable that the House should agree to the Address.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he disapproved of making paupers by wholesale by taking the small farmers into the poor houses. The effect of so doing would be most disastrous for the country. With regard to throwing the burden upon the landlords, the idea was quite erroneous. It might be all very well for an hon. Gentleman like the Under-Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. Clive), who had bought his property at an advantageous rate, to say the landlords should provide relief, but the case was different with landlords who had not so obtained their property. If all the people went into the poorhouse the land would be untilled, the rents could not be paid, and the rates could not be levied. The debate recalled painful recollections, but there could be no doubt that the Poor Law was insufficient to meet a famine in Ireland. There were Resolutions on the books of the House to that effect. From what sources the relief was to come was the difficulty. Formerly there had been rates in aid and other plans had been resorted to. But as he had said the Poor Law was not a means of meeting a famine—a fact which he hoped would gain weight before a Bill at present before the House, the object of which was to throw the sick poor of Ireland on the rates for relief, came on for discussion.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT pointed out that in similar cases affecting England the mode of proceeding had always been first to establish the facts clearly and accurately by means of an inquiry before a Select Committee; and he could not with a safe conscience give his assent to the Resolution unless he had more accurate information with regard to the alleged facts upon which it was founded. He would abstain from expressing any opinion as to whether the ordinary administration of the Poor Law in Ireland was sufficient to meet the distress which existed in Erris, but speaking in the abstract, his own feeling in the matter coincided with that of the hon. Under Secretary (Mr. Clive) who thought the remedy for such calamities rested mainly with the landlord. In England the landlord was the first person looked to for a remedy in all cases of distress arising from what might be called the action of Providence. It was only after ordinary means had failed, when the landlords were exhausted, and when the ratepayers could no longer furnish means that application was made to the superior authorities to furnish support from the resources which were not ordinarily applicable to such purposes. If this were a case of emergency, if the facts were as stated, his vote would certainly be for the Motion, but as he had said he could not give it with a safe conscience until they had been distinctly established before a Select Committee in the usual way.

Motion made, and Question put,

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to direct that steps may be taken to relieve the great distress now prevailing in Erris and other parts of Ireland.”

The House divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 84: Majority 35.

MILITIA BILL.—LEAVE.

FIRST READING.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: I rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to the Militia, which, though not of great scope or force in itself, yet relates to a subject of great interest to the country. The House is aware that for some years past, owing to the continual changes made in the Militia law, the Militia itself is in a very unsatisfactory state. When I say that, I do not mean that for its numbers it has been inefficient; on the contrary, probably no force, not being a regular force, has ever attained as great efficiency as the Militia under the command of the officers who have the honour to be its leaders. But the strength of the disembodied Militia has fallen significantly short of the quota authorized by the law; and, what makes the matter more difficult, is that on paper the force has maintained considerable numbers, who, however, cannot be accounted for, and never appear on parade. In all probability a great number of these men have enlisted in the Line; for it is cheaper for a man to desert and to enlist in the regular army than to pay back by stoppages the bounty which he has received, and frequently men re-enlist in this way two or three times, and so appropriate to themselves several bounties. If the Militia does not produce the number of men that it ought to do, I cannot say that it is from any want of the material from which that force ought to be created. I have here a statement of the number of male adults between the ages of 18 and 45—from 18 to 40 are the usual limits between which men are admitted into the Militia, but men who have served in the army are taken up to 45 years of age. I find that of adult males in England between the ages of 18 and 45 in the year 1800, there were 1,900,000; in 1815, there were 2,329,000; in 1851, 4,167,000; and it has been computed by the Registrar General that, according to the rate at which population has increased, the Census for next year will give us 4,622,000. The small number of 120,000, therefore, is as nothing when compared with the great body of adults of the soldier age which exists in this country. I think we have not to seek far for the cause of the non-attendance of the Militia. I do not wish now to go much into this question, of which the importance is admitted by its frequent discussion in this House; but I have always stated my opinion that the constant embodiments and disembodiments of the Militia have had a very injurious operation on its permanent and substantial character. I will read to the House the successive steps which have been taken in this respect since 1854. In that year there were embodied in the months of May, June, and July, 18 regiments. In December of the same year, and in the months of January, February, and March, 1855, the embodiment of so large a number as 119 regiments took place. From April to July, 1855, 8 additional regiments were embodied. In October, 1855, 1 regiment was disembodied; another in January, 1856; and 113 in the May, June, and July following. In August and September, 1856,

Mr. Sidney Herbert

30 other regiments were embodied. In September, 1857, 25 regiments were embodied; in October, 2; and in November, 20. In May and June, 1858, 16 regiments were disembodied, and 2 were embodied. In March, 1859, 4 were disembodied, and in April, 1859, 8 were embodied. The Return does not give any embodiments or disembodiments in the present year.

The opinion which I have always held with regard to a reserve is, that the object should be to secure for its ranks not the same men who would otherwise go into the Line, but a class less likely to leave home, who would be content to serve for short periods during a portion of every year, but who, in case of extremity, would willingly give their whole time to the service of the State. These embodiments have been attended with a very beneficial effect to the State. I cast no blame on any one who embodied those regiments, and I frankly admit that if any one is to blame more than another, it is the man who set the example of those embodiments, by which I mean myself. In 1854, the Militia was called out to a very great extent for the purpose of providing reinforcements for the army in the Crimea, and no doubt it did operate in this way, and many men imbibed a taste for military life, and were induced to join the Line, who otherwise would never have thought of doing so. Calling out the Militia, then, as afterwards during the Indian mutiny, was a matter of policy, the object of which was to tempt men to enter the regular army. Great assistance was rendered to the Line, but it was at the expense of the permanent success of the Militia. I do not know whether it would be wise now to say that we have seen the last of those distant wars that render it alike necessary and safe to injure the Militia for the sake of gaining a more rapid augmentation of our army; but it appears to me that, while every effort should be made to strengthen the Line, care should be taken not to do so at the expense of the Militia, whose success and permanent prosperity have become a very great element in the defence of the country.

There is no doubt that the embodiment of the Militia has driven from its ranks a great number of country gentlemen, and that the connection of a regiment with the county in which it is raised is very much weakened by its being removed for six months, or possibly two or three years, to do garrison duty. A friend of mine, who has had great experience in connection with the Militia, writes thus:—

“If you do not retain the services of the country gentlemen you will have instead of them only a mixture of half-pay officers, used-up Indians, and adventurers, whose sympathies are not with their regiments, and who fail to attract the working classes of the county to the ranks.”

That is a very strong statement, and strongly worded, but there is truth in it. It is this, that men who are in a position to choose their own profession, and who, if they wanted to enter the army, could have done so, do not like, without any prospect of the honours of the service or the legitimate rank which it confers, to be knocked about in garrison towns for three or four years—a feeling which must tend to sever the connection of the country gentlemen with the different regiments. I give all the more honour and credit to those who, despite these inconveniences, have stood by their corps and served in garrison, and who in time of difficulty have done very great service, not only in this country, but, like some of those whom I see before me, on colonial stations as well. In time of war the argument does not apply; but I think if the country gentlemen had some assurance that they should not be called on to leave home with their regiments to spend some months at Aldershot, at Portsmouth, or elsewhere, they would look on the Militia with different eyes.

Formerly the Militia was considered to be a safe method of soldiering by all those who exercised influence over young men. In peasant families it was thought that if a son or brother went into the army he was gone for ever, whereas they were not sorry to see him engaged in the Militia, by which he was secured from being taken away from home, and was not abstracted altogether from family ties. As long as the Militia remains disembodied that feeling continues; but if it be capriciously embodied I believe these people will be as averse to allow their relatives to become connected with it as with the regular army. Then, again, the system by which these regiments were deprived of their best men by volunteering into the Line of course greatly impaired their efficiency. The men were cajoled by the recruiting sergeants of regular regiments, who attacked and harassed them, and militia officers have described their regiments as being for a certain time turned into a kind of pandemonium; for not only were the men carried off, but discipline was considerably shaken, and the regiments demoralized. Among other evils, the system created almost a scientific practice of desertion. It extended far beyond the Militia, spreading into the Line, where the desertions about two years ago increased to such an alarming extent that the firmest enforcement of military discipline was necessary in order to prevent it. One objection which we should keep in view is to make it well understood by the labouring classes, from whom you draw the Militia, and who look upon embodiment as almost amounting to a breach of faith, that the Militia in future is to be a reserve force, a disembodied force, and that except in case of war or of great emergency they will not be taken out of their respective counties.

A good deal has been said in favour of a local Militia. Now, I have examined the matter, but I confess I do not understand what is the difference between a local and a general Militia. The popular notion is that the local Militia is a force confined to its own county, and that a general Militia force is one each regiment of which may be removed from its county. But, strictly speaking, you can no more by the ordinary law take the general Militia out of their respective counties than a local Militia. At this moment we have an exceptional Act of Parliament enabling the Government to embody the Militia, although the condition which the law held necessary to embodiment does not exist. But, if you maintain a general Militia upon the local principle, you have all the advantages of the local force, with this further advantage—that you have a well-organized force, with a capital corps of officers and a permanent staff. Nothing, therefore, in my opinion can be more unwise than to introduce a local Militia in the place of a general force, which in its natural constitution is local, but which by legislative interference you have chosen to divert from its natural constitution. I come, therefore, to the conclusion that it will not be wise to attempt any change in this respect until you have tried the Militia law as it stands. The one thing the Militia wants is to be let alone. It has a capital constitution; the law on which it is founded is sound and wise; but Parliament under the pressure of a great emergency set it aside. I hope, however, that the House will not be induced to depart from the law, but will give it now, almost for the first time since it was enacted some few years ago, a fair trial.

Let me state now what are the changes in detail and in administration, all of which I think tend to improve the condition and the efficiency of the Militia, and which have been made within the last few months. Last year, shortly after the Report of the Militia Commission was issued, it was my duty to introduce a Bill into Parliament for the purpose of carrying into effect such of their recommendations as I was unable to carry out by means of regulations. Since that time the following changes have been made in consequence of the Commissioners' Report:—In the first place, there were considerable restrictions with regard to the Militia, even under the old law, when embodied from fear of invasion. Thus they could not be moved from England to Ireland except in a certain proportion; they could not be required to remain there beyond a certain time; and great expense was consequently incurred in moving regiments in order to evade these restrictions. They were enacted in times when service in Ireland was not so agreeable as it is now, and they were very wisely removed by Parliament last year, and the Militia was rendered liable, when embodied, to serve in any part of the United Kingdom. Her Majesty was also empowered to accept the voluntary offers of the Militia to serve in the Channel Islands. Power was taken to unite in one battalion the Militia of two or more counties when their respective quotas are too small to be formed into separate regiments. I believe that will greatly tend to the efficiency of the Militia. In Scotland, several counties have been amalgamated, and have then produced powerful battalions; but some have remained unamalgamated, and the result is that you have very small battalions with a staff which would be available for a much larger one, while, militarily speaking, whenever it was necessary to call them out, these battalions would be comparatively useless. Ultimately, when you have consolidated the small battalions, you will gain greater strength at a much less cost, because one colonel and one adjutant will then be sufficient where two are now necessary. Since that power has been given the battalions which have been united in Scotland are, of the Galloway Militia, the Wigtown quota with Ayrshire, and the Kirkcudbright with Dumfries. It has been united under a gallant officer, a Member of this House (Sir James Ferguson), who I regret is not now present, from whom I have always received the greatest support and assistance in matters connected with the Militia, and on whose judgment I am inclined to place great reliance. The amalgamation of the following regiments will also take place:—The Flint and Denbigh will form one infantry corps; the Carmarthen and Pembroke one artillery corps; the Merioneth and Montgomery one infantry corps; and it has also been decided to form the Anglesea and Carnarvon into a rifle corps. The great difficulty in effecting these junctions arises from the existence of local feelings and jealousies, which render it difficult for the force of two counties to fall into one. There is another difficulty with respect to stores, for one county does not like to give up the stores it has got. That, however, may be got over by allowing the regiment to train in two wings, allowing each wing to have its own stores. In Scotland, as far as it has been tried, this amalgamation has answered perfectly.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

Then the Secretary for War was authorized to fix the times and places of training and exercise, he of course consulting with the Lords-Lieutenants, and appointing the time which is likely to be least objectionable to the employers of labour. A double object was in view in giving this authority—namely, that there should be first a fixed period to which officers and men should annually look forward; and, secondly, that there should be a simultaneous training, so as to prevent fraudulent enlistment from one regiment to another by men who pocketed the bounty in each case, and made a good thing of it at the public expense. Then, increased rates of pay and lodging allowances were granted to adjutants, and all uncertain and fluctuating allowances have been discontinued. That has had a most excellent effect, because formerly the adjutant was paid in proportion to the number of men he had enrolled, and human ingenuity could not have invented a more certain premium upon indiscriminate enlistment. It was natural, under such circumstances, that any recruit should be acceptable without very much inquiry into his character and antecedents. But since that change has been made, and since the urgent wishes of the Government have been expressed both to Lords-Lieutenants and the commanding officers of regiments that none but men of known residence and fixed habits should be taken, there has been a marked improvement in the character of the regiments generally. I have received communications from magistrates stating that the men formerly brought before them by the militia serjeants were of a very indifferent class, and in some cases spoke a dialect which was not that of the county in which they were enlisting, while the same gentlemen now say that there is a great difference in the men brought before them, and that they evidently belong to the county, and that in many instances their residences are known and their characters ascertained. The change which has taken place is shown also by the training, as far as it has gone. By a Return moved for last year the number present at the training in 1859 was 44,340, and there were 30,557 absentees. That is not the number of the Militia generally, but only of the disembodied as distinguished from the embodied Militia. The number of men returned as having failed to attend was an accumulation of absentees who were retained on the books of the Militia because it was thought that as fast as they were struck off they would be followed by other men, who would perhaps in like manner take the bounty and never appear. These absentees were struck off shortly before the present training, and as far as the training has gone it has been satisfactory. We have received returns from fifty-four regiments, which have trained during the present year, and their respective quotas amount to 48,569 men. I have endeavoured to impress on all those concerned in raising the Militia that the object of the Government is not to have a large force to pay, but that the question is how many they can produce at training, and therefore that it is much better to refuse men than to take doubtful characters. The result has been that, so far as they can be compared with the Returns of last year, the absentees, who then upon the number of regiments trained amounted to 4,707, only number 2,660 for the present year, being a diminution of nearly one-half. The effectives in 1859, taking into account only the regiments I have mentioned, were 19,546, while in 1860, in the same regiments, they were 22,223, so that here also there is a marked improvement, and according to a Return recently presented the total quota of all ranks of the disembodied Militia on the 1st of June was 113,801, and the number of effectives was calculated at 52,899. There is an improvement in the training of this year over that of last by the presence of 6,000 or 7,000 men additional. This certainly is not a very large increase, but we must not expect a great change to be made in a day, for there is no class so slow to receive an impression as the labouring classes from which the recruits are drawn. It will take some time before the labouring classes are brought to believe that the Government do not intend suddenly to embody regiments, and take the men from their homes for months or for years, instead of one month.

Certain additions also have been made, in order to produce greater efficiency in the Staff of the Militia service, in consequence of the Report of the Militia Commission. There have been added to each regiment a quartermaster, additional serjeant, hospital serjeant, drum or bugle major, and two serjeants as instructors of musketry. During the last year the whole of the disembodied as well as the embodied Militia have been armed with the rifle—the Enfield; and on purpose to teach them the proper use of it a number of adjutants have been to Hythe, for the purpose of going through a course of instruction there. They acquired considerable proficiency, but it appears to me that the duties of adjutants of Militia regiments are far too onerous to enable them also to devote time to musketry instruction, and therefore we have sent two serjeants in every regiment to Hythe to obtain the necessary instruction. We have had 94 adjutants and 260 serjeants who have passed through Hythe, and the remaining number to be instructed is only 40 serjeants. Therefore, very nearly the whole number have received instruction. I am glad to be able to state, on the authority of General Hay, that these persons have very well profited by the instruction given; and General Hay bears testimony to the soldier-like appearance and excellent conduct of the serjeants of Militia. I have no doubt that after one or two trainings they will make a remarkable improvement in the musketry practice of the Militia, which, I am sorry to say, is at present as nil, for the men have had no musketry instruction.

It was recommended by the Militia Commission that the promotion of officers, as a general rule, should take place by seniority, and that when a Lord Lieutenant departed from that rule he should assign reasons for so doing. That is a rule which we have adopted with a good deal of hesitation, and it has, no doubt, in many instances, given a good deal of dissatisfaction. It is difficult for the Lord Lieutenant in all cases to say who ought to be promoted. There are, of course, a variety of motives and considerations which ought to influence persons making the selection. You want in the Militia good county connection and military knowledge and efficiency. It is very well when you can combine both, but very often you have to balance the advantage on one side and on the other. You might have to choose between a man of influence who recruits the ranks, and a man of efficiency and skill who gives no help to increase the numbers of the Militia. Therefore, I have thought that every consideration should be given to the difficulties in which Lords-Lieutenant might feel themselves on this subject, and when good reasons have been assigned for departing from the general rule I have thought it right to support them. Then it was recommended that subaltern officers should be, previously to promotion, required to pass a practical examination in their duties. That is a good principle, no doubt, and if always insisted upon would induce officers to learn their drill, and fit themselves for their duties; but the application of it is not easy. Officers on the permanent Staff, adjutants, and so on, have been allowed to send their sons to Sandhurst to obtain the advantages which are attached to officers of their rank. I pass over some minor details, and, with respect to the treatment of deserters, I believe that the application of the law, with severity in some instances, has already been attended with advantage. It must be borne in mind that if men desert for the purpose of entering into the Line, they assume that that is rather a praiseworthy act than otherwise, for they argue that although they take the two bounties, yet they enter in the one case for five years, and in the other for ten. This it is intended to check, as it is important that when men make engagements they should be kept to them. Another change made is not entirely in accordance with the recommendations of the Militia Commission. They recommended that good-conduct pay should be given to men after five years' service; but some difficulty was felt on this point, that the good-conduct pay being only one penny a day while the men were under training, a penny a day for twenty-eight days in the year was scarcely worth their having; and the Government could not go so far as to give the penny a day during the whole year, the greater portion of which the men would be at their own homes. Therefore, we thought it better to give every man re-enrolled 10s. a year in addition to his bounty, and this system, as I understand, is working very well. Free kits are also given to all men who shall hereafter enroll, or who have been enrolled since the last training or since disembodiment, and a portion in money is given to re-enrolled men having a good kit. All school fees are abolished, and an officer is appointed schoolmaster with 1s. a day additional. All these things, of course, tend to the advantage of the men and the improvement of their position.

Certain things are to be done by regulation, and by the Bill I have the honour now to submit to the House we want to have the power of uniting maritime counties for the purpose of forming Artillery corps, as has been done in the North Riding of Yorkshire. Thus, when in one county there is not enough men for two battalions, and yet too much for one, the men might be joined with the Artillery corps of a neighbouring county, and become an efficient force. Of course, we should require no different machinery for this than that which we have for the amalgamation of force in other counties. With regard to the union of counties for the purpose of stores, I have attempted to get over the difficulty by applying the same principle as is acted on in reference to county lunatic asylums. Thus, a joint committee of the magistrates of the united counties will be allowed to erect whatever may be necessary to carry the amalgamation into effect, and of deciding where the stores should be built. Then there is a further power with respect to counties recommended by the Militia Commission, which I am sorry does not receive the sanction of my right hon. Friend opposite, but which I think upon the whole will be advantageous to the Militia, the counties, and the Government. It is proposed by the Militia Commission that the Government and the counties should have power to make arrangements for building accommodation for the permanent Staff, the Government paying the counties an annual interest on the outlay. This is, of course, not to be compulsory, but I do not see why any objection need be taken to it. I think the counties, in many instances, will make a good bargain by building themselves the necessary accommodation for the Militia, and the Government will probably not pay more than at present. Power will also be taken to

Mr. Sidney Herbert

call out the troops for training either on enrolment or some time previously to the general training of the regiments. This provision will, I think, be found to operate beneficially, for there can be no doubt that if you would bring up men for previous training the time of the permanent Staff would be economized, and would be much better employed in being devoted to the regiment in general than to the instruction of particular men. It has been proposed that the men should be brought up for training immediately after enrolment. But I very much doubt the policy of that, because, although the system is proposed as a check against fraudulent enrolment and desertion, I think it will operate rather in a contrary direction. The man who intends to desert will be quite willing to undergo a few days' training for the sake of the expenses which he will get. I also propose to take power in this Bill to increase the Militia of Scotland and Ireland in the same proportion as that in which we have now authority to increase the English Militia in case of invasion. There are in England 80,000 Militia, and we are empowered to raise that number by 40,000; and I would ask the House to enable us, should invasion take place, or imminent danger of it arise, to raise the Scotch and Irish Militias from 5,000 to 10,000, and from 15,000 to 30,000 men respectively, thus making the total force 120,000 in time of peace, and 180,000 in time of war. It was recommended by the Commission that the permanent Staff should be put permanently on embodied pay, but since that recommendation was made the Volunteer movement has undergone rapid progress, and the demand for non-commissioned officers has become so great that it is no easy matter to attract them to the Militia. The Volunteer corps are very naturally eager to receive as much assistance as possible in their drill, and I am sure that nobody who witnessed the spectacle in Hyde Park on Saturday—which seemed to me one of the greatest and most imposing which has taken place in the Metropolis for years—would grudge those corps the aid of those non-commissioned officers by whom they appear to have so well profited. It is, however, important that the Militia force, which is of a permanent nature, should be made as efficient as possible, and I therefore propose to afford the permanent Staff—not by the present Bill, but by the Militia Pay Bill, which will be hereafter introduced—increased pay. There is only one other change which I propose to make, and which will not be effected under the operation of the present Bill, inasmuch as it can be done by regulation. In officering the Militia it is comparatively easy to secure the services of field-officers, captains, and lieutenants, while there is the utmost difficulty in procuring ensigns. When regiments are embodied great efforts to obtain ensigns are made, and the result is that it is found necessary to go below the class from which it is desirable that they should be selected. The consequence is that considerable disappointment is experienced when these ensigns are not promoted to the upper grades in their regiments. You could, of course, get ensigns fast enough in time of war, or in the case of regiments permanently embodied; and what I propose to meet the difficulty with respect to regiments which are disembodied is that, while every existing ensign should retain his position, the vacancies which may in future occur should not be filled up. There are at present sixty-five of these vacancies in the embodied Militia and 601 in the disembodied. The better course to adopt under these circumstances seems to me to be not to fill up those vacancies, but to appoint two extra lieutenants in each regiment to carry the colours. Of course the ensigns at present with their regiments would remain. That subject, however, cannot be dealt with in the present Bill, which is confined to the objects I have stated. Its purpose is very humble; it attempts but little. It does not essay re-organization. It establishes no Prussian or Foreign system in the raising and maintenance of the Militia force. Our duty is, it appears to me, to keep up the traditions of the Militia, and to endeavour, by strict adherence to them, to bring it into a more efficient state. I believe the Militia has been disturbed and upset by constant interference with its arrangement, but if circumstances now allow us to keep it as a reserve and a reserve alone, we shall find the result to be a great increase in efficiency. My object is to keep the Militia in a disembodied state, and to give them the confidence and assurance that they shall remain so except in cases of great emergency. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in the Bill.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he had listened to the speech of his right hon. Friend with much pleasure. There could be no doubt that the reluctance to enter the disembodied Militia to which his right hon. Friend had adverted was in a great measure owing to the state of uncertainty which for years past had prevailed with respect to the embodiment and disembodiment of the force. In Lancashire, where wages were high, that was particularly the case. In 1852, and during the Russian war, no difficulty in filling up the ranks of the force had been experienced; but immediately after the conclusion of that war, when the system of disembodiment and re-embodiment came into active operation, the Militia became reduced to nearly one-half its regulated amount. The first step towards re-establishing the Militia ought to be to make it attractive to men of character, and not render the sacrifice involved in quitting their usual occupations too great; and he entirely concurred with his right hon. Friend in the opinion that one of the best modes which could be adopted in order to promote the efficiency of the disembodied Militia was to make the staff as perfect as possible. Indeed, he thought it should be made a sine quâ non that no sergeants should be on the staff who were not competent to instruct the men in the rifle drill as at present carried out in the army. He was glad to find that there was to be additional compensation for the staff of the Militia; and while upon that point he might observe that the Committee, in dealing with the question of affording greater accommodation for the staff in the shape of buildings, had deemed it desirable to abstain as far as possible from increasing the county-rate in order to effect that object. His hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Colonel Gilpin) had strongly opposed any such increase, but he was happy to find that the Secretary for War had pointed out that the recommendation of the Commission might be acted upon in such a manner that the repayment of the necessary expenditure would be guaranteed by the Government to the several counties. He would not venture, until he saw it in print, to express an opinion upon the Bill itself; but if, as he supposed, it carried out the recommendations of the Militia Commission, he should give it every support in his power. The Commissioners proposed, with the view of securing greater uniformity of practice in the promotion of officers, that if any Lord Lieutenant of a county did not recommend an officer in the regular routine of the regiment, he should assign his reasons for it. He agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that that rule should be adopted with considerable modification. Every regiment should be kept as much a county regiment as possible. In 1852 he made an arrangement with his officers to the effect that upon the occurrence of every third vacancy he should be at liberty to advise the Lord Lieutenant to depart from the rule of regular promotion in the regiment for the purpose of introducing some gentleman connected with the county. That arrangement had been carried out without the least dissatisfaction on the part of the officers, and he was persuaded it might be adopted with great advantage elsewhere.

Colonel Wilson Patten

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he rejoiced that an attempt was about to be made to improve the Militia. The fact that in future the time at which regiments were to be called out for drill was to be determined beforehand would give great satisfaction to both officers and men, and would produce a much better attendance. One of the recommendations of the Militia Commission was to the effect that when a recruit was attested he should be taken at once to head-quarters and trained for twenty-eight days. The Secretary of State said that would increase the expense; but, if so, he thought the system adopted in many counties should be put in force throughout the country generally—the system, namely, of allowing recruits to assemble for preliminary drill twenty or thirty days before the calling out of the regiment. He was glad that some definite rule was to be adopted with respect to the embodiment and disembodiment of the Militia, and that they were not for the future to be embodied except in the case of an emergency. He hoped that emergency would not arise, but if it did, he hoped that every regiment would have a fair chance of being embodied in its turn, and that no favour or partiality would be shown. The right hon. Gentleman said he could not see the advantage of a local Militia. Well, some seven or eight years ago the existence of the Government was made to depend upon the question as to whether the Militia should be local or general. Most of the regiments of the Line were distinguished by some designation connected with the county in which they were originally raised, and he thought it desirable that militia regiments should give recruits to those regiments that bore the names of their counties, so that a local connection might be kept up between the Militia and the Line. The proposal to increase the pay of the staff would be thankfully received by an able and devoted body of men.

COLONEL GILPIN said, that he wished to thank the right hon. Gentleman for bringing forward this measure, though he felt that was not a time to enter into a discussion of the details. As, however, he had been pointedly referred to, he might state that he was still of opinion that magistrates were not entitled to use the county money in providing buildings for the Militia upon the plea that they might get some of it back from the Government. The suggestion that recruits should be assembled for preliminary drill before the regular training was an admirable one. He thought there was a great deal of good in the Bill.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he hoped the Government would consider the propriety of increasing the pay of the surgeons in Militia regiments.

GENERAL UPTON said, he concurred in the opinion that every regiment should be embodied in its turn, so that all might have an opportunity of being drilled, and of acquiring a military spirit.

Leave given.

"Bill to amend the Laws relating to the Militia, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary HERBERT and the JUDGE ADVOCATE."

Bill presented, and read 1^o; to be read 2^o on Monday next, and to be printed (Bill 211.)

LOCOMOTIVE BILL—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 (Home Office to appoint Officer to certify as to Construction of Wheels of Locomotives.)

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, the clause required the Secretary of State to ascertain the weight and to register locomotives running on the highways, as well as to give a badge, charging a certain fee. He did not think this such a duty as could be properly cast on the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who had no staff to fulfil it. He should move the rejection of the clause unless the right hon. Gentleman agreed to accept the duty it threw on him.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the duty of registering locomotives and charging fees for them was certainly a new one to cast upon the Secretary of State, and such as he thought most objectionable. The duty was one that fell more properly within the jurisdiction of a Commissioner of police. The next clause authorized either the Secretary of State or some other Member of the executive Government to stop any dangerous locomotive which might be running under this Bill. He was told there was a certain class of locomotive engines which had been used to a considerable extent in the north for the transport of coals from railway stations to towns, and which were found running at a moderate pace very economical, while they did not frighten horses, or crush or destroy the surface of the roads. It might be advantageous to all parties that this particular form of locomotives should be used; but if some new form of locomotives should be introduced and run in the Metropolis or crowded places under the provisions of this Bill, they would, no doubt, be dangerous. It would be a just subject of reproach to Parliament if, in a matter of this kind, it did not give the Executive power to interpose a speedy check to a nuisance the suppression of which could hardly await the slow process of an indictment. Some such provision as that contained in the 5th section was therefore necessary to make the Bill a safe measure, but he was certainly disposed to vote for the omission of the 4th clause.

COLONEL PENNANT said, that these locomotives were, after all, an experiment, as it was hardly known what would be their effect upon the roads. Some Government office ought, therefore, to have the power of putting a stop to their employment if they inflicted an amount of damage on the roads exceeding the wear and tear produced by ordinary vehicles.

MR. AYRTON submitted that it was impossible for the Secretary of State to discharge all the functions which the Bill threw upon him. The attempt to invest him with such general authority was contrary to that principle which the House so jealously maintained of giving to local bodies control over matters which immediately affected their interests. The justices in counties and the municipal authorities in towns, possessing a knowledge of all the circumstances of their respective localities, would be far more competent to regulate these matters. Moreover, the Bill ought to provide that locomotives should not be employed where they would prove inconvenient or injurious to the public interests. He, for one, should object to see them used in the Metropolis, or in any large towns. Still as a mere tentative measure he thought that the Bill might be passed.

MR. GARNETT said, the Bill was merely intended as a tentative measure. There was no wish to force the use of machines in any places where they would be likely to cause inconvenience or injury. He had no objection to relieve the Home Office from the duty of certifying the machine, at the same time he thought that some authority should be compelled to inspect the machines, and to affix some indication of their weight on the outside, because it was according to the weight that toll was levied.

MR. STEUART suggested that the Bill should be postponed, and said that he could not for his part consent to the principle of the Bill, unless the interference of the Home Office were secured under it. They did not know what effect those locomotives would have on roads, or what damage was to be calculated on from them.

Clause withdrawn.

Clause 5 (Plate to be affixed on Engine.)

MR. DILLWYN said, he should move the omission of the clause. He believed that strict limitations ought to be put on the employment of locomotives upon public roads.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE said, the great question involved was whether these engines could be admitted to the roads without danger to the public. If the experiment was to be tried, as he supposed it was intended it should by reading the Bill a second time, the clause was essential, and it would leave to the Secretary of State the responsibility of putting a stop to the use of the locomotives if they were dangerous to the public.

MR. AYRTON insisted that it was absolutely necessary for the public convenience and safety that the locomotives should be licensed for particular roads and particular purposes.

LORD LOVAINE pointed out that the Bill gave the Secretary of State power to impose the restrictions the hon. Member desired.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he saw no objection to the Secretary of State exercising the power that was proposed to be conferred on him. At present he did exercise a certain control over turnpike trusts, and the clause seemed to refer to occasions which, though not likely often to arise, might occasionally do so, and in which the immediate interference of the Secretary of State would be more advantageous and satisfactory than the decision of the Quarter Sessions, which would, perhaps, be necessarily delayed.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, it appeared to him that the clause introduced a rather anomalous power into the hands of the Home Secretary. The House ought to be very cautious in passing the Bill. They did not attempt to put down larceny by giving the Secretary of State power to prohibit it; but they punished those who were guilty of the offence. In like manner, what they wanted was to forbid, under a penalty, the employment of dangerous locomotives, or of locomotives causing excessive wear and tear to the roads. The penalty would then be recoverable by ordinary operation of law, and with this view he proposed to omit the words relating to the Secretary of State.

Amendment proposed, in pag , line 4, to leave out the words "to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State that."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would own that at first he had been disposed to think that a locomotive with its train of waggons could never be allowed on the public highways; but on finding that these engines were actually in use in many parts of the country, he had consented to legalize them, provided summary powers were provided for the protection of the public.

MR. NEWDEGATE suggested that the Quarter Sessions should certify to the Secretary of State the roads to be used.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, it would be absurd and dangerous for a large machine, twice as large as the table of the House, to be turning the corners of the Metropolitan streets with perhaps a train of half-a-dozen waggons after it.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Southwark that it would be most unsafe to run locomotives in the Metropolis; and he had to add that he thought the power of regulating that species of traffic, if it were to be tolerated at all, ought to be vested in the Metropolitan Board of Works, and not in the Secretary of State.

MR. DILLWYN expressed a hope that the clause would be reconstructed with the view of placing the regulations of the roads under the justices. He moved the omission of the clause.

MR. JOSEPH LOCKE said, he thought that when the question was one of danger to the public from the use of locomotives, the regulation of them ought to be, not with the justices, but with the Secretary of State. Neither did he think that the Metropolitan Board of Works, which had never managed anything yet, was the proper body to which to intrust the management of these locomotives. The clause, therefore, ought to stand.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he thought the interference of the Secretary of State ought to be only so far as to pronounce what locomotives would not cause danger to the public.

MR. RIDLEY remarked that locomotives could use turnpike roads anywhere, and it was the purpose of the Bill that on roads where they paid no toll they should be charged with toll. The Bill, therefore, was necessary, and the clause was necessary to the Bill. He might add that the vehicles were under perfect control, and could be stopped in a moment.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN contended that the clause would prove useful to the public. The only means of regulating the use of locomotives on common roads was through the Secretary of State; if it were left to local authorities, the result would be considerable confusion.

MR. AYRTON said, it should be remembered that these locomotives were to draw each three waggon, and thus a train would actually pass through the streets. He asked how that would work in Fleet Street? He thought the fitness or unfitness of those engines should be determined by local authority.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause," put, and agreed to.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he believed that there could be no use in their proceeding any further with the Bill, and he should therefore move that the Chairman do leave the Chair.

Motion made and Question put, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 83: Majority 44.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said he would move that the Chairman report progress.

MR. GARNETT said, he hoped the Motion would not be pressed, but that the clause would be passed, after which he should not ask the Committee to proceed further that night.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he would withdraw his Motion.

Clause agreed to.

The House resumed. Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday 9th July.

SALE OF GAS ACT AMENDMENT (No. 2.) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, it was very important that some certainty should be arrived at with respect to the operation of the existing law. He thought, however, that it was a very useful Act, and would be much better amended than repealed. Still he was quite aware that his own measure having been prepared in haste was imperfect, and therefore, if the House would agree to the second reading, he would move that it be referred to a Select Committee.

Bill read 2^o and committed to a Select Committee.

MR. SPOONER said, the House had been sitting thirteen hours, and it was quite time that it should adjourn. He moved that the House adjourn.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS suggested that all unopposed orders be first disposed of.

MR. SPOONER acceded to the suggestion, and withdrew the Motion for adjournment.

House adjourned at a quarter
after One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Friday, June 27, 1860.

Their Lordships met, and having gone through the Business on the Paper,

House adjourned at a Quarter before
Four o'clock, till To-morrow,
Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Friday, June 27, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^o Dealers in Marine Stores; Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment.

3^o Tramways (Scotland).

LABOURERS' COTTAGES (SCOTLAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. W. EWART explained that the object of the Bill was to give facilities for the improvement of cottage accommodation in Scotland, which at present was in a very unsatisfactory state. This he proposed to do by extending the provisions of the Montgomery Act. By that Act the owner of entailed property was allowed to charge the estate with a portion of the money expended in improvements to the extent of three-fifths, on the principle of charging futurity with part of the cost of present improvements. That Act, and subsequent legislation in the same direction, did not, however, extend to the building of labourers' cottages, and the object of the Bill before the Committee was to remedy the omission.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he had no objection to the Bill, but he wished to have a recital introduced into the preamble setting forth that doubts were entertained that Montgomery's Act extended to labourers' cottages, which doubts should not be allowed to continue. He also proposed to make the Bill declaratory instead of enactive.

Amendment agreed to.

Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered on Friday.

BLEACHING AND DYEING WORKS BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1 (Recited Acts to apply to bleaching and dyeing works).

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he wished to move Amendments exempting from the operation of the Bill works in which the occupation of bleaching or dyeing linen, linen yarn, and cambric only were carried on.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 2, line 13, after the words 'Dyeing Works,' to insert the words 'except works in which the operation of bleaching linen, yarn or thread, linen cloth, unions, or cambric by the open air process is the only operation of bleaching carried on.'"

MR CROOK said, he felt himself unable to agree to the Amendment, the effect of which, if carried, would be to deprive the youth of Scotland and Ireland of the advantages of education, and women and young children of protection from too protracted labour. According to the Report of the Select Committee, women and young boys were frequently obliged to perform heavy night-work. In particular cases the temperature was as high as from 80 to 110 degrees, and in many instances women and men worked through the night in the same apartment. Several of the masters stated that they had done their best to obtain married people, or brothers and sisters, for this class of labour ; but nothing save a legislative enactment would put a stop to the demoralization entailed by such a system. The cases referred to occurred not alone in Belfast and the north of Ireland, but at Perth, Dundee, and other centres of industry in Scotland. He therefore hoped the House would not consent to make the wholesale exceptions proposed by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member.

Mr. W. Ewart

MR. DAWSON said, he was willing to give credit to the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. Crook) and those who supported him, for the motives by which they had been actuated in introducing this Bill ; but in his opinion the condition of Ireland and the circumstances of the bleaching trade in that country were wholly different from the other portions of the kingdom to which the measure was meant to apply. Owing to the humidity of the Irish climate the machinery of the bleaching works was driven almost exclusively by water, and as the supply only came down at uncertain times, and the millowners were not allowed to provide a reserve by detaining the stream from those below, advantage must be taken of the opportunity when it occurred, and it was consequently impossible to regulate by any fixed limits the hours at which work should be carried on. The greater portion of the operations, likewise, were conducted in the open air, and were liable to interruption from the weather, in which case they were performed in well-ventilated apartments. It was a recognized fact that the condition of the operatives in the north of Ireland was as healthy as that of persons engaged in agricultural pursuits, in proof of which he might advert to the total absence of complaint on the part of the working people. Those best acquainted with the province of Ulster held that on behalf of no class of the working community was legislative interference less required. It was true that women were employed in getting up and finishing cambric handkerchiefs ; but this could not be said to be a demoralizing occupation. Boys were also employed, but scarcely any below fourteen years of age, and they were allowed long intervals of rest. In most establishments these lads received wages upon entrance, and at the age of eighteen had learnt their business, which the provisions of this Bill would render impossible. A gentleman of great experience, writing within the last few days, said he knew no linen establishment in which the hours of work were more than ten a day, while in many cases they were less; and he could with a clear conscience declare that the occupation was much lighter than that of ordinary labourers. The working classes in Ireland regarded this Bill as impolitic, recalled-for, and ruinous to the interests of factories. One result would be that the employment of women and young children would be dispensed with wherever labour was cheap, for manufacturers would rather employ none but men than subject themselves to the annoyance of inspection and the vexatious obligations that would be imposed upon them.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was in profound darkness why the proposed exemption from a general principle should be admitted at all. It was admitted that too long hours of work did mischief in factories, and, as the House now thought, in bleaching works. Why did his hon. and learned Friend contend that they did no mischief in the linen trade? He did not see what the fact of its being an open-air process had to do with the question. It was not alleged that the bleaching process entailed upon the operatives very hard work; but what was complained of was, the length of time which the operatives were doomed to labour. That cause of complaint prevailed as well in the open air process as in the dyeing works.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he felt obliged to his hon. Friend for affording him the opportunity of renewing those explanations which he had given when the Bill six weeks ago had engaged the attention of the Committee. He then stated that to justify the interference of the Legislature it was necessary to show that the particular branch of trade was in itself an unhealthy process, or that the hours during which it was carried on were extravagant and improper. As regarded the first point, the Select Committee had declared in the strongest manner that the process of bleaching linen in the open air was a healthy operation; and Mr. Tremenheere, the Commissioner, gave similar testimony. The hon. Member for Bolton had referred to some instances which he said showed that women and children were worked for an inordinate period on Irish bleach-greens; but he fell into the same error as Mr. Tremenheere in mistaking cotton bleach works for those in which the bleaching of linen was alone carried on. The Amendment which he had proposed was intended to apply to linen bleach works only. The opinion of the operatives themselves afforded a very good indication of the course which Parliament ought to adopt. But Mr. Tremenheere, when examined before the Committee, admitted that he had not thought it necessary to ask the opinion of the Irish operatives, having gone so fully into the question in England. The trades in the two countries, however, were entirely distinct; and Mr. Waring, who was sent over from England as a delegate to induce the working people in Ireland to adopt the same view, admitted that he found all the operatives there quite satisfied with the existing state of things. There were before the House petitions signed by upwards of 1,000 of those operatives begging that Parliament would not interfere in the matter, and for reasons very much affecting their own position. The open-air process in bleaching depended to a great extent on the state of the weather, and in winter, when the frost was severe, it could not very often be commenced before ten or twelve o'clock in the day, while if it were to cease at a fixed unyielding hour the chemical processes might be materially injured. It must be also remembered that the bleaching was carried on by water power, and if the works were stopped at a certain hour property to a certain extent was lost, for the water would run whether the bleach works were carried on or not. Then, the workmen were paid by the piece, and not by the day; so that they did not like interference. Most of the men employed in the works were heads of families, who were anxious that their wives and children should be employed with them. If not, the children must go to agricultural labour, which was less liked and much more severe. But if the Bill were passed women and children would be to a great extent dispensed with. The work performed at night was for the most part connected with the beetling work, where the parties employed had to change the position of the cloth every three hours, out of which they might have two hours and a half of sleep. It was, in fact, the lightest work of all, and was most coveted by the workpeople. As to the drying stoves, though the temperature was high the ventilation was perfect, and none of the people employed wished it to be interfered with. The reason given by Mr. Tremenheere for including these works in his restrictions was that as they were recommended for the English bleaching works it was urged on him that it would not be fair to exempt Scotch and Irish bleachers. This was quite right where the processes were the same, but it was a different thing where the processes were so different. He thought these statements would satisfy the Committee of the reasonableness of his Amendment, which did not ask the Committee to make an exception in favour of any part of the United Kingdom, but only with respect to a particular system of proceeding in conducting the operation of bleaching.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he wished to call attention to an Amendment to be proposed by the hon. Member for Bolton, "that nothing in the Act should extend to or affect any person or persons when employed in the open air." The Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman did not include cotton within its scope, whereas that of the hon. Member for Bolton contained no limitation. He did not, however, see that there was any substantial difference between the principle involved in the Amendment and that which the promoters of the Bill sought to carry into effect, and he should therefore vote for it.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he was prepared to admit that the process was a healthy process. All bleaching was a healthy process. The bleaching works he had seen were places where a man might pass his life very comfortably if he were doomed to labour there. He admitted that the master dyers desired as much as possible to alleviate the condition of labour. But the question was as to the length of labour, and why persons should be employed for a greater number of hours in bleaching linen than in bleaching cotton. He had a few days before been down in the bleaching districts, and he had asked a girl whom he had seen performing a certain operation, how long she worked? Her reply was from 6 in the morning until 10 at night, with two hours for meals. She added that the work was not exactly hard, but, using an expressive phrase, she said it was jading, and indeed so it must be, for he should look upon it as very jading work to sit for so long a time, even in that House. He could not under those circumstances, understand why the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary gave his sanction to the Amendment.

Sir Hugh Cairns

The necessities of trades were talked of as a reason why it should be adopted, and he recollected that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) at that time Secretary for the Home Department, yielding to the influence of such language, attempted to stop the passing of the Factory Act, which, however, was passed in spite of the doleful lamentations of the manufacturers, and which, instead of doing harm, had effected great good.

MR. BAXTER said, he was quite of the opinion that the experience of the working of the Factory Act demonstrated the soundness of the conclusions at which the hon. and learned Gentleman had arrived. He could not, however, at the same time, help thinking that the hon. and learned Gentleman had scarcely done justice to the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, who sought to draw a distinction between linen and cotton bleaching, inasmuch as the latter was conducted under cover, whereas the former was subjected to the open-air process. The linen bleaching occupied grounds extending from five to fifty acres, which were not in the slightest degree analagous to factories of any kind, the process being to all intents and purposes an agricultural occupation. The process was not dependent upon chemistry, but was dependent upon the winds and rain of heaven. That being so, some hon. Gentlemen appeared to be of opinion that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bolton met the case, but if the scope of the Bill were limited to operations in the open air it would not provide for those emergencies which, owing to the severity of the weather, bleaching operations had to be conducted in a shed. Those operations, then, could be effectually carried on, under all circumstances, only by exempting the whole process of bleaching in the way which the hon. and learned Member for Belfast proposed. Indeed it could no more be regulated by Act of Parliament than the labour of farm servants.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he preferred the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast to the proposal of the hon. Member for Bolton, because the former was clear and simple, and would not go one inch farther than was intended, whereas the latter was complicated, would be very difficult to work, and would lead to great evasions of the law. If the hon. Gentlemen who represented Ireland were a little hurt because Ireland was included in the Bill, a better feeling might have been manifested by the Committee towards Ireland on the present occasion if the Irish Members who sat on the Select Committee on the subject had not opposed every proposal to legislate on behalf of the operatives in English bleach works.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it seemed, according to the language of the Amendment, that the exception would only apply to works in which the operation was carried on exclusively in the open air; but where the works were partly carried on in the open air and partly under cover he presumed the Amendment would not apply. If that were not so, it was very difficult to understand the exact meaning of the Amendment.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, the "open-air process" of bleaching was a technical description well-known in the trade as distinguished from the chemical process. It commenced with bleaching on the bleach-green, and was continued by steeping, folding, pressing, &c., the whole process being called the open-air process of bleaching linen.

MR. ROEBUCK insisted that no answer had been given to his objection, which was, that although the Bill was directed against the employment of women and children over a certain number of hours, it was now proposed to exclude from its operation those employed in the open-air bleaching. It was no answer to say that the process was healthy.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he did not expect to give a very satisfactory answer to his hon. and learned Friend, for he was afraid he had already made up his mind on the subject. This, however, was not a Bill declaring that women and children should not be employed over a certain number of hours. It said, "You shall work between 6 A.M. and 6 P.M., and not any other hours, longer or shorter." Those hours, however, were not at all times suitable to bleaching by the open-air process.

MR. WHALLEY said, he thought no answer was required to the objection of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. The labour in these bleaching grounds was not at all unhealthy, and if the processes were interfered with at the instigation of persons specially employed to make out a grievance, great injury would be done to the trade throughout the country. They might as well interfere with the agricultural labourer, who, it was well known, worked, as occasion required, all hours, day or night. It was perfectly idle to legislate in the spirit of this Bill for the labouring classes, who were able enough to protect themselves. If they did, they might as well bring in a general Act applicable to every class alike, including Members of Parliament.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he did not think the linen trade would be destroyed if the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend were not adopted, but assuredly the interests of the working people would be seriously injured. The mode in which bleaching-works were at present conducted would be entirely changed, and it would become necessary to employ adult labour only. This would occasion serious loss to a numerous class of the industrious population of Ireland, the linen bleaching process being almost peculiar to that part of the country.

MR. CROOK explained, that the effect of rejecting the Amendment would be to declare it illegal to employ in these works women during all the night, or sixteen or seventeen hours a day, as was now the case; if the Amendment were adopted, it would give the sanction of law to the present practice.

MR. PACKE said, he felt bound to state that the feeling of the Committee was that the Bill should not be extended to the Irish bleachers.

MR. BUTT said, that having moved the appointment of the Committee he must say he was in favour of the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Belfast, there being a clear distinction between open-air bleaching and the chemical process; and no case had been made out for interference with bleach works carried on in the open air.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he feared that even after the explanation of the hon. and learned Member for Belfast some slight misunderstanding might prevail, and it was important that the Committee should know distinctly on what they were about to divide. What he understood was this:—There was a certain class of bleaching operations, in which the process of bleaching, in the strict sense of the word—the conversion of brown linen into white—was exclusively carried on in the open air; but then there were some subsidiary operations necessary afterwards, which were carried on under cover. The Amendment only applied to the process carried on in the open air; was that so?

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he apprehended that what he should call the conversion of the colour was effected in the open air, but it included the subsidiary processes which were afterwards necessary.

MR. DALGLISH explained that in linen open-air bleaching the sun was used as the agent; whereas chloride of lime was used in the chemical process, the cloth not being exposed in the open air at all; but in either case the cloth must be finished in hot stoves, where it was placed generally by female labour; and it was to this latter part of the process that he thought their legislation should be directed. Any further interference would be most prejudicial to the workers themselves.

MR. CAYLEY said, he felt the difficulty which had been stated by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary. He had no desire to interfere with the open-air operations; but he now understood that in the subsidiary processes, in the hot stoves, women and children were employed twelve, fifteen, or eighteen hours a day. How would the Amendment affect these?

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he had been anxious that the Committee should not misunderstand him. He stated at the beginning that his Amendment was not confined to the actual process in the open air; that would be utterly nugatory and useless. It was confined to the process technically called open-air bleaching. That part of the process not carried on in the open air was, as Mr. Tremenhoe informed them, conducted in well-ventilated and healthy places under cover. It had been conclusively proved by the evidence that there was nothing, either in that process under cover or in the length of the hours during which the workers were employed there, to justify the interference of the Legislature.

MR. BUTT explained that it was not necessary to remain for several hours before a hot stove to complete the subsidiary process, when the previous bleaching, as in the case of linens, took place in the open air.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 190; Noes 48: Majority 142.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, that the labour carried on in bleaching works was not hard or unhealthy, and there could be no doubt that the operatives so employed in Lancashire were superior in physical and mental condition to the persons engaged in cotton factories. These circumstances ought to form an element in the consideration of the Legislature; and he believed it would be satisfactory both to the masters and men if the number of hours were fixed at a maximum of twelve per day. He would therefore move at page 2, clause 1, line 18, to leave out from "that" to the end of the clause, and insert the words of which he had given notice:—

Sir Hugh Cairns

Amendment proposed,

"In line 18, to leave out from the word 'that' to the end of the Clause, in order to add the words 'it shall be lawful to employ females and young persons in Bleaching and Dyeing Works as follows (that is to say); from six o'clock in the forenoon until eight of the clock in the afternoon on every working day except on Saturdays, and on Saturdays from six of the clock in the forenoon until half an hour after four of the clock in the afternoon: Provided, that there be allowed for meals half an hour at any time of the day between the hours of six and eleven of the clock in the forenoon, one hour between eleven of the clock in the forenoon and four of the clock in the afternoon, and (except on Saturdays) half an hour between the hours of four and eight of the clock in the afternoon.'"

MR. CROOK said, he felt bound to resist the Amendment, as diametrically opposed to the principles of the Factory Act, which limited the hours of labour to ten, and which the House had declared on the second reading should be extended to bleaching and dyeing works.

MR. W. EGERTON said, he should support the Amendment, believing it would not operate prejudicially to women and children. Twelve hours' labour in bleaching and dyeing works would not, practically, be more severe than ten hours' labour in a cotton mill.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he hoped the House would not accede to the Amendment. It had been advocated on the plea that the labour carried on in these works was light and healthy, an assertion wholly at variance with all the evidence collected on the subject, and one which the House had distinctly negatived when it assented by an overwhelming majority to the second reading of this Bill. It had been argued over and over again in their discussions on factory labour that the appearance of the operatives was healthy, and that the mill girls looked rosy; but although hon. Gentlemen who had visited those establishments might not have witnessed with their own eyes the physical suffering which unduly protracted employment inflicted on those who were exposed to it, the House did not hesitate to apply a remedy to an undoubted evil. The present Amendment was palpably inconsistent with the title of the Bill, because the measure was intended to place the employment of women and young children in bleaching and dyeing works "under the regulations of the Factory Act." He therefore called upon the House to stand by its previous decisions.

MR. ROEBUCK said, they had decided, after full debate and by an enormous majority, that long hours were mischievous. Let hon. Gentlemen put themselves in the position of the women and young persons who went into bleaching works at six in the morning, and did not leave them, except for their food, till eight at night. It was all very well to talk of that being twelve hours' labour, it was not twelve hours but fourteen. He said at once, without any circumlocution, that rather than subject his countrywomen to that horrible atrocity, he would prefer to see bleaching works altogether disappear. The cry now raised about the injury which this legislation would inflict on this trade reminded him of the predictions that if they dared to pass the Factory Acts they would annihilate the manufacturers of England. Those Acts were, however, passed, and all the master manufacturers and all the operatives from whom he had made inquiries as to their operation assured him that their effect had been immensely to improve the physical, moral, and mental condition of the workpeople unaccompanied by any real detriment to their employers. In the pursuit of gain men were apt to forget all other considerations, and sooner than agree to the increase in the hours of labour proposed by this Amendment he would run all the risks threatened by these gloomy prophecies.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, it did not follow from the Amendment that the labour in bleaching works should last for twelve hours every day. It merely provided that in no case should that number of hours be exceeded. Bleaching was an uncertain kind of occupation, and the masters, not having continuous work for their men, were obliged to regulate the time of employment by the work they had to do. He did not think a maximum of twelve hours would be injurious to women or young persons.

MAJOR CORNWALL LEGH said, the Committee were not asked to reverse any previous decision of the House, but simply to apply the principle of the Factory Acts to bleaching works, with a due regard to the peculiar circumstances of the trade. By such a proceeding they could meet the views of all parties, and obviate the objections to which any extreme measure would be liable.

MR. BUTT said, it had been established incontestably that young persons had been employed in bleaching works during eighteen hours per day for many days consecutively; and it was therefore idle to suppose, if they were allowed to be worked for twelve hours at a time, that that would form a mere maximum which would be enforced only occasionally. On the contrary, it would be followed up week after week until in practice it became the rule instead of the exception.

MR. COBBETT said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had moved the adjournment of that House the previous night on the ground that it had been at work for thirteen hours. That Motion was acceded to, everybody feeling that that was a sufficiently long time to sit even upon their very comfortable cushions. How hard, then, must be the lot of the poor women and young children who had to stand or walk about in bleaching works for fourteen, sixteen, and even in some cases as much as twenty-two hours a day! The masters in Scotland were very desirous that the limitation imposed by that Bill should be established, as many as twenty-three of the largest employers in that country having, at the request of their workpeople, given their assent to a document in favour of restricting the duration of labour to sixty hours per week, which had been placed in his hands. He would not trouble the Committee with details, but there could be no doubt that many of those children were worked for eighteen or twenty hours a day. He contended that to pass the Amendment would be a violation of the principle which the House sanctioned on the second reading of the Bill, that ten and a half hours was sufficient work for those persons. He might also remind the House that when negro emancipation was being gradually carried through by Parliament, a system of apprenticeship was introduced, by which the labour of the negro was fixed at only fifty-four hours per week; and, moreover, the reports of our prison inspectors showed that the number of hours' work exacted from persons sentenced to what was called "hard" labour—although, in most instances, it was really very light—did not exceed nine per day. In fixing the number of hours which these young children and women were to be required to work, the House ought surely to remember the consideration that was shown to the felon and the negro slave. If this Bill were his own, he would abandon it altogether sooner than agree to this Amendment, and would trust to his chance of passing it in its integrity in another Session.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it had lately been argued that the admission of an inferior class of voters would end in the return to that House of Members who represented nothing but "passion and poverty." He must assume, then, that the Members elected by the £10 householders represented nothing that could be called "passion," and that all their debates were entirely dispassionate. The hon. Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt), however, had a little sinned against that universal characteristic of their discussions, because his speech was hardly pervaded by pure reason. The hon. Gentleman quoted the case of children employed for eighteen hours a day, and used it as an argument against the present Amendment. It was quite clear that a limitation to twelve hours a day would effectually protect these persons against having to work eighteen.

MR. BUTT explained that he had mentioned the fact of this work being now carried on for eighteen hours as some proof that, if the twelve hours' limit were adopted, it was likely to become something more than a maximum only occasionally enforced.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: As a general rule, it was inconvenient to re-open in Committee a question that had been decided on the second reading. They had already affirmed the principle that the Factory Act should be applied to the bleaching trade. The time allowed for working under the Factory Act was ten hours, and therefore by reading this Bill a second time the House had affirmed the applicability of the ten hours' principle to bleaching works. He did not deny that it might be desirable to make the transition to the new state of things less rapid than it would be under this measure as it now stood; but he could not assent to an Amendment the effect of which would be to turn a ten hours' Bill into a twelve hours' one.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, an objection raised to the Bill was, that dyeing and bleaching were only done to order, and that orders came in frequently at such a push as to compel the dyers and bleachers to make extra exertion. He maintained that that was the very reason why such a Bill should be passed, because the merchant frequently put off the purchase of goods until the very last moment, in order, perhaps, to get another month's credit, and then pushed the dyer and bleacher to get the goods done as quickly as possible, thereby forcing the workpeople to work unreasonable hours.

Mr. Cobbett

MR. TURNER said, he thought it very reasonable to limit the hours to twelve. The demands in the bleaching trade were so fluctuating that it would not be possible to keep the bleach works continually in operation for twelve hours a day. A twelve hours' Bill would not necessitate the working continuously for that length of time day after day, and he believed that for many months, or at least weeks, the average would not be more than six hours a day. In reply to the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Frank Crossley), he might observe that the practice of which he complained could not be avoided, because export merchants could not purchase goods until they received orders from their correspondents abroad. He must complain that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade was not in his place, and had not expressed his opinion upon this measure. The dyeing trade had another complaint to make against that Department, because it had not protested against Mr. Wilson having, in his Indian Budget, imposed upon bleached calico a duty of 2s. 9d. per piece beyond that charged upon unbleached; while the process of bleaching only increased the value of the goods 3d. per piece. If such legislation as that was to go on, the capital of the bleachers would soon be endangered, whether they worked for ten or twelve hours a day. He wished that the ladies who took so much interest in this question would, instead of meddling with healthy, rosy young women in Lancashire, turn their attention to the condition of the miserable creatures who frequently worked from fifteen to twenty hours a day preparing their dresses for fêtes and balls.

MR. PACKE said, he could not understand how any one who had voted for the second reading of the Bill could support the Amendment. The object of the Bill, as expressed by its title, was to place the employment of women and children in bleaching and dyeing works under the Factory Act. The Amendment was entirely destructive of that object, and sought to negative the decision upon the second reading.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN denied that those who voted for the second reading of the Bill were guilty of any inconsistency in supporting this Amendment. The argument that this was a ten hours' Bill was never used upon the second reading. All that its supporters then asked was, that the House would affirm the principle of shortening the hours of labour in these establishments. The affirmation of that principle was all that was decided by the second reading, and with that principle the Amendment was in no way inconsistent.

MR. WHALLEY complained that the measure would entirely destroy the trade of the flannel manufacturers in Wales, who did not know that any such Bill was hanging over their heads, and who could not even read it.

LORD ASHLEY asserted, that the ten hours' principle was patent upon the face of the Bill; indeed, it was its whole soul and spirit. It was possible that the supporters of the Bill might consent to some Amendments, but to the ten hours' principle they must stick through thick and thin.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, that allusion had been made to the unhappy sempstresses of London, but their condition was no argument against legislating on this subject. It was to be regretted that the unhappy sempstresses and shirt-makers lacked concentration in masses like the factory hands, because in that event they would soon get relief from the excessive toil and misery they had to suffer in obtaining a scanty subsistence. As they were situated, however, legislation with regard to them was impossible. The tendency of the remarks of hon. Members was, that children were merely things sent by Providence to be used up for the purpose of our manufactures, and all the objection the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), who represented the Welsh flannel interest, could urge against the Bill, was that, in consequence of its not being in the Welsh language, the Welsh people would not be able to understand it. He (Mr. James) was at a loss to understand upon what principle hon. Members came to the opinion that these poor unhappy children were not to be educated and properly taken care of, but to be used up for the purposes of our manufactures. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Turner), had referred to the "pushes" of business; but as the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Crossley) had argued, it was those pushes which furnished the great reason for legislation. Take it on the mere ground of cruelty to animals; if a man cruelly drove a horse fifteen or sixteen miles in an hour, it was no answer to a charge of cruelty for him to say that he was pushed for time.

MR. BUCHANAN said, that in voting for the second reading of the Bill, he did not accept the ten hours' principle, but merely affirmed that some legislation was necessary. The subject was one which ought to be taken up and dealt with by the Board of Trade, and he therefore recommended the withdrawal of the Bill.

MR. A. F. EGERTON replied, from his own personal inquiries he was led to believe that a particular number of hours occupied in labour by sempstresses was not equivalent to the same number of hours occupied in bleaching and dyeing works. He felt it his duty to press the Amendment.

Question put, "That the words 'during the year one thousand eight hundred and sixty one,' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 256; Noes 42: Majority 214.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he rose to move the addition of a provision exempting the process of Turkey-red dyeing from the operation of the Act. He regretted that he was obliged to propose such an Amendment, because in common justice he should have been saved the trouble by the promoters of the Bill. In a former Session a similar measure was referred to a Select Committee, and the Turkey-red dyers, being seriously affected by its provisions, stated the nature of their grievance and showed that their business would be entirely destroyed if the Bill were passed into law. But their evidence was not taken before the Committee for the simple reason that they were assured it was the intention of the Committee to exempt them from the operation of the Bill.

MR. CROOK stated, that he should not object to the exemption of Turkey-red dyers, but he thought the wording of the proviso might be improved, as in its present form it might give rise to evasions. Any manufacturer by setting up Turkey-red dyeworks might get rid of the Factory Act in his own case. However, he assented to the principle of the proviso, and the precise terms of it might be arranged at a future stage.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he did not think his proviso was liable to the objection stated, but after the assurance he had received from the hon. Member for Bolton, he would withdraw it in the meantime.

Proviso, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he wished to add a proviso in favour of the fancy dyers. Many of the processes of fancy dyeing depended upon the chemical agencies, which must be carried on continuously or not at all. To expose such a branch of trade—in which, moreover, our manufacturers were successfully opposed by those of France—to the limitations of the Factory Act would be, in fact, to destroy it altogether. As the promoters of the Bill had already agreed to exempt Turkey-red dyers, he did not see how they could refuse to make a like exemption in favour of fancy dyers.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the Committee could not accept the proviso unless they were prepared, which he did not believe they were, to strike out of the Bill everything relating to dyeing works.

LORD JOHN MANNERS submitted that the proviso was inconsistent with the title of the Bill, which included dyeing as well as bleaching works.

MR. BUCHANAN remarked, that the title of the Bill might be altered.

THE CHAIRMAN said, if, after the Bill had been gone through, dyeing works were found to be excluded from the operation of the Bill, the House could then decide upon an Amendment in its title.

MR. TURNER said, he would remind the Committee that last week they came to the conclusion that it was not wise to limit the hours of labour of children working in mines under ground; and yet it now appeared to be the opinion of the Committee that young persons ought not to be employed in a light and healthy occupation above ground beyond a limited period each day.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to know what the Government intended to do.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had not the knowledge requisite for forming an authoritative opinion upon the subject; but as far as he was informed, he was not disposed to agree to the Amendment.

MR. BUCHANAN said, that seeing the feeling of the Committee was against his proviso he would withdraw it, reserving to himself the right to bring it forward upon the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Females and young persons may be employed until half-past four of the clock on Saturday, and eight of the clock on other days, but not so as to exceed in any period of six months, and part of another month the total number of hours allowed by this Act and the Factory Acts).

MR. J. B. SMITH said, he would propose that the clause should be expunged, and that another should be substituted, enabling bleachers to work sixty hours per week, instead of ten per day, thus that the operatives might work sixty hours a week; that was allowing them to divide that time unequally each day if it were deemed more convenient.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he hoped the Committee would not accede to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman. It would enable manufacturers to call upon the persons in their employment to work twenty hours in one day, and not to work at all on another. That was the very thing the promoters of the Bill wanted to prevent.

MR. CROOK stated that the object of the clause was to leave the hours of beginning and ceasing work at the option of the manufacturer, provided the time defined by the Factory Act were not exceeded in any one day.

MR. TURNER said, he could not see what objection there could be to require the labourers to work twelve hours each day, and to allow them a holiday on the Saturday.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought it was better to accept the clause as it stood.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 (Females and young persons who have not been previously employed in any Bleaching or Dyeing works, or who shall not have been employed at the same works during the three last months, may be employed in the same manner as the Females and young persons there already employed in the same works).

MR. TURNER said, that the clause was incomprehensible, and he wished the meaning to be explained.

MR. CROOK stated that the object of the clause was to enable bleachers to employ women and young persons (being fresh hands) at the same time when other women and young persons were at work. Without this clause, if a bleacher happened to be working twelve hours under a previous provision of the Bill, the new hands would not be able to work more than ten hours and a half.

Colonel Wilson Patten

MR. BUCHANAN thought that the object ought to be more clearly expressed, and said he should vote for the omission of the clause.

LORD JOHN MANNERS observed that the clause was intelligible, but that it wanted punctuation.

Clause agreed to, as was Clause 7.

MR. A. F. EGERTON proposed a clause exempting the process of royal blue dyeing from the operation of the Act.

MR. CROOK objected to the proposed clause on the ground that it was not warranted by any evidence given either before the Committee or the Commission.

MR. TURNER said, he thought that such a clause would be a most unreasonable interference with free labour.

Question put, "That the clause be now read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 55; Noes 109 : Majority 54.

The House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

House adjourned at two minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, June 28, 1860.

MINUTES.] Took the Oath.—The Earl Strange.
PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Law of Evidence further Amendment; New Zealand.
2^d Adulteration of Food or Drink.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose, pursuant to notice, for the appointment of a Select Committee, to inquire how far it may be practicable to afford better shelter for Shipping upon our Coasts than is at present afforded by the adoption of some plan for the Construction of Breakwaters and Harbours less costly and better adapted for certain localities than the system of solid masonry hitherto in use; and whether any such plan appears likely to be also serviceable for the improvement of our National Defence. The noble Marquess said he addressed their Lordships on this subject some two months ago; but since that time two events had taken place which must have brought the necessities of the case very strongly home to their Lordships' minds. He alluded to the late fearful gale, which had destroyed so much property and so many precious lives, and to a recent vote of the House of Commons, come to, he thought, in haste, and with something of rashness; a vote desiring the execution of the works recommended by the Commission on Harbours of Refuge. The loss of life to which he alluded was most fearful, more especially on those parts of the coast where no attempt had been made to provide any shelter whatever—namely, on the east coast, particularly off Norfolk and Suffolk. It was so fearful that 194 fishermen belonging to one town—Yarmouth—perished, leaving upwards of eighty widows and 200 children totally unprovided for. It behoved the Government and Parliament to consider seriously and well whether those calamities could not be greatly mitigated. In his conscience he believed that they might be. It was his conviction, after a careful consideration of the subject, that if the matter were taken in hand earnestly and energetically by the State and the Legislature, such shelter might be provided as would insure the preservation of hundreds of lives and millions of property. It was stated in the Board of Trade returns that the average loss of life by wrecks on our coasts was 800, and the loss of property, £1,500,000. But, unfortunately, the loss of life had been going on increasing in ratio,—and when he talked of those returns their Lordships knew that they did not give the whole loss incurred, but only the losses which had been ascertained. Many wrecks occurred which did not find their way into the official Returns. It appeared from a paper which was not official, but which he believed to be perfectly faithful—one issued by the Shipwrecked Mariners' and Fishermen's Royal Benevolent Society—that in 1858 they relieved 8,205 persons; and in 1859 no less than 10,354. Putting aside for a moment the question of humanity, he did not hesitate to say that this nation could not afford to throw away recklessly the lives of our seamen, who formed so important an element in the national defences. About 18,000 seamen had left this country and disappeared without our having received any account of them. This had no direct bearing on the question now before their Lordships, only so far as it showed that we could not afford to lose any of our mariners. If our coasts had shelter for an humble class of vessels as well as for the large ones we should have a great increase in the number of our seamen and a great increase in our coasting trade. He knew it was argued that a great many of the wrecks were such as harbours of refuge would not prevent, and that a great proportion arose not so much from the want of shelter as from the unseaworthiness of the vessels and the unskilfulness of the captains and crews. He believed there was not as much truth in that allegation as was generally supposed. It was supported by quotations from the statistics of large shipping firms, especially those of one great firm in the north of this country, which it was said had for a long period lost hardly a ship, because its system was to send to sea none but good and well-found ships, with able commanders and efficient crews. No doubt there was a great number of lives lost at sea in consequence of a neglect of those precautions; but he must observe that the particular firm alluded to, and other such firms, were not engaged in the coasting, but in the foreign and colonial trade. Their ships, the moment they came out of harbour, avoided our coasts and got as far from them as possible, and on their return they did not dwell an instant on those coasts before entering harbour. It was the coasting trade that suffered so severely from the want of harbour accommodation. He objected to the recommendation of the Commissioners on Harbours of Refuge on two grounds. First, they recommended nothing but works of the greatest magnitude, and next, the works which they recommended were in direct violation of the most approved principle of constructing harbours. He had great respect for the Commissioners personally, but he was astonished at the audacity which enabled them to say that works of stonemasonry were the best, and, in fact, the only ones the State should assist. They recommended that class of harbours for their durability. Now if there was one quality in which, above all others, they were deficient, it was that of durability. The Commissioners said that such harbours were calculated to last for centuries or for ages, he forgot which term was used. Could they show him any harbour built on that principle which had lasted for centuries? He must say that the vote of the House of Commons the other evening, directing the Government to proceed with the execution of a certain plan of the Commissioners of Harbours of Refuge, was one of the most rash and ill-considered votes that had ever been come to by a deliberative assembly. Even the Commissioners themselves did not confidently recommend those works, which were estimated to cost between £2,000,000 and £3,000,000 of the public money, to be immediately undertaken. The Commissioners said that those works might be extended over a period of ten years at a cost to be defrayed by the country of £200,000 or £300,000 a year. Now, he contended, if the works they recommended were at all sound in principle, that they should be carried out without one day's unnecessary delay, at whatever cost, in order to afford protection as speedily as possible to the lives and property of our seamen. If they were fit to be executed at all it was an inhuman and indefensible economy to sacrifice by delay the lives that might be saved by promptness. If it were right to execute these works, not a day should be lost in undertaking and carrying them to completion. But the evidence of the best authorities was all the other way. Captain Cunningham said he was clearly of opinion that where a tidal river or the mouth of a bay existed on the coast to which the question applied "No refuge can be supplied by a space contained within piers projecting from the shore, because by that means you entail the loss of your harbour." Sir John Burgoyne's evidence corroborated this view. Yet these were the works which the Commissioners recommended to be executed in disregard of the plans of the modern authorities in science. One of the witnesses declared that Dover Harbour presented a most miserable case of failure and waste of public money. It was stated at a recent meeting of the Institution of Civil Engineers that about £400,000 had been spent at Dover, and that it was now often impracticable to effect the landing of the passengers at low water even from the small steamers that ran between that port and Calais. It was also calculated that if the harbour were made according to the plan proposed, it would cost £20,000 a year to keep it up. The Plymouth breakwater, which was another work of solid masonry, cost, he believed, £10,000 a year to keep it in repair. The Commissioners had flown in the face of all experience when they recommended works of solid masonry, which were constructed at an enormous expense, and were not, after all, durable. If there was a harbour on the coast that was expected to be useful, it was the great har-

The Marquess of Clanricarde

hour at Holyhead. But this harbour did not answer as it ought to do, for only a month ago, when he was there, the packets were in the greatest danger, and one of the witnesses declared that it was silting up and gradually decreasing in depth. A letter from a scientific gentleman given in the blue-book said no one should be employed to construct these works who was not thoroughly acquainted with the natural laws of the movements of the waves; that the engineers usually employed might or might not have the nautical knowledge that was required, but the practical result was that the value of any nautical opinion given was determined by the engineer. If the Government sanctioned the large expenditure proposed in the blue-book, they would only be expending a great deal of money on schemes that it was perfectly notorious had failed in other instances. Before they consented to the expenditure of such large sums he thought they ought to appoint a Committee, with the view of obtaining evidence on the point whether or not it was practicable to carry out some scheme that would effect all they desired at a moderate cost. If, instead of spending the £800,000 which the Committee recommended in the first instance, they were to spend £100,000 or £200,000 in trying experiments, the result of which might guide them in their permanent constructions. But he did not hesitate to say that if the Government concurred in the propriety of spending the money as proposed by the Commissioners instead of spreading it over a number of years at the rate of £250,000 a year, they ought to spend the whole sum at once, and not lose a day in taking steps to save life and property on our coasts. A great responsibility rested on the Government and on both Houses of Parliament if they did not look closely into this matter, and if they were not able conscientiously to say that they had done all in their power, and that without delay, to remedy the evils so loudly complained of. The noble Marquess concluded by proposing the appointment of a Select Committee.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, no one could regard the loss of life and property by shipwreck, that took place on our coasts, without the deepest regret; and he was sure that no amount of money, however large, would be refused by Parliament, if it were thought that its expenditure would have the effect of better securing the lives and property of our seamen. But it was not merely by looking at the question of harbours of refuge or breakwaters, that knowledge could be obtained upon the subject. The matter had been gravely considered by many former Committees, and especially by the Committee on Shipwrecks; and the result arrived at was, that it was not merely a question of harbours of refuge, but was intimately connected with the subject of insurance. So long as the owners of vessels could recover from insurance companies the amount for which they had insured them, they were careless of what became of them. A great number of schemes for harbours of refuge, as their Lordships were aware, had been proposed, some of them most extensive and costly; but they differed so entirely from each other, that the more one looked into the evidence given in respect of them, the more perplexing the whole subject became. The most distinguished engineers were found to differ in opinion from each other upon every scheme proposed. By the terms of the noble Marquess's Motion, he appeared to object to every harbour and breakwater constructed of solid masonry. And in his speech he seemed to object to every breakwater that was connected in the form of a pier with the shore. He (the Duke of Somerset), however, was not aware, from the information they had obtained on the subject, that they could adopt any better system. The breakwater at Plymouth was detached from the shore, and therefore he thought the noble Marquess would have approved it; but, on the contrary, he pointed it out as an annual source of great expenditure.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he had referred to Plymouth breakwater to show that even the most useful work of the kind they possessed was attended with great expense.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, at all events, there was great difference of opinion as to the kind of works that ought to be constructed. Any variety of opinions could be got from engineers on this question. Nothing was easier than to get a number of engineers to speak on one side, and an equal number on the other; and nothing could be more unfortunate than the scientific evidence given before Committees on the subject. The noble Marquess wished to know whether any plan less costly, and better adapted for certain localities than the system of solid masonry hitherto in use, could not be carried out. In putting this question, he pointed to the system of floating breakwaters, of which so much had been heard. The Commission which recently inquired into the subject of harbours of refuge, had looked into this question; and they stated in their Report that, having taken evidence on the matter, they considered there were serious drawbacks to the construction of floating breakwaters. Indeed, so far as their Report went, it was adverse to these floating breakwaters. A floating breakwater had been tried at Dover, which came adrift in a storm. Another had been constructed by Admiral Taylor at Brighton; but that came ashore in a gale of wind. Those experiments justified the opinion of the Commissioners as to what might happen if breakwaters were not solidly built. There would be great risk in establishing breakwaters, which would increase the dangers of the sea; because the perils of the ocean would be increased if a ship was steered in a storm to a particular point, in the hopes of finding shelter; but, upon reaching that point, it was found that the breakwater had been driven ashore. It might happen, also, that when ships had actually taken refuge behind a floating breakwater, it might come adrift, and breakwater and ships be driven ashore together. Not being a professional man himself, he should like to have seen some experiments made of these floating breakwaters; but he thought no Board of Admiralty would take the responsibility of trying them. When in February last a company applied to the Admiralty, and proposed to lay down a floating breakwater at Hastings, he had to see how far the Admiralty—who were to some extent the guardians of the shores of the country—how far, if it failed, they would be responsible; and having legal advice that by proper care they would not be responsible, he answered that the Admiralty would not offer any opposition to the construction of a breakwater; but that it was to be distinctly understood that the promoters were not in any way the agents of the Admiralty; and that neither the Crown nor the Admiralty were to be responsible for any loss or damage that might arise to shipping or otherwise, from its construction or its failure. He had sent this answer to the company. He did not know whether they were satisfied or not; but he had not heard any more as to whether they were willing to take upon themselves the responsibility of placing the breakwater; but no Board of Admiralty, with naval men and others conversant with the subject, would be willing, and he believed their Lordships would be most unwilling, to establish any breakwater on any such principle. The example of light vessels was not without importance in reference to this subject. The light vessels along our shores were moored and fastened in the strongest way in which the Trinity House could secure them, and they had many advantages that a breakwater could not possess; but in 1841 all the three light vessels in the North Sea parted anchors, and drifted away in a storm. And in view of this, was it not likely that the same thing would happen with a breakwater, and that it would also give way at the very time it was expected to give shelter? Doubtless breakwaters of solid masonry were most expensive; but if they undertook the work at all, he thought it must be undertaken in that manner. He was aware that the breakwaters and harbours already constructed had not succeeded in many respects; and one reason was, that not only engineers differed, but that successive Governments differed on the subject. Last year he went to Alderney, accompanied by a military engineer and a naval one, and he called for all the plans with regard to the alteration of the harbour. There were fourteen plans that had been brought under the consideration of different Governments for the purpose. One Government thought they went a little too far, and another thought they ought to go in another direction, and under that system no doubt they had spent a great deal of money, and without getting a very satisfactory harbour; and they were now told in "another place" that the best thing they could do was to abandon the place altogether. He did not agree in that. It was not quite on the scale that he could wish, yet it should be remembered that the harbour was constructed at a time when vessels were not so large as they were at present, and he believed that for purposes of defence the harbour would be found very useful. The harbour of Holyhead had not been carried out on the scale originally proposed, and which would have rendered it a better harbour, but necessarily more costly. The noble Marquess had referred to Dover Harbour. It was of solid masonry, and proceeded from the shore. [The Marquess of CLANRICARDE: No.] Well, then, it was solid work. It was not masonry below the water. He believed that it was as well constructed as could be, and they had every facility that they had not in other places. The materials were close at hand, and other questions must be considered when making a harbour like that. Undoubtedly Dover Harbour was not at present successful, but he understood that when the pier was carried out a little further, it would be found useful; so that it would be unwise to abandon it, and not continue it for a short distance. This was our position with reference to harbours. With regard to commencing any of the other twelve great Harbours of Refuge recommended by the Commissioners, he confessed he thought the Government ought to pause, and consider exactly where the harbours should most properly be placed;—because the responsibility rested with the Government, and there were so many questions involved in the consideration of the question, that he should be very sorry to pledge himself to any one of the harbours brought before them. The noble Marquess wished for a Committee of Inquiry on the subject; but if his Committee was to be in the words of the Motion, “to inquire how far it may be practicable to afford better shelter for shipping on our coasts than is at present afforded, by the adoption of some plan for the construction of breakwaters and harbours better adapted than the system of solid masonry,” he confessed he did not see much use in it, or the use of entering on another inquiry on the subject of floating breakwaters. He believed that, even with the authority of the noble Lords that had been on that Committee, no Board of Admiralty would ever venture to construct such a floating breakwater. He did not think that such a Committee would be of any use. The subject would be much better left to the responsibility of the Government, who would, when they had matured their plans, state to the House on their responsibility what harbours they thought should be constructed.

The Duke of Somerset

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that if the noble Duke had intimated that he intended to carry out the views of the Commissioners, or had he intimated that it was his intention to cause any public money to be laid out without grave considerations as to the way in which it would be expended, he should have found it necessary to enter into the question of harbours of refuge. But the proposition of the noble Marquess was entirely of a different description; all he proposed being that a Committee should be appointed to ascertain whether floating breakwaters could be constructed of such a character as to afford shelter at a moderate cost. He proposed that an experiment should be tried, but that, beforehand, there should be an examination by a Committee. For his own part he was much inclined to believe that what the noble Duke had stated was true as to the risks that characterized floating breakwaters. The noble Duke had referred to two unsuccessful experiments; but notwithstanding he (the Earl of Hardwicke) thought they might try the experiment of floating breakwaters on a small scale; that would not entail a great loss if they failed. He was strongly of opinion that they could secure a breakwater in such a manner that it would not fail; that it might be formed so as to oppose the smallest resistance to the sea; and that it might be secured by anchors and cables so as to be rendered perfectly safe. They all knew that there were certain parts of the coast, such as Yarmouth and Hastings, frequented by fishing boats, where the boats were built for beaching, and that when heavy weather came on they ran for the shore and beached themselves. But beaching was only practicable under certain circumstances, and if these circumstances did not present themselves the boats were destroyed. The experiment he should like to see tried would be floating breakwaters, covering a certain portion of beach, not for vessels to anchor behind, but simply to secure beaching for these boats. If they could apply the test in that experimental manner, and without the expenditure of a large sum of money, they would prove satisfactorily the value of floating breakwaters, and render great service to the fishermen. That was the only experiment he was disposed to try. In this way they would be able to lay before Parliament the best mode and form of construction to be adopted. The question was now so much advocated, and with so much warmth, that it was painful for the House to be in the position of being thought to be opposed to harbours of refuge, and of being content to see thousands of lives and millions of property sacrificed; but ill-found as vessels now too often were, he feared that if harbours of refuge were studied all along the coast, vessels would be sent to sea in a still worse state, and that the owners would take advantage of these harbours to relieve themselves from sufficient outlay. The harbours, moreover, proposed by the Commissioners would of themselves most probably become utterly useless in a short time, because the laws of nature always came in, and the tidal flow of the rivers interfered—in some cases extending the bar, and in others converting them into a mud trap. The question of a harbour of refuge was one more for a naturalist than for engineers, to whom it was too frequently an object to get a great job of masonry, and a commission of 5 or 10 per cent on the outlay. Under these circumstances it became hardly possible for the Government to undertake the question of harbours of refuge on the great scale proposed; but he did think it would be perfectly easy to construct a breakwater of timber which should settle the question with regard to the safety, durability, and expense of a breakwater of that description. As to the loss of life which occurred the other day off Yarmouth, no harbour of refuge could have prevented that. If those smacks had run for the beach early in the gale none would have been lost, but they foundered at sea owing to the tenacity with which they stuck to their nets.

THE EARL OF BANDON thought that if the Report of the Commission on Tidal Harbours, which was laid before Parliament some years ago, were completed, it would be very advantageous, and would give valuable information. He believed that at a very trifling expense a most valuable harbour might be completed on the south-west coast of Cork in the Long Island Channel. At present it was only a blind harbour, and he believed it was the intention, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, to carry out the improvement. As mention had been made of breakwaters in connection with the national defences, he wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to provide defences on the south coast of Ireland to the west of Cork. Bantry Bay was without a single gun for the protection of the district.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET thought that no further defences were required for Bantry Bay or Cork Harbour than the vessels which would be stationed there. Blockships and others would furnish as good a protection as could be supplied.

THE EARL OF DERBY said there was a very important point, though unconnected with the subject immediately before the House. He wished to know how soon any proposition would be made, or any explanations given as to the intentions of the Government respecting the defences of the country. There had now been lying before Parliament for a considerable time a Report which involved an enormous expenditure, and upon which it was very important that the intentions of her Majesty's Government should be known, so that there might be ample time for the discussion of any proposition submitted by them. The Session was now advancing so rapidly to its close that he should probably be pardoned for taking this opportunity of asking how soon they might expect a statement on this subject, and how far the Government intended to carry out the recommendations of the Commissioners on the National Defences.

EARL GRANVILLE replied that the proposal, whatever it was, would be made in the other House. He was not now prepared to give any other answer to his noble Friend's question.

LORD BROUGHAM considered the question of the defences of the country to be of the most vital importance. Every one must have been impressed with the proud scene that presented itself on Saturday, and every one must have been struck with the facility with which a great military force of Volunteers—and in saying so he made no distinction between Volunteers and troops of all services—were moved from one part of the country to another, and it was manifest that this facility would form an important element in our national defence. The Volunteer review in Hyde Park was, indeed, a proud scene, and he had to suggest that it should be repeated in other parts of the country, and that there should be an assemblage of the Volunteers in Yorkshire, in Lincolnshire, in Devonshire, and in the eastern and south-eastern parts of the island. Were that done he believed that the feeling that would be produced would be one of the happiest in its effects on the Volunteer system of this country, and that it would also have the happiest effect upon other countries.

THE EARL OF CAITHNESS said, that the harbour at Wick was one of the most useful in existence, and had stood for a long time, and not a stone had been removed during the late stormy season; and although he was not an advocate for experiments in general, seeing that they were costly, he believed that if an experiment could be carried out on a small scale in building piers or harbours without the introduction of lime or cement, especially at low water, it would be a great benefit. He had himself built a small pier in this way, that for two years had stood a succession of gales. No doubt in making harbours, engineers had the elements to contend with, and had to fight against the water, but they forgot the force the water had in coming up; and that every time it did so, it laid stress on the masonry, which was sooner or later disturbed. But as regarded the harbour of Wick, additional works for the protection of the harbours were much required. Next month, when the fishing season began, 1,000 boats would leave every night with at least 5,000 men, and should there come on a gale of wind from the east or south-east, they were left entirely to the mercy of the sea. He had seen a change of wind in a few minutes which made it impossible for them to enter the harbour.

The Earl of Hardwicke

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE very much approved the suggestion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke) as to trying the experiment of floating breakwaters for the purpose of protecting the beaching of boats; but he thought the plan would be useful not only for the protection of beaching but also for affording facilities for launching life-boats. The noble Duke had refused to grant a Committee to inquire into the matter, and he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) did not envy the noble Duke and his colleagues the burden of responsibility which they had taken upon themselves, in refusing to accede to the Motion or to carry out the proposals of the Committee which had sat on harbours of refuge, though four out of every five men who knew anything about the matter were of opinion that at a small cost immense protection might be afforded to seamen and to trade. He believed, however, that they would ultimately be forced to take some steps.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the Government had not refused to accede to the Motion of the noble Marquess. For himself he had not the necessary knowledge to enable him to form an opinion upon the matter, and indeed he was so destitute of scientific knowledge that he should have doubted, if his noble Friend had not so stated, that the strength of holding of the proposed breakwaters could be tried any day. He should have thought that it could only be tried during very rough weather. If, however, his noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde) had ascertained that those Peers who felt an interest in this matter, and were competent to deal with it, were willing to sit upon a Select Committee upon it he should have no objection to granting such a Committee if the noble Marquess would renew his Motion on Friday. He must say, however, that three inquiries were now going on in the other Houses which it was necessary that officers of the Admiralty should attend for the purpose of giving evidence; and a fourth inquiry also necessitating their presence would bear hardly upon them.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he would withdraw the Motion with the purpose of renewing it to-morrow.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

CHINA.—CONDUCT OF THE COLONIAL OFFICE.

PETITION FOR INQUIRY.

EARL GREY presented a Petition of George Crawshaw, Robert Bainbridge, and George Hobart, for inquiry into the conduct of the Colonial Office with respect to Pirates in China. The petitioners complained that a number of European sailors had committed a piratical attack upon a Chinese village, and one of them, when indicted for misdemeanour, pleaded "guilty," but in extenuation of his conduct he stated that before he had committed the act he had made the intention known to an officer of the local Government, who offered no opposition whatever. Upon this the Court having received the plea of "guilty," inflicted no punishment upon the prisoner. The petition stated that a charge of a most grave kind had been brought against another member of the local Government, and in an action which was consequently instituted by him the jury found a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the charge was true. He knew nothing whatever of the transactions adverted to by the Petitioners beyond what had appeared in the newspapers; but he submitted that the state of affairs at Hong Kong, and the conduct of persons connected with that colony required very serious attention.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, his noble Friend had allowed him to see the Petition ten days ago, and at that time the Government had no information with respect to the proceedings referred to. He was not aware that his noble Friend was about to present the petition that evening, or he would have ascertained whether there was any information upon the matter in the despatches which had just arrived from Hong Kong. With reference to the other part of the charge of the petition, he could assure the House that there had been no such neglect on the part of the Colonial Office, as the petitioners supposed. The petition was from a number of persons who had constituted themselves into "a Committee of Foreign Affairs," and who met at Newcastle and at Sheffield. From the constant correspondence which they kept up with him—he must say not in the most civil terms—they seemed to think it was wrong if everything was not communicated to them which took place in reference to the Government of our Colonies. As a Minister of the Crown he did not feel disposed to lay information before the Foreign Affairs Committee as to all the despatches he received from or the instructions he gave to Colonial Governors. The public, however, were not without information upon this particular subject, for an enormous blue-book had recently been printed by the Colonial Office, much of which he must say reflected but little credit upon many parts of the service at Hong Kong. On his appointment to the Colonial Office he found that his predecessor had just before appointed a new Governor for Hong Kong in consequence of the anticipated return of Sir John Bowring. He (the Duke of Newcastle) saw the new Governor, Sir Hercules Robinson, and directed him to make inquiries into the charges which had been made by Mr. Chisholm Austey and others, cautioning him however against stirring up again all that mass of mud which appeared to have accumulated over the society of Hong Kong; and he had subsequently addressed a despatch to the Governor in reference to the affair. He believed that the inquiry was being prosecuted, but no result had been at present arrived at. He was bound to add, though with the greatest possible regret, that in no part of Her Majesty's dominions was libel so rife and flagrant as at Hong Kong. For men to libel one another in the most reckless manner seemed to have become the normal state of society in that island. There had been prosecutions for libel, some of which were successful, and some not successful; but he mentioned this to caution their Lordships against placing the same amount of credit in statements in Hong Kong newspapers, unless authenticated by other circumstances, as, he was happy to say, they were accustomed to place in statements published in English newspapers. The inquiries into these charges had not been neglected, and he hoped that those who were interested in the well-being and respectability of the society of Hong Kong would further any efforts which he might make to redeem the colony from the evil reputation which in consequence of these transactions attached to it.

The Duke of Newcastle

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE wished to say a few words in reference to the Foreign Affairs Committee, who he believed could hardly think it was the duty of a public office to furnish all their correspondence; but if they did so think they deserved to be mistaken. It was indeed impossible for the Government to answer communications of such a kind as that which had been referred to. He was, however, rather inclined to applaud these associations. The members of this Committee had instructed themselves to the best of their ability in foreign affairs, and they had acquired a surprising amount of knowledge, though they had fallen no doubt into some mistakes. They took a great deal of pains to read all Parliamentary papers; they debated questions in a debating society; and, upon the whole, a deal of information was obtained by—he believed—a body of artisans. He had had a deputation from them before him, and he found them extremely well-informed men; and, he must say, that he on his part liked to forward the objects of any body of men who took an interest in the affairs of the empire. He, however, hoped that they would not think themselves treated disrespectfully if the Government did not find time to answer their correspondence.

Petition to lie on the table.

LAW OF EVIDENCE FURTHER AMENDMENT BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. READ 1^a.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he rose to present a Bill to their Lordships for the further amendment of the Law of Evidence in Criminal Cases, and to request them to read it a first time. Last year, and the year before also, he presented a Bill to their Lordships in reference to evidence in criminal cases, which, however, he was unable to carry in consequence of the serious objections made to it by his noble Friends the Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, and Lord Chelmsford; but he yielded rather to their reluctance than to their reasons. The object of that Bill was to enable defendants in criminal cases to enjoy the same benefit which defendants in civil cases now enjoyed, of being examined, only with this difference—that in criminal cases the examination was to be voluntary, and not compulsory; any defendant might volunteer to be examined on oath, but on so doing he subjected himself to cross-examination and to a prosecution for perjury if he made a false statement. The Bill of last year applied to all kinds of criminal cases, and this circumstance gave rise to serious objections by his noble and learned Friends. He retained his own opinion; but, in the hope that he should free himself from those objections, he proposed by this Bill to confine the right of defendants to be examined as witnesses in their own behalf to cases of misdemeanour, in which the prosecutor was himself examined. It was said with regard to the former Bill, that a person charged with felony would be likely to take the chance of escaping by perjury, for which the punishment was much lighter; but that argument did not apply to this Bill, as there was scarcely any misdemeanour in which the punishment was materially graver than the punishment for perjury. He would not enter further into explanations, as the whole matter would be discussed on the second reading, beyond reminding their Lordships of a remarkable case, in which a gentleman was recently convicted when his mouth was closed, and upon whose evidence, subsequently, the principal witness against him, was convicted of perjury. The gentleman who was convicted had been pardoned, and the Royal clemency had been extended to the very young person who was convicted on the second trial. This remarkable case showed the necessity for such an alteration of the law as he recommended.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would certainly have met the re-introduction of the former Bill of his noble and learned Friend with the most strenuous opposition, as its effect would have been entirely to alter the administration of justice in this country. The modified proposal which was now made deserved great consideration, but would require to be carefully limited. The measure could not be extended to all misdemeanours, because in some cases the distinction between misdemeanour and felony was purely technical. He was inclined to think, however, that, as an exception to the general rule, permission to give evidence might be extended to the defendant in such cases as assault and libel, where the prosecutor appeared as one of the leading witnesses against him.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that the way in which French criminal jurisprudence was conducted was sufficient to raise the strongest objection to the cross-examination of accused parties. That system was chiefly objectionable from being conducted by the Judge. Anything more preposterous, cruel, or inhuman, could not be conceived. But it was not surprising that it should prevail in a country where the connection of a despot and a mob was considered the perfection of government, and what was more, of free government. It would be impossible for such a principle ever to be admitted here, unless this country should come to the conclusion that the power of a single individual and a mob was the most eligible form of government.

Bill read 1st.

House adjourned at a Quarter past
Seven o'Clock, till To-morrow,
Half-past Ten o'Clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, June 28, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW MEMBER SWORN.—For Belfast, Samuel Gibson Getty, esquire.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Sale of Gas Act Amendment (No. 3).

2^o Local Taxation Returns.

3^o Universities and College Estates; Isle of Man Harbours.

EUROPEAN FORCES (INDIA) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read; Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. ARTHUR MILLS said, that in venturing to offer any impediment to the further progress of this measure, he must ask the favourable construction of hon. Gentlemen who might differ from him in opinion as to the motives by which he was actuated in offering that impediment. The circumstances, however, of the discussion on the first reading of the measure were sufficient to negative the suspicion that opposition to its further progress proceeded from party motives. He was only speaking the sentiments of all the Members of that House when he declared that any one who would make the difficult and complicated problem of Indian politics the subject of party discussions would be altogether unworthy of confidence. The imputation which had been levelled against those who ventured to differ from the right hon.

[First Night.

Gentleman the Secretary of State for India, that they were actuated by antiquated Indian prejudices, did not affect him, (Mr. Mills) for he had zealously supported both the propositions made in 1858 for the transfer of the Government of India from the Company to the Crown. The opposition which he offered to this Bill rested simply upon public grounds. It might be urged that on a purely military question it was somewhat incongruous for a civilian to intrude an opinion on the House, but it should be remembered that it was not alone a military but an Imperial question of the highest magnitude, in the right solution of which the loss or retention of our Indian empire was inextricably involved. Civilians likewise, though uninformed on military details, had the advantage of being free from military prejudices and jealousies. The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon, the late Secretary of State for War (General Peel), had stated that in the divisions of the Indian Army Commission on their Report, the officers of the Line were uniformly to be found on one side, and the officers of the local army on the other, and that it could always be inferred which way a man was going to give his evidence from the fact of his belonging to one or other of those military services.

It would be very advantageous if in discussing so complicated and serious a question they could get rid of the adventitious circumstances and professional rivalries which had thus been imported into it. If the charges against the Government, that in bringing forward this measure their only desire was to satisfy the voracious appetite of the Horse Guards for patronage and power had been exaggerated, equally unjustifiable and uncalled for had been the allegations with regard to those who took the opposite view of the question. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India, in apologizing for the circumstance of the Indian Council having unanimously opposed themselves to his project, gave as a reason that if it passed into law they would be deprived of the power and influence which they now possessed. He regretted very much to hear such an imputation cast upon them, because it amounted to nothing less than a statement that fifteen distinguished men had sacrificed their sense of public duty to the interests of private ambition. The observation, moreover, was singularly inaccurate, for it so happened that one of the most distinguished Members of the Council, Sir John Lawrence, long before this question was mooted, himself proposed a scheme for the re-organization of the Native army of India, based on the system of competitive examination, which would equally have deprived them of that military patronage which was the most substantial symbol of their power. It seemed to him disgraceful that a question of such magnitude as that of the re-organization of the Indian army should be mixed up with considerations of a personal character, and imputations based upon official jealousies. It was not a vulgar question of a scramble for patronage between two departments of the Executive Government, but a far more vital question—namely, by what means the military resources of Great Britain could be so economized and applied as to preserve the allegiance of 200,000,000 subjects of the British Empire. The issue it involved was no less vital than whether an ancient and well-tried machinery by which we had won our Indian Empire, and which during the vicissitudes of 100 years had not been found wanting in the hour of need, should summarily be dispensed with, and that, too, without any substitute, so far as the House of Commons was aware, being provided in its place.

Mr. Arthur Mills

In addressing himself to the proposition of the Government on the subject, he should deal with it from a financial, sanitary, and political point of view, premising that under the first of these heads it was contended that the amalgamation of the local European force in India with the Line would tend to the promotion of economy. Now, it was very difficult, in the absence of any definite scheme for replacing that local army, to argue with respect to the question at issue satisfactorily; but, be that as it might, it was in evidence that the consequence of the passing of this measure would be an increased charge to the amount of something like £200,000 a year on the revenues of India, arising from the system of maintaining and relieving the regiments of the Line which were to be substituted for the local army. And he should like to know what answer we could return to an appeal from India in 1862, in case the land, or opium, or salt revenue in that country should fall short; if in 1860 on grounds of Imperial convenience, we adopted a course the effect of which would be to saddle her revenues with £200,000 a year more than the sum with which they were charged under the present system. But the adoption of the Government scheme involved a still graver consequence. It was one of those many steps by which we had unconsciously been sliding into an Imperial guarantee for the expenditure of India. If Parliament were determined to adopt the principle of an Imperial guarantee, let them do so with their eyes open; but of all things he warned them against sliding unconsciously into the adoption of this principle.

Next, as to the sanitary question. It had been argued with considerable force on both sides, that much of the evidence which had been laid before the Commission served only to perplex the public mind. It was said that the regiments of the Line were decimated before they were acclimatized. He had no doubt that some portions of the evidence on this point had been put forth unguardedly; but, at all events, the fact remained that the mortality among those Europeans who went out to India for a period of fifteen years was much greater during the first than in the last five years of their stay, and if this was found to be the case with educated men who were more likely to take sanitary precautions, surely the presumption was in favour of the longevity of the private soldiers of a local force as compared with men who had not learned to suit their habits to the exigencies of the climate. The balance of the sanitary argument was at all events in favour of a local army.

The main argument, however, in support of the scheme of amalgamation was that which was based upon political grounds. It was urged by the advocates of that scheme that the armies of one and the same State ought to be homogeneous, for the purpose of securing the loyalty of the troops and avoiding the rivalries between distinct services, which it was said were otherwise liable to be created. Now, he confessed that was an argument which at first sight seemed to be almost unanswerable; but the reply which had uniformly been given by the men of greatest experience to questions on the point put by the Commission was, that it was impossible to reason with respect to it from analogy to what took place in other countries, inasmuch as relations similar to those between this country and India had never been known to exist in the case of any other States. While dealing with that particular topic, he would refer to an extract of a letter written by Colonel Durand to the Secretary of State for India, dated November 29, 1859. Colonel Durand said,—

“The nice distinctions of a constitutional government are contradictory puzzles in the East. There, ideas retain all the simplicity which ages of aristocratic power have impressed upon the character of Asiatic nations. The Governor General is now regarded by the chiefs and people of India as being really, not nominally, at the head of three great armies, reinforced according to circumstances by a contingent of Her Majesty's line, a fourth great and purely European army, a reserve of indefinite magnitude; they know, and the officers and men know, that the strength, organization, and discipline of the three Indian armies, and the welfare and advancement of every soul in them, depend upon the Governor General. It will be difficult to the Eastern mind, whatever it may be to the English mind, to comprehend how this relation between the Indian armies and the Governor General can cease, without his power and influence being diminished; and it will be hard satisfactorily to explain why it should happen that, as soon as a Governor General becomes Her Majesty's Viceroy and the immediate representative of the Crown, instead of the fact adding to the real power and dignity of his position, as India was taught to anticipate, it strips him of authority, and renders him unworthy of being treated with the same confidence, and of enjoying the same power, as when the delegate of the East India Company. From the Dardanelles to Japan the fixed idea is, that he who rules and manages the army, rules the State, and that to lose the sway of the army is to drop the reins of empire. Nowhere more than in India is it ingrained in the minds of the people that the sword and the sceptre are synonymous terms; it is the one article of faith upon which 200,000,000 of people agree, and it will be found as difficult to eradicate as any other dogma of the Hindoo, Buddhist, or Moslem hordes under the British rule.”

Now, the idea which seemed to him to pervade that expression of opinion on the part of a distinguished military officer was that it was hopeless for England to attempt to govern India anywhere else than in India, and that if we desired to succeed in the administration of her affairs we could only effect our object by showing some deference to Asiatic feelings—it might be to Asiatic prejudices. He should ask hon. Members, then, to weigh well the question whether the contemplated fusion of the two armies was not calculated to shake our rule in India by destroying that faith which the Natives had hitherto reposed on the Governor General as the centre of both civil and military authority. The argument, however, on which those who were in favour of amalgamation placed most reliance was that which was based on the so-called mutiny of the local army in respect of the claim for bounty on re-enlistment, it being contended that that army could not in consequence be trusted for the future, and ought, therefore, to be disbanded. Now, he held in his hand an extract from a minute of Sir James Outram.

The paragraphs of this Minute relative to this matter ran as follows :—

“ Dated, Calcutta, January 7, 1860.

“ The information lately received from England, though not of a strictly official nature, leads me to apprehend that the amalgamation of Her Majesty's Indian Forces with the British army is almost decided on.

“ Believing, as I do, that that measure, if carried out, will prove most injurious to this country, and that it will inflict grievous injustice on the servants of the East India Company, I have deemed it my duty to record a solemn protest against its adoption.

“ That my protest will influence the issue, I do not venture to hope ; but, for the ease of my conscience, I am desirous that it should be sent home while yet the question is under discussion.

“ The information received by the last few mails leads me to infer that public opinion in England, which at one time preponderated in favour of the maintenance of a local European force in India, has begun to manifest an opposite tendency, and the explanation given of this change of sentiment is the so-called “ mutiny ” of a portion of the European troops who enlisted for the East India Company.

“ To cite the recent partial breaking up of the late East India Company's European troops as an argument against the maintenance of a local European force in India, appears to me illogical, ungenerous—I had almost said disingenuous.

“ Addressing those who are conversant with all the facts of the case, I require not to point out the absurd and cruel exaggerations that have been propagated in reference to the conduct of our European remonstrants. These, however, have doubtless had considerable influence in effecting the change said to have recently taken place in the public mind of England on the question of the maintenance of a local army, and it is to be hoped that they will be most fully exposed by Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India when the question comes to be discussed in Parliament, so that no Member of either House may give a vote to the prejudice of the existing institutions of India, under erroneous impressions regarding the language and the acts of those soldiers who have recently obtained their discharge.

“ But, even had the behaviour of these men not been exaggerated, had all the fables related of them been true, common justice and common sense demand that the circumstances under which the men acted should be fairly represented to Parliament, and considerably reviewed by that august body.

“ That our soldiers had any legal right to the alternative of discharge or re-enlistment, I do not admit. But it must be borne in mind that in the opinion of a very large proportion of the public, both in this country and in England, their moral claims to the alternative demanded by them were so strong as almost to be irresistible ; that, long before their demand was mooted, while yet the transference of India to the direct management of the Crown was under discussion, the nobleman who is now at the head of Her Majesty's Government enunciated as an obvious truism admitting of no doubt, the proposition that, as a matter of course, the men would be offered the alternative of discharge or re-enlistment.

“ When the transfer was being carried out, Lord Palmerston had become Prime Minister. No hint was given that he had ceased to regard the late Company's European troops as entitled to that alternative of discharge or re-enlistment which a few short months before he had represented to be their absolute moral right. It was simply intimated to the soldiers that the alternative would not be offered them, and for justification of the refusal, they were referred to the opinions of the law officers of the Crown, according to whose dictum the men could not enforce their claims at law.

“ Bear in mind how unspeakably great had been our recent obligations to the European troops of the East India Company as well as to their glorious comrades of the Royal army, who had cheerfully laid down their lives to save an empire that then appeared tottering to its fall. And, doing this, we must admit that some allowance should be made for their conduct.

“ But, even were it otherwise, even had the conduct of a portion of the late East India Company's troops been as bad as their bitterest enemies and most unscrupulous detractors would dare to paint it, even were there no extenuating considerations to urge in their behalf, what then ? It was not because they were a local force that they misconducted themselves, but because they conceived themselves to have been treated with deliberate injustice and contumely. And will any advocate of amalgamation venture to insinuate that, had Her Majesty's regiments in India conceived themselves treated in the same fashion, they would not have behaved in precisely the same manner ? Will any amalgamationist have the hardihood to maintain that ? Aye, even within a comparatively recent period—soldiers and sailors of Her Majesty's service have not in more than one instance evinced very manifest symptoms of insubordination under a sense of neglect and injury ? If so, then I take the liberty to declare that his information is decidedly imperfect or his memory very treacherous.

He had in his hand the opinions expressed by Lord Gough, Lord Hardinge, and Sir Charles Napier with regard to the uniform gallantry and discipline of the local European army ; but he would not quote them. He would venture, however, to say that the record of their achievements was the history of our Indian Empire. Yesterday was the third anniversary of the Massacre of Cawnpore, which brought death and desolation to a thousand English homes. Had they forgotten that they were mainly indebted to the local European army, a distinguished portion of which fought their way side by side with the Royal troops, under Havelock, to Cawnpore, for the vindication of the honour of England and of outraged humanity ? He must say it would appear rather ungenerous if they signalized their gratitude by giving a vote which would practically have the effect of disbanding that army, of declaring that their past services should be ignored, and that the traditionary glories with which they had covered themselves should be entirely forgotten, because they had, under circumstances of great provocation, under the stimulus of official encouragement, forgotten, he would rather say, misapprehended, for a moment, their duty to their country.

Mr. Arthur Mills

But, unfair as were the grounds on which this measure was justified, and strong as the arguments were against the abolition of the local European army, he complained far more of the mode in which the Government proposed to effect their object than of the object itself. So important was it that no delay should take place in the settlement of this question that if he believed the mode proposed by Government would settle it at once he would waive his objections. But would it have that effect? What was the course which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India had taken on this subject? On the 12th of June he introduced a measure to Parliament, the object of which was to discontinue enlistment in this country for the local Indian army, with the view of testing the opinion of the House on a question of infinitely greater magnitude in its consequences than the question of the transfer of India from the Company to the Crown. It was only on the 17th of May that for the first time the right hon. Gentleman had even affected to ask the opinion of the Indian Council on the subject. True, he might have privately consulted several individual members of the Council; but for what purpose was the Council constituted? Was it not intended that they should be bond fide councillors on matters of real importance to India? This question had been two years in suspense, and had challenged the most violent controversy—a conflict of opinion almost unprecedented in the annals of our Indian empire; yet all the right hon. Gentleman did was to give the Council an opportunity of expressing their dissent at the eleventh hour from a measure adopted by him in spite of their remonstrance, and to the main principle, of which they were unanimously opposed. On the 17th of May last, having considered the question, and having agreed with the Cabinet on the mode in which he proposed to bring the measure forward, he then invited the opinion of his Council. But why talk of consulting his Council when he had already decided on the measure to be brought forward? The conduct of the right hon. Gentleman in this matter reminded him of the old story of the gentleman who had engaged to get married, had the settlements drawn up, and paid the attorney's bill, and when about to enter the church turned round to ask his intimate Friend whether he was taking a prudent step. He thought it better that the Council for India should be disbanded rather than that a body of men, selected specially for their knowledge of Indian affairs, should be thus ignored on a question which vitally affected the interests of India. But that was not all. The right hon. Gentleman propounded no scheme whatever as a substitute for what he meant to abolish. Was it not right that Parliament should know whether the rights and privileges guaranteed to the officers of the Indian army by the Act of 1858 were to be equitably respected? But, what was still more important, how was the military occupation of India to be provided for? There was actually no provision for this whatever. The right hon. Gentleman said something of a scheme for a local staff corps, which was rather hazily sketched out; he also spoke of the appointment of a Committee or Commission if this Bill were passed to select one of the four or five schemes propounded for carrying out the details. Was it to be tolerated that the right hon. Gentleman should not only ignore the Council, but withdraw from the House of Commons the consideration of the main principles on which such a measure was to rest? If it were to be an independent Committee or Commission, what security would there be that, after sitting for a year they would not be divided by conflicting opinions? Again, if it were not to be an independent Committee, but a mere team of clerks to obey the dictates of the right hon. Gentleman, then Parliament would be deprived of its prerogative as the ultimate Court of Appeal on a question of this kind. It could not be supposed that the matter was to be referred to the Indian Council, because that body had been already ignored; but if it were referred to an independent Commission, no progress would be made by reading this Bill a second time. The only effect of doing so would probably be to suspend the question for another two years. The right hon. Gentleman ought bond fide to have propounded to Parliament his views as to the mode in which the question should be settled; and then, when the opinion of the House had been fairly challenged, they might have considered how they could so economize our military resources as to retain our empire in India. He for one must enter his emphatic protest against a course which involved the alternative of indefinite delay, or the setting of a most dangerous and unconstitutional precedent. It was not his desire to offer any factious opposition; it was not his wish to impede the Government in the administration of India, but he felt that he should do more harm than good by acceding to the second reading of the Bill. On these grounds, then, and because the Government had propounded no scheme whatever as a substitute for the machinery which they proposed to abolish, and also because the mode in which it was proposed to carry out their object was likely to lead to a most unconstitutional and dangerous precedent, he begged leave to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now,' stand part of the Question."

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, he rose to second the Amendment, although he should not have addressed the House if he had not felt strongly the possible danger of the course in which Her Majesty's Government were about to embark. They had proposed a plan referring to two important points in the military organization of the Indian Empire. The one was to deprive the Indian Government of the power they had hitherto enjoyed of raising British troops for service in India, and the other was the organization of a Native army on a plan which, in his mind, seemed fraught with such difficulties, that he was surprised it had not received more attention in that House. If the question had merely conceived the organization of the British troops in India—and his opinion strongly leaned to the maintenance of a local force—he would not have offered a decided opposition to the proposition of the Government in that stage of the Bill; but he held it to be impossible to separate the military question from the other parts of the scheme involving financial and political considerations. The right hon. Baronet truly said it was not a mere Indian question nor a mere military one. It involved questions of patronage of the highest magnitude and political considerations affecting the Government of India, and he might almost say affecting the Parliamentary Government at home. If he were merely invited to say whether he would prefer that the European troops in India should consist either of a local force only, or of troops of the Line only, he should have unhesitatingly voted in favour of the latter, because there must be grave objections to the prolonged maintenance in that part of our empire of a large European force without renewal by reliefs from home, and without the check afforded by the strictly national troops of the Line. Important instances had occurred in the history of India in which serious discontents had broken out among the officers of the local force, causing serious embarrassment to the Government; and they had given rise to proposals for wholly doing away with local troops, and endeavouring to unite the whole military administration of India under one system. But those proposals gave way, not as the right hon. Gentleman had stated, to the opposition of the East India Directors, but to the inherent difficulties of the subject, and the changes of opinion which occurred in the minds of eminent men in proportion as they more deeply investigated it. A stronger instance of this kind could not be cited than the change of opinion which Lord Cornwallis himself underwent, evidence of which could be traced throughout the correspondence of that distinguished statesman. They must have a local force as regarded the Native troops; and the only question on which the House was called upon to Vote at present was, whether that force should be of an inferior—he might almost say degraded—character, or whether it should be put in such a position as respected numbers and efficiency as would give support to the Government of India, and insure their fair treatment by the Government at home. There were grave preliminary objections to the manner in which this subject had been introduced. The measure really involved this question—namely, whether they should maintain the system of home Government for India that was established only two years ago. But a great blow would be given to that system if the Indian Minister could bring forward with all the authority of the Government a measure of that magnitude in opposition to the unanimous voice of the Indian Council in this country, as well as in opposition to the opinion of the Governor General of India and of his Council, with the single exception of the Commander-in-Chief. It would destroy at once the efficiency of the administration in India as a check upon the home Government, and make its total abolition a mere question of time with any Ministry who might deem such a step desirable. It was decided two years ago that the Indian Government should be responsible to Parliament; but the House should remember that Parliament would thereby incur reciprocal responsibilities. He was surprised to hear the right hon. Baronet state that the additional burden to be imposed upon the finances of India by the employment of the proposed increased number of troops of the Line in that country, would amount only to £100,000 or £200,000. Why, that sum would scarcely cover the extra expense of transport, and would make no provision for many other expenses to which the adoption of this system would give rise. At present the volunteering for local service of men from regiments which were returning from India was a great source of economy, which would not exist under the right hon. Gentleman's plan. Men might, indeed, be allowed to volunteer from one regiment of the Line to another; but if they were, what would become of the advantage which it was supposed would be derived from making the reliefs more frequent, so as not to have any large body of troops stationed in India for a long period of time? But the question of expenditure had an English as well as an Indian bearing. If we had so large a force as 80,000 troops of the Line in India, it would be necessary to increase our home garrison in order to provide the necessary reliefs for them. It might be that a home garrison on its present scale would be sufficient to provide those reliefs; but he trusted the House would seriously consider the responsibility they were incurring before they adopted the course proposed. When he first entered Parliament, the zeal for economy was as hot as it now was for expenditure; but those who advocated a reduction of the forces in this country were always met with the reply, that it was necessary to maintain troops here, upon an adequate scale, to provide for the garrisons established throughout the Colonies. He warned the House that if they adopted the present measure, they would always hereafter be met, whenever a proposal was made with regard to the expediency of reducing the forces, by the declaration that it would be impossible to submit to any reduction on account of the necessity of maintaining the permanent garrison established in India. These considerations alone ought to induce the House to pause before they assented to this measure; but if they were insufficient, the effect which it would have upon the patronage of the British army, and of the Native army in India, ought to prevail with them. The right hon. Baronet proposed that in future the officers of the Native army should be entirely appointed by selection from the Queen's forces. He would not enter into the question as to what security there was that the system of selection would be an efficient one; but he must not omit to point out that the adoption of such a plan would greatly increase the patronage at the disposal of the military administration in this country; because in proportion as officers were removed from the Queen's forces and appointed to commands in the Native army, would the Commissions at the disposal of the authorities increase. This question of patronage was considered by the House two years ago, and was settled in the India Bill then passed; but the right hon. Baronet had, with a stroke of his pen, set aside the provisions of that Act of Parliament. The right hon. Baronet assumed that it was necessary, for the security of India, that we should maintain there an European army of 80,000 men; he then said that that force must be either a local army or troops of the Line; and, lastly, he asserted that the recent mutiny furnished an unanswerable argument against the employment of a local force. He disputed all these positions. It was a mistake to suppose that we must place our reliance mainly upon British troops. For the security of India it was necessary that there should be a large Native army; and he was satisfied that no such force of British troops as that proposed by the right hon. Baronet would be permanently maintained in that country. It might be raised; but if danger arose at home, or war broke out with any foreign country, no consideration with regard to India would prevent the Government from withdrawing from that country a considerable portion of the European troops, and leaving the defence of that empire in a great measure to Native soldiers. But it was said we never could return to that confidence in the Native troops that we entertained before the mutiny. He fully shared in that opinion, and hoped we never should do so. He trusted that we should never again return to that false confidence which led us to leave our great arsenals entirely in the hands of Native troops, and territories of considerable extent unprotected by the presence of any British force. Still there was a wide margin between an European army of 40,000 men, which was the amount at which it stood previous to the mutiny, and the numbers proposed by the right hon. Baronet. There was reason to hope that we should be able in a few years to reduce the European garrisons in India considerably, as confidence was restored in Bengal, to the standard at which it existed in Bombay and Madras. But apart from that, it was obvious that as the railway system was completed—and in the course of a couple years there was reason to believe that it would extend to Agra and Upper India, as well as in the Madras and Bombay Presidencies—the improved means of communication would render a much reduced European force as efficient as was the large force now maintained in those countries. Consequently he held that they were by no means driven to the alternative which the right hon. Gentleman had placed before the House, of maintaining either a local army, or an army of the Line in India upon the large scale he proposed.

Mr. Arthur Mills

[First Night.]

The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State had quoted the opinions of high military authorities in support of his view of the subject. Those opinions were doubtless entitled to great weight; but he did not think the Secretary of State was justified in the statement he made as to the great change of opinion which had taken place in India. It was true a change had occurred, but it was of a very minor kind, and was scarcely attributable to the recent mutiny in the Bengal army. Amongst others, the right hon. Gentleman had referred, in confirmation of his opinions, to the authority of a very gallant officer—Colonel Durand. He (Sir Edward Colebrooke) was quite willing to admit the high authority of Colonel Durand; but that officer did not represent the opinions of all the military officers who had dealt with the question. The right hon. Gentleman had scarcely made his statement when there appeared a Minute from the Governor General of India, who held a strong opinion in favour of a local force, and who stated that, even if it were not kept up to an equality with the Royal troops in India, which he thought it ought to be, still he would be very glad to have it on a smaller scale in any numbers the Government might decide. Again, it appeared from the papers before them that the opinion of Sir Patrick Grant, which had been relied on in favour of a local force, had reference to the then condition of the Indian Government, and that when the Government was changed, he thought there came a necessity for a great change in the Indian army. So with regard to Sir William Mansfield; he had always been opposed to the policy of maintaining a European local force, and only advocated it for a time as a matter of expediency during the period of transition. Any change, therefore, that had occurred in his opinion was merely to the extent that, what he formerly thought should be deferred, he now thought should be carried out at once. He (Sir Edward Colebrooke), however, would admit that some of the highest military authorities in India bore out the view taken by the right hon. Gentleman—Lord Clyde, for instance. Now, no one had a higher respect for the authority of Lord Clyde than he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) had; but it was scarcely necessary to remind the House that not merely in matters of opinion but in matters of fact, and especially in regard to the extent to which the disaffection in the Indian European army had spread, the highest military authorities were at issue. Sir James Outram, for example, who had been quoted, stated that the grossest exaggeration prevailed as to the facts, and he had expected the right hon. Gentleman would have taken an opportunity of refuting them in his place in Parliament. Under these circumstances he contended that the House ought to have some more satisfactory evidence as to the facts before they were called upon to pass such a measure as the present, otherwise they would be practically legislating in the dark. As he had said, he entertained the highest respect for Lord Clyde, but his opinion showed a bias, and moreover displayed a spirit of injustice towards the officers of the local army, which, painful as it was to him to have to say it, materially diminished the weight of Lord Clyde's opinion. He brought serious charges against the officers of the Bengal army—that they were incompetent to the work thrown on them of organizing the local corps. He perfectly concurred in the opinion of Lord Clyde that it was an error to send regiments of raw recruits out to India; but then he went on to say that when they came out the officers were found to be incapable of organizing them, and that even in the old regiments the men had no confidence in their officers. Now, it ought to be considered that these officers were placed in a position of great difficulty, for they had no old soldiers mixed with the recruits, nor had they any non-commissioned officers to assist them. Captain Eastwick said that these recruits were drawn from a class which, in civil life, were accustomed to strikes and combinations, and Colonel Carmichael Smith, who had command of one of these regiments, said that he had no non-commissioned officers and only one drill instructor. Therefore, it was unjust to draw conclusions unfavourable to a local corps in India from the exceptional position in which these troops were placed. It was said, indeed, that these charges extended to the old corps as well as to the new; but to this he thought the events of the last few years offered a signal refutation. The best test of military conduct was discipline in the presence of an enemy; and he would put it to any one who had followed the history of recent events whether, in the great mutiny, the conduct of the local corps was one jot behind those troops of the regular army upon whom we so greatly prided ourselves, and whom it was proposed in future to entrust with the safety of our Indian Empire. He admitted that in some respects the discipline of these troops was not equal to that of the Line, but the onus lay upon the Government to prove whether the evils that prevailed were not capable of remedy without resorting to the extreme measure this Bill proposed. The gallant officer who was about to succeed Lord Clyde as Commander-in-Chief of the Bengal army, had brought very sweeping charges against the army of India, not confining them to the local troops, but extending them to the officers of the Indian army generally, stating that there was a want of military spirit prevailing throughout. But he (Sir Edward Colebrooke) would observe that all the instances quoted by Sir Hugh Rose referred to evils that admitted of a remedy. Admitting that that gallant officer's statement was correct, that the manner in which officers had been withdrawn from the army to serve in civil employments had deteriorated their character as military men, still he would ask whether the measure which the right hon. Gentleman proposed of establishing a Staff corps would not meet that difficulty. And next he would ask, could they introduce this important change by which officers of the Line were to be withdrawn from their regiments without incurring the same evil? There was another reason why they should not attach too much weight to the authorities on which the Government relied. Sir Hugh Rose confessed that there was a great deal of private feeling and private influence involved in the question in regard to the dispensation of patronage, but he seemed to think that this was confined exclusively to the Indian army—as though the same charge could not be brought against himself and those other authorities who would have the patronage of the army under the altered state of things it was proposed to introduce. He (Sir E. Colebrooke) would ask, then, whether this was not after all a scramble between the two services for patronage? Sir Hugh Rose spoke of the inconvenience of divided authority consequent on keeping up separate armies in India, and that was not the first time when it had been proposed to amalgamate the Native army with the European troops, and to amalgamate the armies of the different Presidencies; but the events of the past few years refuted the grounds on which that proposal was made, and in no case more strongly than in those operations in which Sir Hugh Rose himself so ably commanded, when he penetrated with the Bombay army which remained faithful to its allegiance to the extreme north of India, and contributed in so important a manner to the final success of our arms against the insurgents.

Sir Edward Colebrooke

For these reasons, then, he held that Her Majesty's Government had not laid sufficient grounds for these important changes, and therefore, he would support the proposition of his hon. Friend. He would not enter into those grounds of policy and expediency on which it was thought important to maintain a local army on some scale. But he held it was due to the authority of the Governor General that he should have the confidence and support of an army which naturally looked to him as its head. It might, indeed, be said that they ought not to assume that the home Government would ever be so far lost to a sense of duty as to endanger the safety of the Indian Empire by withdrawing a large portion of troops from her shores. On that subject he wished to draw attention to a paper drawn up by one of the ablest of Indian Governor Generals, which was laid before Parliament two or three years ago, and which pointed out very strongly the necessity for the Governor General having a large European force at his command. In that paper the Marquess of Dalhousie pointed out that there was no fixed establishment for the number of Royal troops in India, and though the Government of India had no reason for supposing that the army would be unduly weakened by the sudden withdrawal of the Royal contingent, yet it was a contingency which could only be guarded against by the maintenance of a local force. The next consideration was not of the same force, but it was not one to be entirely disregarded. He thought it was a serious question whether the whole military administration of India should be united under one head, and subject to a department of which he would only say that it was at present on its trial, and in which the country did not feel confidence. The right hon. Gentleman also said, he wished young men to qualify themselves for Indian service by a study of the Native languages; but the point really to be aimed at, in his opinion, was to endeavour to excite an interest in the people of the country, which could only be acquired by early devotion to the service. He earnestly deprecated any plan by which Native regiments would be officered altogether from the Queen's army. However valuable the Line might be as an adjunct to the local force, it was not the school which could be relied on for training the officers on whom, in their new position, so much would depend. It was only natural that those who were looking merely to a temporary stay in the country should not devote themselves to the study of its people with the care and attention which was requisite. The change contemplated by Her Majesty's Government, according to which the local force would be reduced to a small and inferior establishment, would necessarily deprive the Indian Government of a large portion of the power they had hitherto possessed with regard to appointments to local command. If the Royal army constituted the principal portion of the force in India, it followed that the military heads at home would exercise a large voice in these nominations. It was utterly impossible at the same time to destroy the local character of the force and to increase the power of the Governor-General. He strongly deprecated the proposed alteration, and he should cordially give his vote for the Amendment.

[First Night.]

MR. T. G. BARING said, the hon. Baronet who had spoken last virtually admitted that if no other point were involved in this discussion but the efficiency of the British army in India no hesitation could be felt in agreeing to the course proposed by Government. The charge against the Secretary of State that he had not consulted the Council of India so as to enable them to place their opinions before Parliament was a purely technical objection. If the papers presented to the House were referred to, there would be found, in the first place, a Report from the Military Committee of the Council of India, to whom the Report of the Commission upon the reorganization of the Indian army had been referred. They had subsequently put before them the views of Lord Clyde, Sir Hugh Rose, and others whose opinions were entitled to weight, and the observations of Members of the Council on all these confidential papers were laid on the table before the Bill was introduced. Nobody, therefore, could hesitate to say that the House was in possession of the opinion of the Council of India as fully and completely as it could possibly be by any formal resolution. He regretted to hear it said that the Council of India was a mockery, and that this was the greatest blow they had ever received. The functions of that Council were to give advice to the Government and to the country, and as long as their opinions were fully and frankly delivered the form which they assumed mattered comparatively little. This was not the first time a similar blow had been dealt to the Council. The noble Lord the late Secretary of State for India, who passed the Bill by which that body was constituted, arrived at a conclusion on the organization of the army without consulting the Council, and he believed even in opposition to their views. If two successive Governments had considered this formal consultation unnecessary, those Gentlemen in the House who were anxious to support the authority of the Council, and even the members of the Council themselves, must see that a formal expression of their views by Resolution was unnecessary, as long as they had been substantially consulted by the Minister, and as long as an opportunity had been afforded—as he contended there had been in the present instance—of placing their views before Parliament and the country. It was an act of puerility to raise an objection to the second reading of this Bill on a mere formal point of that nature. The hon. Member for Taunton complained that there was not sufficient detail in the Bill. He conceived that it was more convenient and respectful to the House to obtain a decision on the main point in the first instance, and afterwards to inquire into details; but that no particular objection could be raised to the Bill on that ground was proved by the speech of the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke) who had discussed the details of the plan at some length. The question which the House must feel to be of most importance in this discussion was whether, as was stated, the scheme proposed by Her Majesty's Government would cut off the supply of officers for service in India in various political and civil stations—men who in positions of great responsibility and difficulty had always discharged their duty in an admirable manner. He was at a loss to know on what ground this position was taken up by the opponents of the Bill. Authorities had been quoted at considerable length on this subject. He might also refer to the authority of men really conversant with the feelings and habits of British officers—men like Sir Edward Lugard, who had been twenty-five years in India, and Sir Thomas Franks who had been fifteen years in that country, or Sir Patrick Grant, who had a more general knowledge of the army than most other general officers—to prove that there was no difficulty in getting a supply from British Line regiments to take staff and other employments in the East. He might also ask why so much jealousy had existed among officers of the Line at being precluded from taking these appointments, if they were not ready and anxious to be so employed; but he thought it sufficient to appeal to the ordinary motives of human conduct. What career, he would ask, could present greater inducements to our enthusiastic or ambitious youth than the Indian service? Hon. Members were aware of how Herat had been defended by Eldred Pottinger; how in the late mutiny an entire province had been kept loyal by the efforts of Captain W. Osborne; and how armies were commanded by young men like Sir Herbert Edwardes. Nor could the House be ignorant of all that had been done by Sir Proby Cautley, or by Colonel Cotton in constructing works of public utility in India. With the example of such achievements before them, he was at a loss to understand how it could be contended that young men in this country would not be desirous of taking the appointments in India to which he was referring. The inducements to do so had, he might add, not hitherto existed. Until lately few Staff appointments in India had been conferred upon officers in the Queen's army, but now that state of things was about to undergo an alteration it was only reasonable to suppose, as Lord Ellenborough, who was an advocate of a local army, had stated in his examination before the Commission, that young men would gladly avail themselves of the advantages held out to them. It was, however, argued that officers might be selected to those appointments, but that they would not be fit for their position. Now, what, he should like to know, was the training to which those officers were subjected with respect to whom such an opinion was pronounced? It was service in Her Majesty's infantry, cavalry, and artillery regiments, and it should be borne in mind that from Munro down to Sir Charles Napier, almost every distinguished military authority acquainted with India, with the exception of Sir James Outram, had laid it down as essential that a young officer should commence his training in an European regiment, and there be properly disciplined before being employed with Native troops. That being so, nobody, he thought, would contend that the training received in the Queen's European regiments was inferior to that which officers underwent in the Company's. When young men had received such training and wished to undertake Indian service, they would naturally study the language of the country to which they were going. In looking over the Army List the day before, he had met with the case of scarcely a single Line regiment serving in India in which three or four of the officers had not succeeded in obtaining a knowledge of the vernacular, and if that were so he could not understand why there should be any superiority in a Company's over a Queen's officer who had so qualified himself. It was somewhat remarkable that several of the officers who possessed the greatest influence over the Natives had been trained, not in Native, but in local European regiments. Sir Herbert Edwardes belonged to the 1st Bengal Fusileers, an European regiment; and why it should be supposed he would not have been equally serviceable to his country, if trained in the 10th Regiment of Foot, he was at a loss to understand. Major Hodson also had been an officer in the 1st Bengal Fusileers. Lieutenant Colonel Daly, who raised and formed a Punjab Cavalry regiment, was adjutant of a Bombay European regiment. The previous training of these officers was the same as that which they would have received in the Line, and what power the mere appointment by a Director could exercise, so as to transform the whole nature of those men, and make them different from their brothers who might happen to serve in the Line, it was not easy to conceive. He was, under those circumstances, prepared to maintain that there could be no difficulty in securing a supply of efficient officers in India should the proposal of the Government receive the assent of the House. The hon. Member for Taunton objected to that proposal, and asked whether it was desirable to dispense with a machinery against which the charge of failure could not with justice be advanced. The hon. Gentleman, in putting the question, however, appeared to have lost sight of the fact, that the whole Native army of Bengal had mutinied, that half the local army had quitted India, and that hardly an officer had been examined before the Commission who did not condemn the present system of Staff appointments in that country. Indeed, the actual attendance of officers with their regiments under the operation of that system was purely nominal. Men were taken away from them to do some other service, and then, when raised to the rank of majors or lieutenant-colonels, they in some instances came back—perhaps after an absence of many years—unaccustomed to the command of troops, and unacquainted with their regiments. Let hon. Members for a moment imagine a regiment of British Infantry quartered at Portsmouth, its major being governor of the Isle of Man, its senior captain master of Westminster School, another of its officers at the head of the Irish constabulary, a fourth negotiating the Commercial Treaty in Paris, a fifth a major of Militia, a sixth a County Court Judge and two or three others, employed in the construction of the Caledonian Canal, or engaged in superintending a harbour in Galway, and they would then have some idea of the way in which European officers in India were employed previous to the mutiny. All officers in command of Native troops would, under the plan which had been sketched out by the Secretary of State, henceforward be selected according to their qualifications. An objection had been made, which deserved attentive consideration both from its own importance and the persons who made it,—namely, that the plan would interfere with the powers of the Governor General of India. But that was not the case. In regard to all matters of expense, all matters affecting the disposition of troops and the appointment of officers to high commands, the powers of the Governor General were clear and certain, and they would not be interfered with at all by the measure before the House. With regard to the appointments in India, these would remain precisely as at present. All the Staff appointments would be made in India, and the brigade commands in India. The divisional commands would be made as at present, seven being made from home, and the rest in India. For the future the same proportion would be maintained. At present there was a double Staff to each army. In future there would be but one. In future the Adjutant General would be appointed in this country, the Quartermaster General in India. The arrangements would be perfectly fair and satisfactory to all parties, with respect to the patronage of first appointments. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon had explained to the House that the question of appointments was under the consideration of the Committee; and they should wait till that question was decided. There would be no occasion to make any appointments for a period of two years, in consequence of the diminished number of officers required. He believed he had now touched upon most of the points alluded to in the course of this debate. He had not quoted authorities, because he thought the House would be prepared to accept the position that at any rate authority rested with one side as well as with the other. He might, however, mention one remarkable fact. Lord Cornwallis had been alluded to by the noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn, and again that night by the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Colebrooke), as a supporter of the maintenance of a local European army; but—would the House believe it?—the letter of Lord Cornwallis which had been read was written in February, 1787, only a few months after he arrived in India. It was notorious that in 1794 Lord Cornwallis placed before the Cabinet a plan in the greatest detail for amalgamating the army. That, however, was opposed by the Court of Directors. It so happened that a very near relative of his own was a Director of the East India Company at the time, and had a share in its rejection. Lord Cornwallis not only proposed that plan in 1794, after the whole of his Indian experience, but in 1797 he was actually proposed to go as Governor General to India in order to carry out amalgamation; his appointment, however, did not take effect, in consequence of the Court of Proprietors having refused to approve of the instructions which it was proposed to give him. In regard to Lord Cornwallis, therefore, those who asserted that he was in favour of a local European force had not sufficiently considered his whole Indian career. Having alluded to Lord Cornwallis, he might add that the only Governors-General who were chosen from the Indian Civil Service—Sir John Shore, afterwards Lord Teignmouth, and Lord Metcalfe—had given their opinion in favour of amalgamation. He believed the principle of this measure was right, and all the military arguments were in favour of it, while the political arguments against it were either inapplicable or founded upon incorrect assumptions. With respect to the rights of the officers of the Indian army, they were not interfered with. Being secured by Act of Parliament, they would be maintained in their integrity. The feelings and interests of those officers would be consulted. The security of their rights rested in this, that the clauses of the Act conferring those rights were unrepealed. As to the question of expense, he thought, where there was a revenue of £38,000,000, the question of £100,000, more or less, ought not to affect the consideration of this subject. He thanked the House for the attention they had given to him, and he should ask them to reject the proposal of the hon. Member for Taunton, and give this Bill a second reading.

Sir Edward Colebrooke

[First Night.]

Mr. T. G. Baring

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he felt it impossible to exaggerate or overstate the importance of this question as regarded the future well-being and security of Her Majesty's Indian empire. The question had received a long and mature consideration on the part of the Government. Even before the present Ministry accepted office the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the re-organization of the Indian army had been already made; the subject was, therefore, ripe for decision. The Government had taken twelve months to arrive at the conclusion they had presented to the House in the form of the proposed plan, and he must say after so long a period they had arrived at a very imperfect result. He did not complain that they had changed their views and opinions; on the contrary, they were quite right, if they thought they had good reason to do so. What he complained of was, that the House should now be called upon to decide a question where it was admitted that the Government had not yet decided what should be the details of the measure they intended to carry out. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India told them that various plans had been submitted to him; but he also stated that he had not yet made up his mind which of those plans he should adopt. Now, he thought it would be neither fair nor just on the part of the House of Commons to leave the fate of the Indian officers wholly and entirely at the mercy of the Government. He did not mean to insinuate that his right hon. Friend was not just as anxious as any man in that House to do ample justice to those officers. But those officers would be much more willing to have their claims settled by the mature deliberation of Parliament than by the pleasure or caprice of a Minister. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last thought the difficulty in satisfying the claims of the Indian officers, if any, was of a minor character. A very different opinion was entertained by experienced Indian officers. As he considered that the House of Commons ought to be placed in possession of the real facts of the case, with a view to forming a correct judgment upon the matter, he would read an extract from a Minute of Sir James Outram, who expressed his opinion that the proposed amalgamation would inflict serious injury on the 6,000 officers in the Indian army; for those gentlemen had entered the service on the understanding that they would be promoted according to seniority; that they would never be superseded in their positions; and under the proposed amalgamation it would be impossible that faith could be kept with them in these respects. Sir James Outram therefore suggested that the whole question should be argued before a competent tribunal before any decision was come to. The question was now before a competent tribunal, and he (Mr. Baillie) trusted that the House would not decide this question by an abstract vote, but would call upon the Government to lay some plan distinctly before them.

Then, having regard to the question how the amalgamation would affect Her Majesty's Indian empire, he could not agree with the Secretary of State that, as regarded the expense, it was a question of trifling importance. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had underrated the costs and burdens that it would cast upon the State, and in this respect he agreed with the Committee of the Indian Council, who were of opinion that the question was not what was the best conceivable scheme for the military occupation of India, but what was the best that the resources of the country could afford. There could not be a doubt that if this Bill passed a large proportion of the revenues of India would be placed at the disposal of the English War Office, without any check from Parliamentary supervision. That was an important bearing of the measure in a constitutional point of view. The Government had appointed Mr. Hammack, the actuary, to estimate the difference between the cost of maintaining local European regiments and regiments of the Line. Mr. Hammack's calculation was that 1,000 men of the Line would cost the Indian Government £10,000 a year more than an equal number of local troops. That showed a difference of 10 per cent against Queen's regiments, an amount surely not so trifling as the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State represented. But the Government had not taken into account the increased cost of transport. A calculation had been made with regard to the expense of transport by Mr. Hammack, from which it appeared that the expense incurred for the transport of Her Majesty's troops from 1852-53 to 1856-57, amounted to £616,032, and that the expense incurred during the same period for the transport of the East India Company's troops amounted to £156,239. The strength of the latter was one-half that of the former, and, supposing that the strength of both was equal, the cost of transport of Her Majesty's troops would exactly double that of the local army. And as the right hon. Gentleman's plan contemplated reliefs once every ten years, instead of once every twenty, or perhaps twenty-five years, as at present, the cost of transport would, of course, be proportionately augmented. Colonel Tulloch, in his evidence before the Commission, estimated, on the supposition that we maintained a Line army of 80,000 men in India, that no less than 29,000 men would be at sea annually, and that the cost would be £450,000, exclusive of officers, for whom the expense was enormous as compared with that for the men. This was an item which the Secretary of State for India had entirely omitted from his estimate of the cost under the new system. But, after all, the great blot in the plan was the facility it would give the Secretary of State for interfering with the resources of India. If they were to judge of the results of that interference for the future by their experience of the past, the prospects of Indian finance were not very assuring. The War Office had been reckless of expenditure when the Indian Government—not the Home Treasury—had to bear the burden. A remarkable example of this was presented by the case of the twelve batteries of artillery of which they heard so much eighteen months previously. During the Indian rebellion the Governor General applied for some additional artillery. His despatch was forwarded to the Secretary of State for War, and the reply was made that twelve batteries should be prepared for service in India. As that was a time of war, no objection was made on the score of expense, but it was found impossible to send the troops overland. The force had to be sent out by the long sea route, and had therefore to wait till the monsoon, which did not occur for three or four months. The original intention of the War Office was that these troops should be paid by the Indian Government from the day on which the requisition for them was first made. This was refused by the Indian Council, and a long correspondence took place on the subject. Before the time fixed for the departure of these troops news arrived that the Indian rebellion was at an end. The Council met, and memorialized the Secretary of State for War not to send out the batteries. The answer was that the Indian Government had asked for the troops, and it must have them; and he believed that but for an accident the Indian Government would have had to pay something like £250,000 for sending these batteries to India, would have had to maintain them there, and to bring them home again. In the meantime, however, circumstances occurred which produced an impression that this country would be hurried into war. The hon. and gallant General the Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) gave notice of his intention to move an Address to the Crown, asking that at such a period those troops should not be sent out of the country, and they were not sent; but he believed that that notice did more to prevent their despatch than all the remonstrances of the Indian Government. That was one illustration of the system; another referred to the depôts. Every regiment in India had a depôt in this country which was paid by the Indian Government, but the number of men in which depended wholly upon the Secretary of State for War. The number of men in each of these depôts varied from 100 to 700 men, and thus the Secretary of State for War had at his absolute disposal an army of 16,000 or 18,000 men, as to his management of which no one knew anything. Suppose we had a Chancellor of the Exchequer who was a disciple of the Manchester school, disapproved of large armies and navies, and believed that the country was to be defended by the principles of free trade. He would write to the Secretary for War for his estimate, and having received it he might entirely disapprove of the number of men and reduce the Estimate by 6,000 or 8,000 men. The Secretary would perhaps remonstrate and say that he had sent the number of men that he considered were requisite for the adequate defence of the country. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were inexorable, as he probably would be, then the Secretary for War could add 100 men to each of the depôts, and thus get his 7,000 or 8,000 men, the expense of whom be defrayed by the Indian Government, and this was a matter in which the Indian Council could not interfere. For anything that the House knew, that might be going on now. At all events, he believed that there were at present more men in these depôts than the Indian Council liked; but, if they remonstrated with the Secretary for War, he would tell them to mind their own business, that he alone was responsible, and he knew how to manage the affairs of his own office. This was a constitutional question, which was well worth the consideration of the House. A good deal had been said about the mismanagement of the War Office, and an opinion generally prevailed that that was one of the worst managed departments of the Government. Indeed, the Secretary of State seemed to share that opinion, because he had both last Session and this moved the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the subject. The impression was derived from reasons independent of the Crimean disasters, and it was believed by many that the mismanagement had arisen from the sudden amalgamation of the Ordnance and War Departments; and yet they were now asked by a Bill which simply repealed two or three clauses of an Act of Parliament to add the Ordnance and Military Departments of India to this already overburdened and inefficient office.

[First Night.]

Mr. H. Baillie

This appeared to be a very simple measure, but, like the Reform Bill, it would be found to be a very comprehensive one. The Government had this Session dealt much in large and comprehensive measures. First, there was a large and comprehensive measure of financial Reform, which was followed by a large and comprehensive measure of Parliamentary Reform; and now they had before them a large and comprehensive measure of Indian Reform. The first two had proved to be failures, and he predicted that this also would be admitted to be a failure, unless the House permitted its common sense to be carried away by the eloquence of the Indian Minister, as it was by that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This was called a Bill to repeal the Act which authorized the Government to raise local troops; but had the House well considered the engagements into which it would enter if it passed this Bill? It would engage to maintain an army of 80,000 men in India, no regiment of which should remain in that country longer than ten years. If such a system of relief was applied to the army in India, it must be extended also to the 35,000 men in our other Colonies. The army to be relieved would therefore amount to 115,000 men or more. He should be glad to know whether the Government had calculated the number of men that would be required as a standing army in this country to effect that relief properly and regularly. If they had not, it had been done for them. Sir William Mansfield, at page 175 of the blue-book said:—

“To carry out the system of relief, it will be incumbent upon Her Majesty's Government to raise twenty-five battalions of 1,000 rank and file, as was proposed for the local army of Bengal, in order to liberate Her Majesty's regiments of the Line.”

That did not include the reliefs for the troops in the Colonies, which would require 12,000 men more; so that to carry out this scheme the standing army in this country must be increased by 37,000 men. He was one of those who should be willing to vote that number of men, but what would the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer say, and what would be the result if the House passed this Bill but refused to supplement it by voting these reliefs? The result would be that Her Majesty's regiments would have to remain in India for twenty or twenty-five years, and would become local corps without the advantages of local service. Then health would be destroyed and the army would become unpopular, for the situation of a soldier in India would, in such circumstances, be worse than that of a negro on a plantation in the West Indies. What he wanted the House to do was to reject the present Bill, but not to pledge itself one way or other on the question of amalgamation. Let them have the whole plan of the Government embodied in a Bill, and then they might be able to form something like an accurate judgment upon so difficult a subject that all the highest authorities were ranged on different and opposite sides.

[First Night.

He had no doubt that the decision of the Government had been much influenced by the opinions expressed by some of the most distinguished officers in the Royal army—Lord Clyde, Sir Hugh Rose, and Sir William Mansfield. Let the House examine the reasons which those officers had given for their opinions, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the evils and faults which had been pointed out in the Bengal army were the natural and inevitable results of a local service, or whether they might exist in any service under similar circumstances. The principal evil complained of was the want of discipline in the Bengal army, arising, it was said, from two causes—first, from the absence of sufficient power on the part of commanding officers of regiments to punish their men, who had an appeal to head quarters; and, secondly, from the practice which had so long prevailed of allowing so large a number of officers to be absent upon Staff employments, whereby they were prevented, of course, from attending to the discipline of their regiments. Nothing, he admitted, could be worse than the want of sufficient power on the part of commanding officers to punish their men; but why and by whom was such a system maintained? It was maintained by those Commanders-in-Chief of the Indian army who for a series of years were appointed by the Horse Guards, and who were all Queen's officers. Take the case of the last two,—Sir William Gomm and General Anson. Sir William Gomm commanded in India for four or five years, but he never made any complaint, never instituted any inquiry; he was perfectly satisfied with the existing state of things, and when he left the Bengal army he published an address, in which he spoke in the highest and most flattering terms of the splendid discipline of the army he had so long commanded. General Anson was another officer appointed by the Horse Guards. Of that officer he would not express any opinion of his own, but would give that of the man who was, perhaps, more competent than any other in England

Mr. H. Baillie

to speak on such a subject. Sir John Lawrence said:—

“One of the great causes of the little influence of commanders of regiments was the manner in which all real power was centralized at head-quarters. This, again, was the fault of successive Commanders-in-Chief. Look, again, at the officers who were often sent out to command the armies of the different Presidencies; how few were really equal to the post. Can any impartial man cognizant of these facts, deny that such mistakes had not much to do with the late revolt? Look at the character and antecedents of the Commander-in-Chief in Bengal under whom the outbreak occurred; was he a fit officer for the control of the Indian armies, at a time, moreover, when many reforms were necessary? He was fully warned of the feeling of the soldiers on the cartridge question; but what did he do? He simply rebuked the officer who made the report. I know myself that not long before the mutiny he issued an order whereby many Mahomedan soldiers had to leave the army for no other fault but because they would not cut off their beards!”

It was quite evident that General Anson was not acquainted with the customs and habits of his own soldiers. Sir John Lawrence proceeded to say:—

“Some, again, arise from the character of the service in India; and others from the system which has grown up in that country, for which, if any people are more especially to blame than others, it would be the Governors-General and Commanders-in-Chief, who had been all sent out from home, who themselves inaugurated and elaborated the existing system, and who could at any time have altered that system as they found it defective.”

The second reason given for the necessity of amalgamating the two armies was the number of officers withdrawn from their regiments for Staff employments. The House had been told by the hon. Under Secretary that a scheme was already prepared for the formation of a Staff corps, to which all Queen's officers who qualified themselves would be eligible, and that when appointed their places in their regiments would be filled up. But if an officer should be found unfit for the staff employment, what would they do with him? They could not send him back to his regiment, and they must employ him in some way. Again, supposing the plan to be a good one, what was to prevent a similar system from being adopted in connection with the local corps? Upon this point Sir James Outram said, in his Minute:—

“I believe that the practice of appointing the lieutenant-colonel of a local European regiment by seniority, without special regard to his fitness; of transferring him from regiment to regiment, so as to prevent his ever being identified with the corps he commands; and of abstracting all the best officers and men for Staff situations, would alone account for a much greater difference of internal discipline than is alleged to exist—and the only wonder is that any discipline at all is maintained. I feel certain that any officer of experience in Her Majesty's Line regiments would pronounce it hopeless to preserve discipline where such causes were at work to impair it. But not one of them is in the most remote degree connected with the local character of the army—they might one and all be removed to-morrow without amalgamation, and their removal ought to be tried, not for a few months, but for a period sufficient to produce an effect on the discipline of every regiment, before we resort to the desperate remedy of annihilating the local army under pretence of improving its discipline."

It had been stated on a former occasion that the Duke of Wellington was in favour of a local army. He had since referred to the Despatches, and, although there was no passage in which the Duke expressed in so many words his preference for a local army, there was undoubtedly a statement to the effect that the troops who had long resided in India were the best and most to be relied upon. The Duke said :—

"Bravery is the characteristic of the British army in all quarters of the world; but no other quarter has afforded such striking examples of the existence of this quality in the soldiers as the East Indies. An instance of their misbehaviour in the field has never been known, particularly those who have been for some time in that country; they cannot be ordered upon any service, however dangerous and arduous, that they will not effect, not only with bravery, but a degree of skill not often witnessed in persons of their description in other parts of the world. I attribute these qualities, which are peculiar to them in the East Indies, to the distinctness of their class in that country from all others existing in it. They feel that they are a distinct and superior class to the rest of the world which surrounds them; and their actions correspond with their high notions of their own superiority. Add to these qualities that their bodies are inured to climate, hardships, and fatigue, by long residence, habit, and exercise, to such a degree that I have seen them for years together in the field without suffering any material sickness; that I have made them march sixty miles in thirty hours and afterwards engage the enemy; and it will not be surprising that they should be respected as they are throughout India."

The Duke of Wellington's opinion was clearly that frequent changes in the Indian troops were not so advisable as was now supposed. No doubt the House attached great importance to the opinion of Lord Clyde, one of the most distinguished officers in the service. Lord Clyde, however, like other men, was liable to be influenced by the prejudices of those who surrounded him, and if it were true that Lord Clyde had said he would not intrust a division to an Indian officer, it was to be lamented for the noble Lord's own sake that he had ever written such a letter. Lord Clyde could not have forgotten that Sir James Outram had commanded a division of an Indian army, and that he was not one of the least distinguished heroes of the late campaign. He could not have forgotten Sir Archdale Wilson, who performed one of the most extraordinary feats of modern warfare in the siege and capture of Delhi, an effort which saved our Indian army, and which was wholly and solely, from first to last, conducted by the engineers and artillery of the local army; the engineers and artillery of the Queen's army having taken no share in it. Then there were the names of Nicolson and Hodson, which, if Lord Clyde had forgotten, would long live in the recollection of their countrymen. Happily, however, this question was not about to be decided by men imbued with professional or technical prejudices, but by those who would come to a decision with an entire absence of all party feeling and an earnest desire to do justice to the Indian officer. The House of Commons would act upon so important a matter, not from professional prejudice, but with a due regard to the great interests of India and of England, involving, as they did, the future tranquillity and security of Her Majesty's Indian empire.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that he was sorry to hear this question argued as one of patronage without proper and due regard to the great interests at stake. It was a scandal to the service so to argue it. He could not believe that the Government would persevere in laying it down as an axiom that the Commander-in-chief was to appoint the Adjutant General of the army in India, and the Governor General, the Quartermaster General, but would look at the matter solely with reference to the good of the army and the empire. An important question raised in the debate was whether English officers would accept office under the Government of India. He did not deny that they would accept office. What he doubted was whether they were altogether fit and capable to serve. Mr. Wilson, who could not be supposed to speak from any prejudice against the Queen's army, said :—

"Nothing has struck me more in India than the contrast between officers of the Indian service and officers of the Line in their treatment and manner of speaking of the Natives; what little I have seen fully bears out the distinction drawn by the Honourable the President in Council, and it is clear that such a force, without some new condition and check to enable them to act more in accordance with, and in consideration of, the feelings and rights of Native gentlemen, must be a most imperfect instrument for repressing the consequences of suspicion and uneasiness with our rule where or when they exist."

[First Night.]

It was most important to obtain fit and competent officers for India, because he felt convinced that the retention of India depended more than anything else upon the conduct of our officers, and their treatment of the Natives. At the commencement of the late mutiny he wrote to India to an officer serving under Sir W. Peel, and asked him his opinion as to what was the cause of the late mutiny. He replied that he saw enough to cause a mutiny every day, in the want of consideration shown, by young officers more especially, to the Natives. That opinion was backed by the experience of Mr. Wilson, who had said that he was much struck by the different manner in which Natives were treated by local officers and officers of Her Majesty's army. He did not deny that officers of the Queen's army who determined to make India their home would probably adopt habits of conciliation towards the Natives, but up to the present time the local officers had alone treated the Native inhabitants with a consideration likely to conciliate their affections. The opinion of the Duke of Wellington and Lord Metcalfe had been quoted, but he could not find in their writings any expression of opinion that the two armies ought to be amalgamated, and it was very doubtful whether their opinion was not on the other side. In dealing with the question of expense, it had not been considered that if there were only the Royal army in India a great number of soldiers who went out with their regiments would only have a very short time to serve, and must be sent home in perhaps two or three years at the expense of the State. No class of men could have conducted themselves better or been more useful in India than the local officers, and the reason was evident. They went out young to India, after having received an excellent education in England, and they devoted themselves to their duties as men who were to remain in India, studying the languages and customs of the country and acquiring the confidence and respect of the Native population. The local army of India had received an unanimous vote of thanks from that House after the suppression of the mutiny, and now they were to be treated as disloyal and disaffected soldiers. A great deal too much had been made of what was called the mutinous conduct of the local regiments. For he objected to any arguments being on the supposition of disaffection or lack of loyalty, for he believed there was no slightest want of loyalty in India, and the Governor General had every faith in the European army. On that ground he thought they were doing great injustice to the Indian army to make any change. No vice in the world had produced more valiant men, whether they regarded the military or the civil service, and certainly no body of men had so preserved the traditions of the Native Princes. He should no means wish to see the power of the Governor General to select the best for the service or to get rid of inferior men, restricted. It had been said that great Indian authorities had given their opinion according to their interests, but he did not believe that statement. It was, that all the opinions in favour of amalgamation had been given on this side of the water, and it was evident that the Imperial army had far more to gain in the amalgamation than any other, therefore he thought that their opinion ought to be most carefully canvassed before any such change as that contemplated was effected. The House had it now no power to arrest a course which he thought would prove extremely prejudicial to the welfare of England, and was opposed against a body of men whom he had heard to be as loyal, as intelligent, and as upright a set of men as any who had ever been sent out to India. On those grounds he should support the present system.

Sir Harry Verney

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE: The real question was whether acclimated or unacclimated men should discharge the duties of the army in India. In those duties had been carried out by the troops, supplemented by the Queen's troops. Eminent men on both sides had given their opinion upon the proposed change, and the officers of the Indian army expressed their opinion on the Commission had given their opinion in one way, and the officers of Her Majesty's army the other. On one side they had the Earl of Ellenborough, Lord Harcourt, the Marquess of Dalhousie, Sir James Outram, General Jacob; and on the other Sir Elphinstone, Sir George Clark, Sir Charles Trevelyan, Sir Willoughby Cotton, Sir Tulloch, and others. As far as he could see the weight of evidence appeared to be in favour of those who advocated the continuance of the present system. T

The main question, however, was the policy of abolishing the local army, and it appeared to him that, without adopting the extreme measure then under the consideration of the House, many improvements might be effected in the working of the present system. The system of landing men in India at all seasons, marching them at once to their stations, caused in itself a waste of money and a loss of life. Instead of quartering them at once in the hot cantonments, as the present practice was, they should be gradually acclimatized by being sent, where that could be done, to the cool tableland of the hills. Their moral condition might, at the same time, be improved by the suppression of canteens, and the establishment of club-houses with libraries, and the introduction of games, to keep them from the demoralizing effects of liquor, which was the bane of our troops in India. Then, again, it would be found that after having spent seven or eight years in India and being accustomed to the attendance of servants, and the luxuries of India, men would not come home to this country very useful or efficient soldiers. That was another item which the Government ought to take into account. They seemed to expect that regiments would be serviceable immediately on their arrival in India, whereas it would be twelve or eighteen months before they would be efficient; and they expected the same thing when those same regiments were taken home en masse. Why, if men who had served ten years in India were on their return home marched to Aldershot in this wet weather four-fifths of them would be in hospital in less than a week. With the European troops in India it had always seemed to him a great point that steady and well-conducted men should have some reward to look forward to; and with this view he would appoint Native Instructors to each regiment, so as to qualify such men for the discharge of other duties. In that case they might be draughted into the police, or employed as superintendents of irrigation works and roads, of which, with the railway system now growing up, a great many would be required in order to develop the local traffic. There were a hundred different ways in which Europeans might be advantageously employed in the place of Natives, who were essentially untrustworthy. Our empire in India had grown up under the present system; that system worked well, was suited to the habits of the Natives, and was based on the mon-sense principle that you must acclimatized soldiers to do duty in India. If this principle were departed from the Government would certainly be driven to it; and it was much better, now the Queen was at the head both of European and Native troops in India, some plan should be devised for carrying out the views of the late Government, leaving matters to remain pretty much as they were at present, instead of going into a course which was so reactionary and was adopted in a manner so derogatory to the Council of India. If the Bill passed, he looked upon it as a most serious blow to that body. In the Council of India were men of great experience, high character, and why were they called upon to legislate upon Indian matters? It seemed as though they were eventually to be put aside, and the Government of India administered by the Cabinet, for the purpose of increasing political influence and their patronage in this country. For these reasons he opposed the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. KINNAIRD said, he was glad to find that the House was not prepared to pass that measure with the rapidity which might at one time have been expected. The question at issue was one of the gravest that could be submitted to the House. The right hon. the Secretary of State for India had stated that it was an important question, and he (Mr. Kinnaird) believed that that was the right hon. Gentleman's excuse for not taking the opinion of the Indian Council. It was, indeed, an important question, but it was not therefore determined chiefly with reference to the interests of the Empire in Europe, but its interests in Asia. We talked of India sometimes as if it were but a little colony, and indeed on this very question of the army some would reason upon it as if it affected a little island like Ceylon, instead of a country which it was an anomaly to call a country at all. If the whole of Europe were conquered by an island or an antipodes, such as New Zealand, and the people there were to talk of Europe as a "country," and say that it was anomalous to have anything but one army for New Zealand and Europe, it would be a parallel case. He thought, therefore, that who dwelt so much upon the anomaly of our present system had forgotten the greater anomaly of this little island ruling over nearly a quarter of the human race.

Sir James Elphinstone

a subjection 200 millions of people speaking thirteen different languages. Any system suited to such affairs might be expected to be maintained that it was no longer the Empire to have a separate European army for India. Now, Lord Clyde might be a great authority, and so others quoted; but for such a question settled on the testimony of four officers, whose prejudices would incline to one Royal army, and others were not even given in evidence, not very satisfactory. Great credit was placed on the occurrence of a mutiny in the Bengal local corps. Was that altogether an exceptional case? Was it not a fact well known in India? Lord Clyde and Sir William Murray considered the claim of the troops for bounty on being transferred from the Crown a just claim? The noble Viscount the Prime Minister appear once to entertain a conviction? It was not alone in India that Englishmen combined when they thought their just rights were being withheld. What did the sailors on the Princess Royal last December do who were most blamed by the public, the men were punished, but the officers were blamed. And he knew the opinion of able men that if the local corps had been wisely handled they would not have so far dissolved. Moreover, the Report of the Royal Commission in 1858 was calculated to excite discontent in that army. The delay previously occurred in settling the position of the army had already produced discontent among officers and men, the Report aggravated. But before the local European troops of India had a world-wide renown. Who remembered the disasters which occurred under the command of the Royal army in Afghanistan but Nott, Pollock, and Sale—officers? When the mutiny broke out was summoned to Lucknow, the danger, but Sir Henry Lawrence? Guarded the frontier, and kept in dangerous tribes, but Sir Herbert Kitchener? Did hon. Members suppose a man at a post like Peshawur did not need long Indian experience? Who remembered the tide of battle at Delhi but Sir James Outram, another officer of this now disbanded army? It was very easy by a few clauses to abolish an army which would carry with it imperishable fame, but it would have been more satisfactory, he thought, before voting for its abolition, to know what was going to take its place, and not to turn over this question wholly to the Cabinet and the Horse Guards. Was the system of promotion in the army at home so admirable that there was little left to be desired? Did our system stand the wear and tear of war in the Crimea? What happened with regard to the commissariat? A distance of seven miles placed between the army and the ships sufficed to starve the horses and reduce the men to grievous want. Did the commissariat so break down in India? What security was the House taking that by the abuse of patronage, incompetency should not reign in some of the Indian war departments? Had the House at least the consolation of knowing that it was not taking a leap in the dark, and that the wisest counsels had been brought to bear on the decision taken in this matter? When the Government of India was placed under the direct control of the Crown, they had been told that India was so peculiar, that Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India must have the assistance of an Indian Council, composed in part of men whose lives had been spent in India, and the Government might well be proud of some of the men who adorned that Council. Yet, in a question in which was bound up the security of India, the Council had been, as such, altogether ignored. True, his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) had told the House that the Members of the Council had been consulted individually, but that was not the way in which Parliament or the Cabinet was consulted; but, as he understood his right hon. Friend, the Council collectively had not been consulted on the Bill till the Cabinet had decided that it should be proposed to Parliament. Might he be allowed, then, to ask what was the use of that Council? Surely it would be better to have the aid of its Members in Parliament than consign them to such an unworthy position. Many of the gentlemen composing the Council were men of high authority on Indian matters, and he believed they were unanimous against the Bill. He hoped they would be allowed to enter a protest in writing, and that the House would have the advantage of reading the protest before the Bill reached a further stage. This question deeply concerned all the Native troops and the intercourse with Native courts. At present the local European troops gave dignity to the Native troops, and formed an intermediate link between them and the troops of the Line. But when this link was broken up and gone, would they work well together? for it was impossible altogether to dispense with Native troops of some sort. In the case of a European war, was there any security that this country would not again have recourse to foreign mercenaries to supply the lack of English troops? Would those mercenaries be sent to India, or would the country be satisfied to rely on them for home service and denude itself of English troops for India? This was a very possible contingency. Was it wise to leave such a mass of provinces as composed India entirely dependent on the Imperial army; and, at a moment when this country had just recovered its sway, to rely upon an untried staff to supply successors to that noble list of men who had adorned the annals of English rule in India, beginning with Clive and ending with Henry Lawrence? For the reasons he had stated he should give his support to the Amendment which had been proposed.

MR. VANSITTART said, he regretted he could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Taunton, as he was fully convinced of the necessity of an effort being made to bring the allowances, pay, and promotion of our two European forces serving in India into something like harmony. In order to allay the heartburnings that now existed, no prolonged delay in the settlement of this important question should be allowed to take place. Moreover, as the local European army had been partially dissolved by its own misconduct, though it might have received provocation in the first instance, the time appeared to be singularly favourable for considering whether it would not be desirable to amalgamate the two forces into one. With reference to the feelings of deep dismay with which so many hon. Members—who, no doubt, possessed great practical knowledge—viewed the abolition of a local European army, they should bear in mind that many great authorities, who at one time espoused that system most warmly, now with equal warmth advocated the necessity of a fusion of the two armies. Undoubtedly, the greatest argument in favour of a purely local force was that it served as a preventive, a guarantee against India being denuded of European troops, at the caprice or ignorance of the Indian Home Minister, as was the case previous to the outbreak of the late mutiny. But that danger might easily be obviated. A number of European troops necessary was to ascertain the number of European troops necessary to be maintained for the security of India. He still adhered to the opinion he had formerly expressed that the number should be 80,000—50,000 for Bengal, Behar, North-Western and Central Provinces, Burmah, Oude, and the Punjab; 15,000 for each of the minor Presidencies of Bombay and Madras. Having fixed the number, let it be ratified by an Act of Parliament, which should also limit the period of service—say, seven, ten, or fourteen years—after which period the battalions were to be relieved in regular routine. This arrangement would not only insure the retention in India of the prescribed number of Europeans, but would also get rid of the local force, which had been heretofore fostered up by peculiar privileges different from the Royal army—a force which had been more or less discontented, and occasionally broken out into open rebellion and insubordination. The names and actions of many very distinguished officers had been quoted in the course of the discussion on this question, but there was one name and opinions had not been brought under the notice of the House—Colonel Vincent Eyre, of the Bengal Artillery, well known for the bravery and gallantry displayed in relieving the Arrah garrison in the Behar province, and for his subsequent exploits in Oude and Rohilkhand. Colonel Vincent Eyre published a admirable letter in The Times last winter on the question, in which he advocated the retention of the system of raising additional battalions to the twenty-four already attached to the Royal army, so as to have an efficient army for both home defence and India. "By this reciprocity of interest," said the gallant Colonel:—

Mr. Kinnaid

"Both countries will be gainers. India will gain a constant succession of young soldiers, disciplined and prepared to do credit to their country and service in the East, while England will obtain for home defence, a constant supply of men, sick, yet still efficient and valuable veterans, experienced in war, with medals on their breasts, and loyalty in their hearts to stimulate their brethren, and 'show how fields were won.'"

With regard to the Native Sepoy army, he still maintained the opinion he had expressed the previous year, that it should be reduced to the lowest ebb consistent with the exigencies of the service, and that on no account should the proportion exceed one native to two Europeans. Assuming 80,000 Europeans to be the figure, give us an army of 200,000 men for all India, and which would probably be distributed in the following manner:—100,000 Europeans and 70,000 Natives for Bengal; and 15,000 Europeans and 25,000 Natives for each of the minor Presidencies of Madras and Bombay. Next to making the two armies meet it was indispensable that attention should be directed to restore the sense of personal security and confidence which prevailed previous to the mutiny. There was no doubt that any civil government could be held in perfect security by a very police force, such as was being formed all over India, provided a small European force were within a reasonable distance. It should be recollected that the Native Sepoy army in Bengal, both regulars and irregulars, before the mutiny broke out, numbered 120,000 men, and that by its various contingents it amounted to considerably more, so that, were the same system of government which he had ventured to propose to be made, great economy would be combined with perfect security and efficiency.

Entertaining these opinions, and being fully convinced that legislation was greatly demanded upon this, as well as several other important questions connected with the well-being of India, he appeared to have escaped the attention of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India, he should certainly adopt the same course as the noble and gallant General the Member for Huntingdon, in giving his support to the second reading of the Bill.

WILLIAM RUSSELL said, as he had recently had an opportunity of seeing the working of the present military system in India, he was anxious to offer a few observations. Reasons might have been given during the reign of the East India Company for the maintenance of a double army, but he was surprised that any person would longer advocate the retention of a double force; in fact, it might have been effected with advantage at the time of the Conference. He regretted to hear the noble Lord the late Secretary of State for India say that he was still opposed to the amalgamation of the two armies, because, knowing that noble Lord devoted himself to the subject he undertook to consider, and now carefully he weighed the evidence on each side on every question that came before him, he had been fully prepared to declare that under the circumstances complete amalgamation was necessary. The Bill, however, had reference simply to the non-enlistment of men for the local European force. In dealing with the military part of the question, three arguments were urged in favour of a local force which required notice. The first was the necessity for the men becoming acclimatized; the second, that they would acquire a knowledge of the country and of the habits of the people; and the third, the expense of transport. With regard to the first, he believed the weight of medical testimony showed that the deaths of soldiers were greatly in excess during the first five years of their residence in India; but these took place mainly among the young recruits, and when a whole regiment of seasoned soldiers was sent out the mortality was comparatively small. It was therefore evident that less loss of life would be entailed by sending out a new and healthy regiment than by forwarding detachments of recruits. As to the second argument, he would simply say that it required a very short time indeed for the troops to acquire a knowledge of the habits of the people; and it must not be forgotten that when a regiment left India on the expiration of its term of service it was usual to permit those men who chose to do so to remain, and from 100 to 150 old soldiers often availed themselves of that privilege, who quickly initiated their younger comrades into a knowledge of the habits and prejudices of the people and the precautions necessary to be adopted. As to the third argument, that of the expense of transport, he had always looked on that as the only real and formidable objection; and until he saw the paper that had been laid before the House, showing that the entire expense would not amount to more than £170,000, he was led to believe that it was insurmountable. But on going over the paper he saw at once how the expense would be small, and as now the term of service was fixed at ten years, it mattered very little whether men were taken out as required or whether they went out in regiments to remain for that period. The number of men invalided was much alike in both services. To the arguments in favour of a local force, therefore, he attached very little weight. On the other side it was argued in favour of amalgamation—first, that a local force of necessity acquired strong local feelings and prejudices, and that the sentiment of allegiance to the mother country was less strong as they felt they were separated from it for life, than in regular troops. The late mutiny afforded an instance, though he was not disposed to urge it so strongly as some hon. Gentlemen had done, because he thought the men at first had right on their side, and that they only put themselves in the wrong by their subsequent conduct. But the second and the chief objection to a local corps was, that it was almost impossible to maintain in a climate like that of India a high state of discipline. It was impossible to give either men or officers a sufficient amount of occupation. They were compelled by the climate to rise before daybreak for drill, after which they were shut up in barracks for something like ten hours, and habits of intemperance and insubordination were thus engendered, which were fatal to discipline—by which he did not mean pipeclay discipline, but that strict and implicit obedience which was absolutely necessary to the existence of an army. This observation applied not merely to the local forces, but equally to the regiments of the Royal Army, which, if kept long in India, much deteriorated in discipline. At the same time, he was bound to bear his testimony to the gallantry of the local corps. He had the honour of fighting beside them, and he knew them to be unsurpassed in gallantry. They had proved themselves on every occasion of the best material. The third reason in favour of amalgamation was that those little feelings of jealousy, which often arose in matters of quarters and other points, would all be dissipated when the two armies were united in one. With regard to the position of the officers, he believed it was often made an argument on behalf of a local army that superior advantages were afforded by the local or special training which they received for the Indian service, and it was urged that great difficulty would be found in inducing officers of the Royal army to qualify themselves for Staff appointments. But this supposition was disproved by the facts, for since Staff appointments had been thrown open to officers in the Royal army five or six were qualified in every regiment, and in his own corps three officers had passed their examination within twelve months, and he had heard by the last mail that one had been appointed to the command of a body of irregular cavalry. It was, therefore, clear that if they held out the prizes of the service to the officers of the army they would find plenty ready to compete for them. He did not see why Her Majesty should have more difficulty in finding such men than the East

[First Night.]

Sir William Russell

India Company had. They would come from the same class, and they would be trained in the same college for the service. It had also been supposed the system of promotion in the local corps being by seniority, and not by purchase, would create an obstacle, but it had already been shown by an hon. Gentleman that the system of purchase did actually exist in the Indian army, as the officers were in the habit of paying a certain sum to induce a senior officer to retire, so that there would be no difficulty on this account, in amalgamating the two services. Then the Secretary for India had effectually disposed of another objection, that the first appointments would be made to the patronage of the Horse Guards. He stated that he understood the views of the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary for India, were that a college should be established for the Indian service, and that officers should obtain their appointments by competitive examination, as his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge had consented to give up all claim to the patronage. The fourth objection, if true, was a very serious one, that it would diminish the power of the Governor General. But he could not believe that the power of the Governor General would be at all curtailed, as all the prizes of the profession would be left in his gift. The staff appointments—the civil appointments—in fact all the appointments that were usually striven for by officers in India, would be left in his hands. How then could it be said that the power of the Governor General would be diminished? One thing was greatly in favour of the amalgamation of the Royal army. Under the existing system an officer might find himself, owing to his inability to continue in India in consequence of the state of his health, obliged to give up a profession which he had devoted the greater portion of his life, whereas, if the proposals of the Government were carried into effect, he might serve in Europe and be enabled to recruit his constitution. Next came the question of what was to be done with the Native army, which he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India would keep at the smallest possible amount, for he believed no enemy which we were likely to be called upon to encounter in the country was of the slightest importance except it were one which we happened to have trained in the use of arms ourselves. Until thus instructed the Natives of India were, in his opinion, most contemptible as a hostile body, and he felt satisfied that we should be contributing to the relief of our own troops by keeping the Native force at a low level in point of numbers, because under those circumstances we should not have so much trouble in looking after it as would otherwise be the case. For his own part, he thought no Native force, under the direction of Native chiefs, could withstand an army of 5,000 Europeans in the field. In corroboration of that view, he might state that he had the honour of serving under Lord Clyde when with a smaller force he had attacked upwards of 30,000 Natives, trained to the use of arms in accordance with the English system. 50,000 Europeans might, under those circumstances, he maintained, be regarded as a sufficient force to hold India in subjection. Passing from that point, he wished for a moment to refer to the statement which had on a previous evening been made by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley), who expressed an apprehension that if the proposed amalgamation were carried into effect the officers of the Native army would be looked down upon as inferiors by those serving in the Line. Now, he could not imagine that such would be the feeling with which men who were called upon to pass an examination, and who must possess certain high qualifications for their position, would be regarded, and while entertaining no fears upon that score, he should ask the House to bear in mind that one of the great advantages which the contemplated amalgamation would confer was that in the event of a European war we should be enabled to command a supply of Staff officers who were accustomed to move large bodies of troops from India—the field in which the Duke of Wellington had learnt two of the most important lessons in the conduct of a campaign—the keeping up a commissariat and the transport of troops. As to the opinions of the officers of the Indian army with reference to amalgamation, he could only say that up to the rank of major, he believed, they were unanimous in its favour, while above that rank they were nearly equally divided on the subject. Those officers were, he might add, a highly educated body of men. Their gallantry was beyond all praise, and they would, under those circumstances, be received by the officers of the Queen's troops as comrades of whom they might well be proud.

Sir MINTO FARQUHAR said, he believed this Bill was not brought forward as a party question, but, though introduced upon the responsibility of the Government, they left the question to the impartial feeling of the House. He would, therefore, disclaim all intention to treat it in a party spirit. At the same time he felt bound to express his surprise that on a subject of so important a nature, the right hon. Gentleman had not taken the advice of his Council. He had heard many reflections and remarks on the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman on that point out of doors. It was true that by the Act of Parliament constituting the Council it was not made a matter of compulsion that the right hon. Gentleman should take the advice of his Council; but still he was bound to say that when Parliament did constitute a Council, it was naturally expected that the right hon. Gentleman would take its advice; and he believed the public at large would have considered it much more satisfactory if he had done so. He would ask the right hon. Gentleman himself whether—having such men sitting in Council with him—men who, though they had passed the greater portion of their lives in India, he would venture to say were of European renown—men who had devoted their lives to the interests and welfare of India—he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not puerile to contend that they had been consulted, because the House had the means of knowing their opinion on the subject. It appeared, however, that the opinions of all were opposed to the present scheme, and that probably was the reason why the right hon. Gentleman had not consulted them on so important a subject as the amalgamation of the local army in India with the Line. But, passing from that point, he should wish briefly to refer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Charles Wood) when introducing his scheme to the notice of the House. That speech, he must confess, he had heard with great surprise, for he had heard the right hon. Gentleman make a statement on the 10th of August last to which it was diametrically opposed. On the 10th of August the question of insubordination, which was now made the ground of the present charge, was perfectly well known to the right hon. Gentleman, and if there was any ground for the charge, he was surprised that the right hon. Baronet had not made it then, instead of putting it forward ten months afterwards. It should also be borne in mind that the right hon. Gentleman was himself the Minister who, in 1853, increased the limit of the local force from 12,000 to 24,000, and who, still later, proposed to extend that limit to 30,000. But that was not all. Last year he called attention to the Report of the Commission for the reorganization of the army, and stated that though the majority were in favour of amalgamation, he thought the weight of authority was with the minority, especially as that minority included Sir John Lawrence. As to the subject of economy, the right hon. Gentleman talked very lightly of the sum of £100,000 or £150,000 being spent additional in consequence of the amalgamation; but the right hon. Gentleman ought to remember that he was dealing with the revenues not of England but of India, where this burden would be severely felt. Another reason the right hon. Gentleman formerly gave for a local corps was the inducement it held out to well educated young men to devote themselves to India as a career in life—that it led them to give themselves up to the study of the languages and habits of the Natives, and thus fitted them not merely for military service, but for other duties, which were indispensable to the Government of India. He had then gone on to speak of that insubordination among the local troops which he now made the groundwork of the contemplated amalgamation, observing, that although it was a serious occurrence, yet it was not sufficiently grave to alter the determination at which the Government had at the time arrived. The right hon. Gentleman on that occasion especially mentioned that many of the troops were young, and had but recently been enlisted in the manufacturing districts, and that the mutiny should rather be described as a strike; and, even after that, the right hon. Gentleman was decidedly of opinion that the local force should be retained. He (Sir Minto Farquhar) recollected that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) followed, and with the utmost frankness declared himself unfavourable to the local army. The right hon. Gentleman the present Minister for War afterwards spoke, and in reference to the observations of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon, said that the gallant General appeared in a double character—as a member of the majority of the Commission on which he sat, and as Minister of Her Majesty's Government. It appeared to him (Sir Minto Farquhar) that the right hon. Gentleman opposite had also assumed a double character

[First Night.

Sir Minto Farquhar

—that of opponent of a principle which had a short time before advocated. Report of the Commission itself showed that the local force was much less expensive than the Line; that for every addition of 1,000 of the latter, there would be an additional expense of from £6,000 to £9,000 a year. It had been said India ought to be governed upon the same principle as all our other Colonies. How was it possible to compare an army of 200,000,000 of Native inhabitants with our other Colonies, which were actually colonized by Englishmen, and the legislative assemblies of which were elected by Englishmen? It had been shown in reference to the comparative mortality of different troops that India was much more favourable to the health of the local troops than to the regular army. In Whiteley's army, during the mutiny and while on its march, the rate of mortality in the local troops was only 3 per cent, while it amounted to 11 per cent in the regular troops. It might be said the local troops were not so smart, or well set up as the Royal troops, but was there any proof of deficiency in their fighting qualities? They had ever been wanting in action? No one who had read the history of the mutiny, or every one who had watched the late mutiny, must agree that no force could distinguish themselves more than the local troops in India had done. As to the charge of insubordination, a certain amount of censure must be made for them. They were placed in a most peculiar position, under an impression that they were entitled to bounty or discharge on being transferred from the East India Company to the Crown. A discharge was given to them subsequently, and he was not surprised that so many of them should, under the circumstances, have taken advantage of it; but their conduct was hardly a sufficient reason for imputing to them so grave a charge as insubordination. It was true this Bill was a very simple one, but under the cloak of simplicity it often happened that there was a shadowing forth of different and far wider schemes. The House determined to carry this Bill, trusted, whatever its ulterior objects might be, at any rate they would have the advantage of seeing and giving their opinion upon them. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India in his speech the other night had quoted the authorities against maintaining a local European force, but those authorities were

him when he proposed a scheme of composite character. Even Mr. Wilson was not in favour of this plan, and Earl Grey, in a despatch which had recently been received, after having the opportunity of consulting Lord Clyde, Sir Hugh Rose, and other authorities referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, condemned the plan which had now been adopted. He was ready to give the right hon. Gentleman credit for the sincerity of his motives on this question, and for the manliness which he confessed his change of opinion. Having, however, given full consideration to the subject—having carefully perused the papers laid before the House in relation to it, and consulted many of those competent to form a judgment upon the matter, he must say that it was not his power to follow the right hon. Gentleman in the change of opinion which he had suddenly avowed in relation to this scheme.

MR. PERCY HERBERT said, he endeavoured to deal with some of the objections urged by the supporters of the Government against the scheme of the Government. The first and foremost of those objections was the expense. The House had in possession of papers in which that question was discussed at some length by Mr. Mackintosh and Sir Alexander Tulloch. He would not weary them by recapitulating the arguments, but would draw attention to one point which was important. Mr. Mackintosh struck out the expense of the original outfit of the troops to India. Sir Alexander Tulloch very fairly objected to this omission. Mr. Mackintosh replied that, in acting according to his brief, he did not think it necessary to make any allowance on that score. But it was obvious that the House must consider it. It was a question of finding a local army which they sought to reconstitute, but of raising a new army in place of the army which already existed and was in India. That army must be trained in this country. It must be trained for many months, if not for one or two years, before it could go out in a state of efficiency, and the whole expense of training must be borne by the Indian revenue. Meanwhile another army must be maintained at home, also at the expense of the Indian revenue, and this was the plan proposed in the financial interest of the Government of India. In the morning he saw a plan by Major General

Bombay Army, who proposed to break up, by a system of volunteering, a number of regiments in India, and to draw largely upon the resources of the Royal army at home for the purpose of sending out drafts of trained soldiers. The proposal was to take three-fifths of the men from the regiments now serving in India, and to fill up those regiments from regiments at home, and also to put the Royal officers by wholesale upon half-pay at the expense of this country. If the scheme had been propounded by a clerk in one of the departments, who thought that soldiers, like bricks, could be built into any shape, he should not have been surprised, but he was astonished that any officer should have proposed such a preposterous scheme. Umbrage was taken at the depôts being on a different system to that formerly adopted. Now all they wanted was to have troops in the best state of efficiency in India, and, if it could be shown that the depôt system of the Company was the best, by all means let it be adopted. But he was inclined to believe that to take out raw and undisciplined soldiers, and thereby injure the efficiency of regiments already in India, would not be cheapest, but most expensive in the long run. The efficiency of an army was not to be tested by statistical returns, but by the fact whether the Government could rely on their obedience and discipline in the hour of trial. Let them then consider whether a local army or the Queen's troops would best support that test.

He next came to the question of the supply of officers. Nearly all the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken had treated the matter as if it was a question of the total destruction of the army of the East India Company. But the plan of the Government affected only that portion of the army which was composed of European troops; and the Bombay army, including twenty-five Native infantry regiments, and the Madras army, including fifty-two Native infantry regiments, were not interfered with. The officers required might be drawn from either of those establishments, and they had also the whole of the Royal army from which to choose. What was the system? A young man went out, ignorant of the country, of the effect which the climate would have on his constitution, and of the advantages and disadvantages of the service, except as far as they were represented to him by his friends. But how would the matter now stand? It was proposed that an officer serving in India, having made himself acquainted with the Native language, and knowing whether he could stand the climate or not, should be enabled, with his eyes open, to elect whether he would remain in the Royal army, or whether he would take permanent service in India. An hon. Member asked, how would they get rid of people who were inefficient, supposing they were on the Staff? It was proposed to take them on probation, and if, after one or two years' trial they did not find out whether they were fit for the service, they would not be worse off than they were now, when they took them for better for worse, with no probation and with no power of getting rid of them. The hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir James Elphinstone) said that the European regiments which arrived from this country were not efficient. He could not help remembering that regiments which had very lately arrived from this country in considerable numbers formed part of Lord Clyde's and Sir Hugh Rose's forces, and that the operations undertaken with them were thoroughly successful. He had not heard any fault found; but, on the contrary, he had heard some regiments mentioned in the highest terms which only left this country at the commencement of the mutiny. The hon. Member for Perthshire (Mr. Kinnaird) drew a comparison which rather amused him. The hon. Member went as far as New Zealand, and he said that it would be a great anomaly if New Zealand, having possessions in Europe, held those possessions by a New Zealand army. It might be an anomaly; but if he were living, when the New Zealander stood upon the ruins of London Bridge, as a military man he should recommend it. If New Zealand ever did hold possessions in Europe, they might depend upon it she would do it by a New Zealand army.

[First Night.]

There was another point which was rather invidious, but which had been urged more than once in the course of this debate. A string of names of gallant and distinguished officers, servants of the East India Company, had been read out, and it was said, "Would you destroy an army which furnished such men as these? Are you going to brand this as an army not to be trusted?" He was the last person to dispute the honour, the credit, and the glory of these men, but there were other names of equally distinguished officers, not belonging to the Company, constantly cropping out in the page of history. The hon. Member for Perthshire stumbled on the names of some Royal officers in reading out a list of those of the Company. The case of General Elphinstone had been alluded to, and it had not been fairly put before the House on another occasion. It was true that the Government of the day and the Horse Guards were responsible for sending General Elphinstone to India. He believed it was a bad selection, not from any fault of the General, but from his physical inability. Still it must be recollected that it was very difficult then to find officers of the rank of Major General who were not too old for service, and it was also frequently the case in the Indian army. There had been cases of officers removed from command during the mutiny of 1857, and for no other reason than physical inability, and they were not appointed by the Horse Guards or the Home Government. A point which was quite lost sight of was, who appointed General Elphinstone to command in the field? The Government of India, and the Government of India alone. The Government at home might send out a man to serve in India, but with the exception of the Commander-in-Chief they had not the power to nominate him to command a field force. That must be done by the Governor General.

Colonel Percy Herbert

He was very glad to hear that the proposal of balancing one army against the other had been abandoned. It had been said that the Queen's troops would not have acted against the local European force if the mutiny had continued. As a soldier, he ought to hope that, if that last and most fearful trial were put upon the Royal army, its sense of honour and its loyalty to its Sovereign would make it perform even that painful duty in the strictest manner. But God forbid it ever should undergo so severe a test as to be called upon to act against men wearing the same uniform, and having the same blood in their veins. He must almost apologize for terming what had happened in the local army a "mutiny," but when soldiers "struck" with arms in their hands and ammunition in their pouches he thought "mutiny" a more appropriate name for such a proceeding than "strike," and it was moreover the name by which military men described it. What would have been the position of the Indian Government if on that occasion the whole, or even the greater portion of the army, had been composed of local troops? The Government in that case must have either coerced, disbanded, or given in to the men. If the Government held, was it to be supposed that no question as to pay and allowances ever arise between the soldiers and

And if the men found in one instance they were so strong that the Government was bound to yield, would they not be again to carry their point? If the Government yielded to another combination, the victory of the men would the next time be still more certain; the Government would absolutely lose its independence, and they would necessarily become its master instead of its servant. In the Royal Commission on the other hand, if insubordination occurred, they could remove the mutinous element from India altogether. That idea was scoffed at as absurd the other night, but it was said they could equally remove the element from one quarter to another whether it belonged to a local or a Line force. Merely, to remove men from one part of India to another, thereby diffusing instead of stopping the disease, was very different from removing them from India altogether, and sending them to a place where a new system being in force, the question of pay and allowances could not be raised, and where, consequently, the question would entirely drop by the removal of the one or two corps who have been disaffected.

Another objection which had been urged at England could not afford to maintain a large European army in India. The argument either meant that the Government could not stand the drain upon the treasury by such a force, or that the country could not bear the expense it would incur.

Now England never yet had paid for the army employed in India, and trusted the House of Commons would take care it never should. Straws have been thrown up to see how the Government would behave, but he hoped they would consent even to guarantee any loan for India. India derived great advantages from British rule in the tranquillity and the security for life and property it enjoyed; if well governed, it was perfectly content to pay to the last sixpence out of its own administration and the interest on its own debt. Then, with reference to the alleged drain upon our treasury, how on earth it could make any difference whether the European element sent to India belonged to the Line or a local force was to him utterly inapprehensible. The real question was one of the amount of force, but of its organization. The House had to say whether it would have the army which, by the evidence before them and the admission even of the advocates of a local force, was the best disciplined of the two; and which being therefore the most efficient, was the cheapest the State could employ. On another subject a great misconception seemed to prevail. It was thought by some that the whole patronage of the army was to be transferred from the Indian Government to the much-dreaded Horse Guards. No doubt the ensigns of the regiments would be nominated, in the ordinary course of things, by the Commander-in-Chief. But the appointments to the Staff—which did not mean merely the Quartermaster-General and the Adjutant-General—but the civil appointments, the commands in the irregular corps, and all the plums held out to encourage officers to serve in India would remain precisely as at present in the hands of the local authorities. It was not now intended to give any portion of that patronage, military or civil, to the Home Government. Then, to conclude, nothing, he believed, restrained the turbulent races of India from oppressing their less warlike neighbours except a knowledge of the power of the British Government to repress and punish such attempts. And because its ability to do this depended on the efficiency and fidelity of its Native army; because they had no such security for maintaining the fidelity of that Native army as the presence of a disciplined European force, ready to obey the behests of the Government and enforce its orders and regulations; because, by the proposed organization, the discipline of that European force would be upheld at a higher point than either had been or reasonably could be attained by a local European force; because by this measure they would render combination against the Government far less likely to arise, and much more easily to be dealt with if it did occur; because if they guarded the Government of India from that greatest danger no combination among the Natives, no rising or rebellions, would ever shake our power; because if they were to secure to the people of India the benefits of British rule, the authority of the Government must not only be supreme, but undisputed; because he believed the Bill of Her Majesty's Government would conduce to these ends he should give it his cordial support, and vote against the Amendment of the hon. Member for Taunton.

[First Night.]

MR. BUXTON: We now feel the disadvantage, Sir, of having excluded the Members of the Council of India from Parliament. The consequence is that, instead of their opinions on a matter of such importance being stated by themselves, with all the authority of their great Indian experience, they have to be expressed for them by those who, not having been in India, cannot have much weight with the House, whatever study they may have given to this question. But although they are silenced, I trust the House will bear in mind that this scheme for doing away with the local European army is condemned by every one of the fifteen Members of the Council of India at home, men of different professions, drawn from all parts of India, only alike in this, that they have been all selected for their great ability and experience. The scheme is condemned by the Council at Calcutta, and by no one more than Mr. Wilson, in whom the Government place such unbounded confidence. It is condemned by the Earl of Ellenborough, by the Marquess of Dalhousie, by Earl Canning. It is condemned by Sir John Lawrence; it is condemned, and that, as we saw the other night, after profound research and reflection, by the noble Lord the Member for Lynn (Lord Stanley), than whom no statesman shows higher judgment or sagacity. More than this, the right hon. and gallant General opposite (General Peel) told us the other day that not only the noble Lord but the whole of the late Government were called upon to form an opinion on this question, and were decidedly in favour of a local European army. More than that, we know that only last Session—only a few months ago—the Secretary of State himself and Her Majesty's Government were clearly in favour of a local army, and actually prepared a Bill for largely increasing its amount. To those, who, like myself, feel it unpleasant to oppose the present Government, it is a great satisfaction to remember that the opinion that we still entertain was held within a few months both by the late Government and by the one which displaced them. The question then is whether anything has occurred to warrant a change of opinion. It appeared from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State the other evening that this strange and sudden change of opinion was mainly due to the mutiny of the local European troops. On that point Earl Canning remarks:—

Colonel Percy Herbert

"I hold that there is much to be said as to the bringing together, in this remote dependence of one vast English army, pervaded by an intensity of feeling and interest, and likely to be swayed in the same direction by any accidental influence."

To precisely the same effect the Military Committee of the Council of India would serve:—

"It (the mutiny) supplies a powerful argument for the maintenance of a mixed European force, because it is most desirable that the soldiers, in discussing a supposed grievance, should not be able to count upon the sympathy and support of their whole body; and, again, because the Government would have the opportunity of dividing one part of its European army as a check on the other;" in short, because this division "would offer the best security against combination."

The Secretary of State did not attempt to meet that remark by argument; but he tried to thrust it aside by stating that it filled him with astonishment and so forth. I confess I see no reason for the magnificent lamentations of the right hon. Gentleman. It seems to me that the remarks of the Committee is full of plain good sense. It is quite true that some day similar contents may arise in the Imperial police of the European force. In such a case, a gallant Officer opposite has told us, now that, should discontent arise, all would have to be done would be to reorganise the disaffected regiments. But suppose discontent spread through the whole 80,000 men, how would it be possible to send them away from India? Surely, if such a calamity were to happen, it would be of essential advantage that the army should be divided into two portions in order that one might mow the other down with grape shot, but in order to preserve the sympathies and feelings of the two being different, one of the two might all likelihood remain loyal, as has happened in this very case. It might be of incalculable value—the very salvation, perhaps, of our dominion in India—such a crisis to have at any rate, one European army available against any attempt of the Natives to take advantage of our difficulties. That seems to me a valid argument. I do not wonder that it emanating from such men as Mr. Loughby, Sir John Lawrence, Colonel Rand, Captain Eastwicke, and General Vivian. I do wonder, however, that the right hon. Gentleman should have the fit to speak with contempt of such an opinion expressed by such men.

I think, Sir, that in proposing to change the Government have not really the interests even of the Imperial Government. Undoubtedly, to nineteen officers of twenty it would be the greatest possible relief to have India excluded from their tour of service. Otherwise, their time and presence from England will be greatly wasted; and that increase will be spent in a tropical sun, and in a country that is always distasteful to those who have not gone out to it young with the view of making a career there. At the same time, the Governor General tells us that it will be a most serious loss to the Indian Government if in future their officers shall not go to India for a brief sojourn, in preference to, as hitherto, going out to spend their lives and strength there, with their names given to an Indian career, and bent upon winning all the prizes it offers. Moreover, we are told on the highest authority, that no one has ventured to deny it, that the Native army will feel bitter mortification at so broad a line being drawn between them and the European force. The principle of Indian statesmanship can be no more sound or more generally acknowledged than the principle of making no difference between the white and coloured population; and yet we are going out of our way to make such a distinction between them as never was made before. The gallant General opposed in his speech the other evening, rejected the fallacy which has been everywhere exploded by the Registrar-General's statement, as well as by others—the fallacy that, because soldiers are now engaged even for Indian service, only for ten years, therefore there will be no great difference in the transmission of regiments whether we have a local or an Imperial force. But in fact, as Mr. Hammack points out, the terms of service of the individual soldier will expire year after year. Multitudes will be invalided or will perish. Those vacancies, except just at the end of the regiments' term of service, will be filled up from home. In short, there will be almost as great an amount of annual transmission of single men under the new system as the other. But there will be a difference, that under the new system, in addition to those movements of individual soldiers, there will be the transfer of the whole regiment at the end of ten years' service in India. And mark the important consequence. It is this, that before the passage to and fro of single men, we will every year have to transmit regiments between India and England to the extent (making every allowance) of no less than 12,000 or 13,000 men, whose services during that long voyage will be absolutely lost to the country, although, of course, they will meanwhile be drawing nearly their full-pay. And it is inevitable that the extra expense of those regimental movements must, and will, be a heavy burden to Indian finance. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State, indeed, told us the other evening that he was inclined to think that the extra cost of an Imperial force would not be more than £114,000 per annum, although he allowed it might reach £200,000, but he reckoned that cost on the supposition that the local force would remain only at its present amount. That I believe is not desired by any one. While this question has been pending, the Government have reduced the local force to the lowest possible limit, so that now it does not reach 14,000 men. But Lord Canning's proposition, the one entertained by those who desire the maintenance of a local force, is, that two-thirds of the whole European army, in other words, 53,000 men, should belong to the local force. That is the real alternative. If that alternative should be carried out, the saving by having a local force would be four times that calculated upon by the Secretary of State. In other words, it would amount to between 500,000 and 800,000 per annum. I put it to any one who has studied Indian questions, whether the annual saving of that enormous sum is not of vital importance, especially at such a time as the present. To me it seems in itself a decisive argument against the proposed change.

Again, Sir, great varieties of opinion have been expressed as to the difference in health between a local and an Imperial force. But I find that the accountant employed by the Registrar General, looking at the matter merely in a pecuniary point of view, states that from the large mass of statistics that he has examined, "The results were uniformly in favour of the local troops." In fact, the whole statistics show the deaths to be 17 per 1,000 less in the local than in the Imperial force—a difference, in a body of 53,000 men, of 900 deaths per annum, and, of course, disease in proportion. Weighing these arguments—the security a division of the army would give in case of discontent; the disadvantage of an Indian turn of service to the regular army; the loss of power to the Indian Government; the mortification to the Native army; the waste of force in the transmission of whole regiments between England and India; the immense additional cost, the increased disease and mortality; finally, the great weight of authority against this proposal—I have felt bound to do my utmost to oppose this measure. Look at the strangeness of the logic upon which it rests. In the last few years we have had two great wars. The system of administration in the one—despite all the zeal and ability of those who had to work it—was such as to ruin our army, to cause infinite anguish at home, and to lower our military prestige in the eyes of Europe. The administration in the other, though it came on them like a whirlwind, was found guilty of no delay, of no blunder, of no miscarriage. Whereupon Her Majesty's Government propose to the House of Commons to transfer the army of India from those whose administration had so magnificently succeeded to those whose administration had so magnificently failed. Again, in the same war, the local European force at Lucknow, at Delhi, and elsewhere, performed prodigies of valour. No shadow of a slur was cast on its prowess. It most materially aided in restoring our dominion. In a hundred fights it rolled back the tide of war. It bore the brunt of overwhelming myriads at Agra; it marched with Havelock on Lucknow; it mounted the breach at Delhi; whereupon the Government tell us it is a worthless, undisciplined army, and ought to be done away with. Again, in one point the Indian Government has stood first among the Governments of the world. Somehow that Government has always had the merit—and I know not what greater merit a Government can have—the merit of always putting the right man into the right place: and undoubtedly, to that wise and patriotic exercise of power, our dominion over India has been mainly due. On the other hand the Home Government have also had patronage to exercise in India; and the pregnant fact is that our worst reverses in that country have been distinctly owing to officers appointed by that Home Government. Without going through the painful history of those failures, I will only remind the House of the last and greatest. Who can doubt that if there had been at Meerut, in May, 1857, a man of vigour and decision, the mutiny might probably have been crushed in the bud? Yet the Government, with that terrible experience still flashing in our memories, propose to us to transfer the patronage of the Indian army from those whose exercise of it has ever been so wise, so noble, so successful, to those whose misuse of it has brought shame and ruin. Sir, in sitting down I earnestly ask Her Majesty's Government to state what they propose to do under that head. The gallant General opposite acknowledged the other evening that it would be essential, if this change were made, that all the appointments to commands in India should be in the hands, not of the Commander-in-Chief at home, but of the Indian Government. But we have not had a word to that effect from the Secretary of State for India. I am most thoroughly persuaded that, however advantageous this measure might be in other respects, it will be most disastrous if it is passed without our exacting a distinct pledge from Her Majesty's Government that the appointments to commands in India should not be in the hands of an individual thousands of miles away, overwhelmed with work, and who can have no especial knowledge or interest about Indian affairs, but in the hands of those who are responsible for the tranquillity and defence of our Indian Empire.

[First Night.]

Mr. Buxton

MR. HORSMAN: I will not follow my hon. Friend through the arguments by which he has met the statements of his opponents as to the comparative health, efficiency, and cost of a local army and regiments of the Line, nor will I imitate the example set by some hon. Gentlemen who have treated this as an entirely military question. There is no doubt that the question, whether or not we shall have a local army in India is a very important and interesting one, and one upon which authorities have been much divided; but I do not think that that is the first or main question which we have to consider to-night. There are two preliminary questions, in regard to which I have no doubt the House feels as I do—that we have some cause to complain of the course which has been pursued by the promoters of this Bill. In the first instance, we have to inquire whether the House has been fairly treated, whether it has had laid before it all the papers and information that are absolutely essential to forming a fair judgment upon this question; and then we have to ask whether the House is prepared to adopt a course so novel and so unprecedented as that of carrying out a great change, involving so many questions both of principle and of detail, not by a legislative measure well considered and matured, but by an abstract Resolution which is to be the beginning and the end of all our proceedings in regard to it. I do not believe that in the whole history of Government there is any instance of Ministers of the Crown making such a proposal. Because the question is one of great difficulty, because it is one of vast importance, because it is one with which the Secretary of State for India has not been able to cope, because it is one by which he has been entirely beaten, because he cannot propose a measure for safely carrying out the changes which he has the slightest chance of passing through the House of Commons, therefore he says, "I will shirk the House of Commons, I will dodge the House of Commons, I will degrade the House of Commons into abdicating its legislative functions. I will get it to pass an abstract Resolution, and all the delicate complications of these mixed political and military arrangements on which depend the government and safety of our Indian Empire shall be left to the legislation of the Horse Guards"—that is, to the legislation of the department which, of all departments, is incompetent to deal with a question involving mixed military and political considerations, which has a direct and special interest in every one of the changes which are about to be made, and which is therefore the most unfit to be intrusted with the task of enlarging and defining the new law which you are about to give it in this Bill.

Two years ago Parliament passed an Act which transferred the Government of India from the Company to the Crown. It was a measure very suddenly determined upon; a hasty, ill-matured, and most incomplete proceeding. At that time we found it impossible to get any explanation of the most important point which was involved in that change, that which we are now right considering. The transfer of the Imperial Sovereignty from the Company to the Crown was a very simple affair, but the transference of the Government, of the Empire, was the transfer of authority over the army. It is the army which, by a combination of military and political functions, governs India. Your Governor General is the great political and military chief; he is the authority, and he is the object of great respect and reverence in India, because he is the great military chief at the head of large forces, and if you divest him of his military attributes, you divest him of that which is his great claim to respect in the eyes of a barbarous people. The whole administration of India is one of mixed political and military character and functions. That runs through all the departments of the Government. It is the growth of a century; it is the subject of various legislative enactments, and it has been cemented by successive Acts of Parliament, every one of which, though they are not before us, we are asked to repeal by this one sweeping clause. The most difficult of all the questions connected with the administration of India, and the one upon which there has been the greatest amount of controversy, is this one of the army. It is the one upon which every military authority has told you that the safety of your Indian Empire depends. It is the one, therefore, which requires the greatest amount of thought, circumspection, and consideration on the part of Parliament, which casts upon Parliament the greatest responsibility, and with regard to which, especially, Parliament cannot delegate its functions to any other department. But, because it is a subject with which the Secretary of State has been unable to cope, which has been too much for the experience of the Indian Council, and of which the united wisdom of the whole Cabinet has not been able to solve the difficulties, we are to commit it to the Horse Guards, and leave that Department to carry out all the arrangements which are to establish what are to be the relations between the Horse Guards and the army and all the various Departments in India, which are to make the Commander-in-Chief independent of the Governor General, to transfer to the military authorities at home the command of a much larger army than that over which they now exercise control, to give the Horse Guards all the patronage and all the influence which the command of that army will involve, and to make its expenditure independent of the control of Parliament; in fact, and in reality, to transfer the supreme Government of India from the Governor General in India to the Horse Guards in London. All this may be very right, very expedient, and very wise; but at this moment we have not before us information which enables us to judge whether it is so or not, and if it be ever so wise or expedient we are not justified in passing this Resolution and leaving the details of the measure to be filled up by any department. Let me show the House how the right hon. Baronet proposes to proceed. In asking leave to introduce this Bill he said—

[First Night.]

"The Bill I propose to introduce contains only one simple clause for this purpose; and I have adopted this mode of bringing the question before the House, in order to test its opinion on the principle of the measure without encumbering it with any details that might distract attention from the main question. In the execution of the measure a great number of details will have to be carefully considered; indeed, if the House refers to papers now on the table, it will find among them a letter addressed to me from one of the ablest officers now serving in the Indian army, suggesting the necessity of appointing a Commission or Committee of experienced officers, to go into the numerous and minute details that will arise when the measure is brought into practical operation."—[3 Hansard, vol. clix., p. 369.]

Now, the House cannot fail to perceive in what a state of helpless and almost ridiculous state of ignorance the right hon. Gentleman is as to what is to follow the passing of the Resolution which is now before us. He says that an officer has suggested a Committee or Commission, but he does not say that the Government approves, or has even considered, that suggestion. If hon. Gentlemen will take the trouble to ransack the blue-book, he tells them they will find in one of its pages that suggestion made by a colonel in the army, holding no official position, and whose name I dare say not half-a-dozen Gentlemen in this House ever heard before; and upon this vague suggestion the right hon. Gentleman proposes that we should make a change which will unsettle and dislocate every administrative department in India, and which will revolutionize the existing system of Government, without our having the slightest idea what is to take its place. He asks us not to encumber him with details. I will show the House immediately what he meant by these details, but does it not at once suggest itself to hon. Members what a novel mode this is, not only of considering the convenience of the Government, but also of saving the time and trouble of the House? Is it not a pity the discovery was not made somewhat earlier in the Session? Suppose the suggestion had occurred to the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary when about to introduce his Reform Bill. What a great deal of trouble it would have saved the House! He might have asked us, like the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India, to adopt a Resolution which would merely have affirmed a simple principle—"Whereas it is necessary that Parliament should be reformed, therefore be it enacted that Parliament shall be reformed." That simple Resolution having been passed, it might have been remitted to a Committee, or a Commission—which,

Mr. Horsman

I suppose, would have meant in such a case a few elderly Gentlemen of the Whig persuasion—to decide what boroughs should be disfranchised and what should be the amount of the suffrage, and then a Reform Bill might have been carried through both Houses of Parliament and have received the Royal Assent. But although, as regarded the Reform Bill, that might have appeared a very ridiculous proposal, I venture to say that the change which that measure would have made in the Government of England is as nothing compared with the change which this one clause will make in the Government of India.

The Government of India has been one of comparatively slow growth. It has been established by the enterprise and the achievements of heroes in the field, and the wisdom of statesmen in the Cabinet. It is now going to be subverted—and why? Because the right hon. Gentleman has chosen upon this question to show himself in as distinct a contrast as he possibly could to his predecessor in the office he now holds; for the noble Lord who was lately Secretary of State for India brought to the consideration of this question the capacity of a statesman and the courage and conscience of a Minister, and having, after full inquiry, formed his own conclusions upon the subject, he honourably adhered to them; he made the public interest his first care, and he would have resigned office rather than have abandoned the path of duty. I must say that neither in the measure now before us nor in the speech by which the right hon. Gentleman introduced it, is there any evidence of his having grappled with the subject, or of his having had the courage to resist the pressure brought upon him to make this change. He has changed his policy, but, as I shall show, he has placed that change upon the most disingenuous grounds. He sacrifices the position of the Governor General, he snubs the Indian Council, he suppresses the most important information that ought to be laid before us, and he attempts to entrap the House of Commons, under the pretext of affirming a principle, into revolutionizing the whole Government of India.

The proposal which he makes is to repeal the Act which he himself passed last year. The history of that Act is somewhat curious, and I beg the particular attention of the House to it, because I am sorry to say upon one point I have to make a rather serious charge against the right hon. Gentleman. He himself passed this in the month of August last for continuing and perpetuating the local Government of India. When he came into office he had a great preponderance of authority in favour of a local army in India. He found the Governor General strongly in favour of it; found his council unanimous; he found Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield, if they will produce their earlier letters, of the same opinion. He found, moreover, that his predecessor in office had determined on continuing the local army, and, notwithstanding to fly in the face of all these authorities, he also declared himself in favour of that army, and introduced and passed the Bill to perpetuate it. But the matter does not rest there. Speaking in the absence of documents, which have not yet been laid on our table, I speak, of course, for correction; but as I have been informed, as soon as the Act was passed transferring the Government of India from the Company to the Crown, a correspondence arose between the Horse Guards in London, the Secretary of State for India, and the Secretary of State for War. The question was, whether or not the Commander-in-Chief in London was to have the same authority over all the armies in India that he has over the army in England. That claim was to have been put forward, if it was put forward, in complete oblivion of the fact that the Governor General represents the Sovereign, that he is at the head of the armies in India, and that if you were to place another authority at their head, you would place a Commander-in-chief in India independent of the Governor General, and communicating directly with the authorities in England, you would establish not only divided authority, but a double Government worse than the one you have abolished, and introduce a new military element into the Government of India which in a short time must become supreme. At the time the matter was submitted to the law officers of the Crown, who gave it as their opinion that the Secretary of State for India had by law no power to transfer the command of the armies in India to the authority of the Horse Guards in London. The noble Lord, the Member for Lynn (Lord Stanley) acting on that opinion, retained the control of the armies in India in the hands of the Governor General, and as long as he remained in office he did his duty. But the present Secretary of State for India has this year changed his policy, and, having done so, of course it was necessary for him to give a reason. The right hon. Gentleman has not been slow to give a reason, although he has been very slow in producing the papers that would enable us to test its accuracy. The grounds for his change of policy, as he says, are these,—circumstances have changed since his predecessor and himself determined to continue the local army in India; there has been a mutiny among the local regiments; that has led him to reconsider his decision, and he is now resolved to abolish that local army which before the mutiny he thought should be maintained. I appeal to any one who has heard the speech of the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not the mutiny of the local regiments in India that formed the sole justification for the change which he now proposes. But, let me ask, had that mutiny not taken place when he passed his Act last year? Was it not known to the Government, nay, had it not been taken by them into consideration as an element in the passing of the Act which became law under their auspices last Session? Let the right hon. Gentleman speak for himself. In introducing that measure on the 10th of August last year, he said:—

“Recent occurrences in India might produce some effect upon men's minds in relation to the question of maintaining a local force. It seemed to him that those occurrences were of an exceptional nature, and, serious as they were, they hardly ought to alter the decision which had been arrived at upon other grounds. He did not think the circumstances such as to justify departing from the decision of the late and the present Government, to maintain a local force in India.” [3 Hansard, clv., 1304-5.]

Is it not obvious that when the right hon. Gentleman tells us now that the circumstances of the mutiny have led to his change of policy, those circumstances are merely a weak, and, I think I may say, an unsuccessful pretence? But knowing, when he introduced the present Bill the other day, that his speech of last year was upon record, and that it would probably be appealed to, he felt it was necessary to attribute his change of policy to other circumstances.

It is here that I would ask the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, because I now wish to bring under the notice of the House a fact which I think requires, for the vindication of his own character, a very clear and immediate explanation. The right hon. Gentleman, having last year used the language which I have read to the House, now says that, although he knew of the occurrence of the mutiny when he passed his Act last Session, yet he was only imperfectly acquainted with the facts, which he did not think were so grave as they afterwards turned out to be. He then believed it was a mutiny only among the younger soldiers of the regiments, and, when he found the older soldiers were implicated, the matter assumed a more serious aspect, and upon that ground he has resolved to change his policy. I need not stop to comment upon the absurdity of making the most important change that could be proposed in the government of an empire depend upon the fact whether the disaffected in a few regiments are above or under twenty-five years of age. But I must give you the language of the right hon. Gentleman himself. He says:—

"While the question was pending a succession of letters, extracts from which were laid on the table of the House, arrived from India, pointing out how much more grave and serious the conduct of the European troops who had mutinied was than had been supposed in the first instance. The mutiny began to assume the appearance, not of being the work of young men who had just gone out to India, but of an organized combination among their older comrades, and this new aspect of affairs furnished ground for serious consideration."

The knowledge of that fact was the justification of the change which the right hon. Gentleman has now adopted. But is it credible that when the right hon. Gentleman made that statement he was in possession of a communication from Lord Clyde to the Governor General of India, dated, not in the autumn of 1859, but the 9th of November, 1858? The right hon. Gentleman told us that the mutiny in the autumn of 1859 began to assume the appearance of being among the old soldiers, and yet the right hon. Gentleman was in possession of a despatch from Lord Clyde dated the 9th of November, 1858, which I will read to the House. [Sir CHARLES WOOD: From what page are you quoting?] From one of the papers that the right hon. Gentleman has suppressed; and that is part of my case, and if the House will agree to a Committee I will prove that there are a great many other documents equally important which the right hon. Gentleman has suppressed. Lord Clyde on the 9th of November, 1858, despatched a telegram to the Governor General as follows:—

"That which has declared itself in the cavalry regiment of Lucknow has also shown itself among the old soldiers of the Madras Fusileers. I must impress the gravity of this upon your Lordship, and I would urge the necessity of dealing in the matter with the greatest circumspection."

Mr. Horeman

How does the right hon. Gentleman explain this? He tells us that he adopted a change of policy as soon as he found in August 1859, that the old soldiers were implicated in the mutiny, he knowing very well that he had information to a contrary effect, which he takes very good care not to lay upon the table of the House. Sir, a very large conventional latitude is allowed to Ministers of the Crown in the preparation and production of papers. I have often complained of it. I think that latitude is carried too far. But it is permitted, because the House places implicit confidence in the honour and high character of Ministers of the Crown. I think that upon this occasion the right hon. Gentleman has abused that confidence, and that he has not acted fairly by the House, and the transaction is the more grave because, if this Bill is pressed we shall have occasion to show that this is not a solitary proceeding on the part of the right hon. Gentleman. Why are not the despatches of Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield before us now? They were laid on the table three months ago. On the 23rd of March they were ordered to be printed, and who can keep them back but the head of the department? Why, then, does the right hon. Gentleman keep them back? Is it because if they were here he could not have delivered the statement he made the other night; is it because keeping back these despatches enabled him to mislead the House; and the probability was that this Bill would have been passed before these papers were produced and read. I state now, in the face of the House and in the face of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India, that if these early despatches of Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield are printed they will give a new character to that proceeding on which the right hon. Gentleman professes to found this measure. If these papers are produced they will refute the statements of the right hon. Gentleman on many important points. I can also state from my own knowledge that there are other documents which have been laid upon the table of this House and produced as complete which are only extracts—that important passages have been taken out of them. I pledge myself to prove this, and I ask how we can be in a position to pass this measure, when a great deal of the evidence has been garbled, and while the main statements upon which the right hon. Gentleman founds his Bill are proved to have been founded entirely upon an in-tracy? I say that under these circumstances we are not in a condition to consider this amalgamation. I decline, with these papers, to consider it at all. I prepared, when we have the necessary papers before us, to answer the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel). I can tell you that Lord Clyde and Sir William Field said that the men who mutinied had a grievance, and the non-commissioned officers made common cause with them when they had a common grievance. A regiment of the Line was quarantined in the same cantonments, and, if the discontent was so widely spread, why did these non-commissioned officers of the Line tell their officers what was going on? It is notorious that there is not a regiment of the Line or the Guards that would not under the same circumstances have acted in the same manner. The officers of the Line then in 1857 say that, if their own soldiers had at that moment been offered their discharge, the service in India would not have been so disastrous as it was. It is notorious that the service in India would not have been so disastrous as it was, if the non-commissioned officers of the Line had not been offered their discharge. It is notorious that the service in India would not have been so disastrous as it was, if the non-commissioned officers of the Line had not been offered their discharge. It is notorious that the service in India would not have been so disastrous as it was, if the non-commissioned officers of the Line had not been offered their discharge.

Why have we not had these papers before us? I complain that in the whole of these proceedings there has been an attempt to mislead the House, to smuggle this Bill through, and to entrap the House into passing an Act without an opportunity of duly considering so important a legislative measure.

The intention of the Government to pass this amalgamation was concealed until the latest moment. Within a week after bringing the matter to the Council of India the right hon. Gentleman gave notice of the Bill. He gave that notice the day before Whitsuntide, and brought in the Bill the first week after the Whitsuntide holidays.

The Bill was brought in by the right hon. Gentleman on a Notice Day. He introduced it at half-past ten o'clock at night, and spoke until half-past twelve, and then proposed that it should be brought in and discussed the first time without further discussion. He, however, protested, and asked for an adjournment. The right hon. Gentleman pressed for immediate action on the part of the House; but the noble Lord at the head of the Government, with more judgment and consideration, agreed to the postponement, observing, however, at the same time that he was conceding it to a minority. The section of this House which reads the books and examines such questions fully will always be numerically an insignificant minority. They do not on that account deserve less consideration from the Government; it is this small section which, on occasions of this kind, is the guardian of the public interests.

The right hon. Gentleman asks us to pass the Bill as a question of principle, and leave the details to a Commission floating in the distance. Well, but what are the details of this measure? They are so important that every one deserves to be dealt with as a separate measure, and involves some important principle. What are to be, for example, the relations between the Commander-in-Chief and the Governor General? Is India to be governed under one supreme head or is a double Government to be re-established? If the Governor General is to communicate with the Secretary of State on civil matters, and with the Horse Guards upon the army, shall we not have a divided authority, and how is the Government to be carried on? This is one of the matters of detail. A second question is—are we to have a Native army, and if so, under whose command? Is it to be under the Horse Guards? Then we shall have the whole army under a department that will give its orders 10,000 miles away. If it is to be under the Governor General, you defeat your object, which is to have one army in India. You will have a black army under the Governor General, and a white army under the Secretary of State. There is another most important question. It has been proposed that purchase shall be introduced into the army of India, and the right hon. Gentleman said that he saw no great objection to purchase in the army. But the House of Commons and the public opinion of the country have condemned the system of purchase, and surely those who have objections to the system of purchase ought to have an opportunity of expressing their opinion before it is introduced into the Indian army. Why, the Government only escaped defeat upon a Motion of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Sir De Lacy Evans) condemning purchase, by promising to appoint a Commission, and afterwards proposing to abolish purchase in the higher grades. The principle of purchase may therefore be said to be condemned by Parliament, and it ought not to be introduced into the Indian army without the fullest consideration. Then we come to the question of patronage. We are about to place in the hands of the Commander-in-Chief a much larger army than he now commands, with all the accession of patronage connected with it. Constitutionally this is a most important question. The proposal may be right and proper. I give no opinion for or against it, but at least it ought to pass under the cognizance of Parliament. Another important constitutional question that may be raised is that of the expense. Hitherto all the expenses incurred by the Horse Guards and the whole cost of the army have been paid by Votes of the House of Commons, and we are responsible for everything that is done; but now you are going to establish a system under which the expenditure of the army will be regulated at home, while the cost of a large portion of it will be raised by taxes in India. This appears to me to be impolitic, unjust, and, more than all, highly unconstitutional. Look at the effect that would have on the finances of India. In this country we have a Parliament, a press, and the influence of a strong public opinion, and yet, with regard to the expense of the army, we know how difficult it is to keep the Horse Guards in order. But in India, a country 10,000 miles off, with no Parliament, a press less powerful than our own, and no public opinion such as exists among us, what will the state of matters be when the whole expenditure of the army is regulated by the Horse Guards without the check and control of Parliamentary responsibility? The Commander-in-Chief in India communicating with the Horse Guards, may say he wants half a million for barracks in India. Hitherto such a wish would have been communicated to the Governor General, and he would have decided upon it on the spot; but now it will be sent to the Horse Guards, and from there the Commander-in-Chief will have it submitted to the Secretary for India. If he refers the matter to the Governor General, then the Governor General and the Commander-in-Chief may come into collision. If there is at the Horse Guards a person of good head and strong will he will in all probability prevail, and the Governor General of India will have to succumb. But there is another point that may be raised. I have a right to estimate that under the new arrangement you will never have less than at the smallest computation 20,000 men at sea going backwards and forwards to India. These 20,000 men will be paid by India, at a time when recruits are far from being plentiful, and they will have to be paid all the time they are doing nothing but being tossed upon the sea. These are questions of detail, but they nevertheless involve the important questions whether you are to have a single or a double Government for India; who is to command the Native army; who is to have the enormous patronage that will be created whether the system of purchase is introduced into the Indian army; whether there is to be an adequate control over the military expenditure. These important changes you have introduced without supplying Parliament with the necessary information, in the face of the opinion of the Governor General, against the unanimous protest of the Indian Council, against the opinion originally expressed by Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield, and all this you do by an abstract Resolution, substituted for a well-considered legislative measure. I will not go into the question of the amalgamation of the Indian army with the Royal army, and I give no opinion upon it, because I say we have not the necessary information. Even if we had the necessary information, this is not the right mode of doing it. If we do it in the reckless offhand manner now proposed, we may be carrying out the accomplishment of the warning that was uttered by one of the greatest and wisest men ever connected with the administration of Indian affairs—I mean Lord Metcalfe—who, considering the uncertainty of the tenure of India, and looking to the changes looming in the future, pronounced his opinion:—

Mr. Horsman

“Our hold is so precarious that a very slight mismanagement might accomplish our expulsion, and the course of events might be of itself sufficient, without any mismanagement. We are more powerful in India now than we ever were. Nevertheless, our downfall may be rapid, and the world will wonder more at the suddenness with which our immense Indian empire may vanish than it has done at the surprising conquest that we have achieved.”

And then followed these very remarkable words, “Government by a Parliamentary majority would make India not worth years’ purchase.” If to-night we rashly and recklessly sanction the exceptional proceeding now brought before us, I believe it may be the first fatal step towards accomplishing that remarkable and wise prediction.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: My right hon. Friend who has just sat down stated near the end of his speech that he was not prepared to give any opinion on the policy or impolicy of the proposition for amaltesting the local with the Royal army in India, and therefore he confined himself to complaints of the extreme misconduct which the Government have displayed in the introduction of this measure. Now, whatever may have been the malversation which we have been guilty, I do not think that my right hon. Friend, though he has taken great pains with the subject, has succeeded in being very accurate as to the nature of our transgressions. In the first place, he says the Government have not given information on this question—he used, indeed, a still stronger term, and said they had suppressed information. Now, the Government placed the papers connected with this subject, which were moved on the 17th of February, on the table on the 22nd of March, and on the 23rd of March they were ordered to be printed. That did not look like a desire to withhold information. [Several Voices: “Where are the papers?”] Ask the officers of the House, who are charged with the duty of getting them printed. Government is not responsible for printing the papers called for by this House. Papers are laid on the table, and those who move for them ought to ascertain that they are printed at the earliest possible period after the order for printing is given. The right hon. Gentleman says we have moved an abstract Resolution. That is a figure of speech which certainly does not accurately represent the state of the case. A Bill was introduced after due notice and discussion. It was read a first time. We are possibly going to read it a second time to-night. After that we shall go into Committee, and I trust we shall read it, in due course, a third time. But by no latitude of construction can that be called passing an abstract Resolution. It is a Bill brought in in the ordinary way, and after a pledge given last year that the subject should be brought under the consideration of the House. It is very questionable whether there is a single change necessary for amalgamating the Royal and local corps which could not have been effected by a change of regulations, without coming to this House at all. That the Government thought it would not be decent or respectful to the House of Commons to make so momentous a change without coming to the House and testing their opinion upon it. Again—and this seems to be the crowning offence—my right hon. Friend says the Secretary for India has committed an outrageous offence because he brought in a Bill last year for the augmentation of the local army to 30,000, and now proposes to amalgamate it with the Royal army. The answer is, that there were good reasons then why that step should be taken, and the fact that it was taken could in no way affect the proposal now made. “But,” asks my right hon. Friend, “how was it that when you first knew all the circumstances connected with the mutiny the change now contemplated was not proposed? The answer is, that it would not have been wise or expedient on the first arrival of the news of the mutiny, and when there were many speculations abroad on the subject, to proceed to legislate on this question. He says we knew of the gravity of the circumstances connected with the mutiny as far back as the autumn of 1858. That is a most singular statement, and I will only say that anybody who then knew the gravity of the circumstances must have been gifted with extraordinary foresight, for the mutiny did not take place till the spring of the following year. In the autumn of 1858 it is true there were discontent and disturbance and alarm, but no mutiny. The mutiny followed the issue of the General Order of the Governor General on the 8th of April, 1859. My right hon. Friend is, therefore, taken to task, because he did not decide upon the character of the mutiny before the mutiny took place! Then, with regard to the mode of proceeding adopted by the Government, if the Government had produced a plan for working out the details to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred, including everything connected with promotion, patronage, expense, and so on, would it not have been said that we had acted disrespectfully towards the House of Commons, and that we had it in view to withdraw from the consideration of Parliament many questions involving important principles? My right hon. Friend says we are going to regulate the expense of the Indian army at the Horse Guards. I find all his alarms are based upon imaginary intentions on the part of the Government, which I think, if he had listened to the speech of my right hon. Friend the other night, he would have discovered had no foundation. He says we are going to regulate the expenditure of the army in India, which is to be defrayed out of taxes raised in India. How is that process to be accomplished? We cannot send a man to India except upon the requisition of the Indian Government. They can refuse any extra pay or allowances—they can refuse to receive any rank of officers they please. The Government here often presses matters which they consider to be necessary for the comfort or efficiency of the soldier, and sometimes those demands are yielded to and sometimes they are not. The Horse Guards has no more power over the expenditure of a single sixpence for the Queen's army in India than it has over the expenditure of the standing army of any European Power. Then, my right hon. Friend says the Commander-in-Chief in India will write home to the Commander-in-Chief here for half a million for barracks. The Commander-in-Chief seems to live in an atmosphere redolent of suspicion; but my right hon. Friend only describes the dark surmises of his own imagination. He says the Commander-in-Chief may be a man of strong will, who will get hold of some inferior creature and make him Secretary of State for India, who, under the influence of his superior intellect, will require half a million for barracks for the Queen's troops. Now, I cannot conceive how any man, however determined to pick holes, could light upon anything so absurd. I will ask my right hon. Friend this question. Can the Commander-in-Chief now write home for an additional expenditure? He cannot. Then what additional power will the Commander-in-Chief have under this Bill? Not a jot. Then, my right hon. Friend says that the Commander-in-Chief in India will be independent of the Governor General. There is nothing in this measure to alter in any way the relations between the Commander-in-Chief in India and the Governor General. The Governor General is a despot in India, and as long as we intend to maintain our rule in that country, he must have a supreme control. It would be an act of madness to deprive him of the power of using that great army in India, which, unfortunately, from the tenure by which we hold that country, is not only a military, but a political weapon.

[First Night.]

I pass now from the speech of my right hon. Friend, and will say a few words upon the general subject. Of all subjects which have ever been brought under consideration, I never met with one upon which it was more difficult, after great labour and application, to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion. I frankly own I have arrived at a conclusion slowly and reluctantly. My bias was in favour of retaining a local army. I believed that a local army would have ties in India which a Queen's army could not have; I believed that a local army would supply for the public service and civil professions men better instructed than the Queen's army could furnish. I believed it important that we should preserve to the Indian Government a class of men who had long filled Indian offices. I have heard said that the patronage of the Council was diffused among the middle classes; but many of those who have stated that have defined their meaning of the term "middle classes." I thought it was necessary to keep officials of that peculiar service, derived, I believe, originally from Scotland, who had become Indian from their long acquaintance with Indian subjects, who brought up their children in the same way to regard India as their home. I cannot but have arrived at the conclusion that upon most of these points the measure of my right hon. Friend does afford a satisfactory solution. My right hon. and gallant Friend opposite (General Peel) said that, having been upon the Committee to inquire into the amalgamation of the two armies, he was struck with the fact that the opinions expressed were so strong and uniform, whether it was a Queen's officer or a Company's officer he knew exactly what evidence would be. What is the value of evidence so biased by preconceived ideas? The evidence made this impression on my mind—the witnesses appeared to be so full of prejudice and bias that, whenever I read the evidence of a witness on one side, I felt inclined to adhere to the opposite view. I have endeavoured to find independent authority. My right hon. Friend read the other night a passage from a letter from Lord Wellington to Lord Melville, in which he said, in his opinion, there should be a King's army in India. He said that a European army in the East Indies should be the King's army, and that the three Presidencies should be separate and distinct, and that the Native troops should form the Company's army. It was objected that that proved nothing of the Duke of Wellington's opinion; that the Duke said both armies should be the King's, but he did not say that one of them should be local. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) said the authority of the Duke of Wellington was admitted by all, but that the passage which had been read did not imply an opinion in the exact sense in which it had been used. But did the Duke of Wellington never express an opinion in favour of a local force? I find in his evidence given in 1828, when he was Prime Minister, many years after he had been in India

Mr. Sidney Herbert

referred to this subject. It is singular that the Duke of Wellington then spoke of sentiments which now are rife in every one's mouth, but which were not then generally entertained. He was asked, "Would not the cost of our army be reduced if our Colonial troops, instead of having King's troops sent to them, were to have local corps consisting of Europeans?" He said:—

"I must say that I would earnestly recommend such a system"—namely, the retention of troops in the Colonies for the purposes of police and local troops, and their being recruited with in the same manner as the East India Company's regiments so as to avoid the expense and inconvenience of relief—"should never be adopted in this country. The difference in the cost of the King's troops in the East Indies and that in which the East India Company's European Infantry is known to be, is conclusive in itself, in my opinion, but I would refer also to the Colonial African Corps. The British army cannot be made a colonial corps without destroying its character and strength; would it not be a disgraceful and terrible mode of losing the possession of any part of His Majesty's dominions by means of a mutiny of the officers of a local or colonial army employed to garrison it? Yet that is what we must look to if the army is to be employed as mere colonial troops and never to leave the Colonies from the day they enter the service. I should, therefore, intreat the Committee to lay that plan aside altogether."

He goes on to say,—

"I should say that the state of every description of troops depends in a great measure upon the officers. It does not signify what the immediate private character of the men is, they are made to behave well as soldiers, even though possibly they may not be the best moral characters that can be found. It is very extraordinary, and I can only attribute it to their being confined there for their lives that it is so; but it is very extraordinary that the same description of officers can form the Sepoys into remarkably good troops, cannot form the European Infantry to be at all equal to the other troops."

He Duke goes on,—

"I should say that I am quite sure that the putting the British army on the footing of a colonial corps would be very injurious."

That is testimony clear and explicit, and even the ingenuity of my noble Friend will not prove that it does not apply to this question. The right hon. Member for Stroud says that Lord Clyde is an advocate for the retention of a local army. That is not so. Sir William Mansfield was opposed to a change, but his opinion has been altered by the experience of the trying times of 1859. Many persons have spoken with great lightness of the mutiny among the European troops. I admit there is a great difference to be made between the men who originated the mutiny and those who accepted their discharge when it was offered to them. But the noble Lord the Member for Lynn (Lord Stanley) said the mutiny was quite exceptional. No doubt it was, for whoever heard of a mutiny that was not exceptional; or of an army in which mutiny was chronic? Hon. Gentlemen have treated this mutiny too lightly. The country was fresh from a mutiny of another kind, and then you had a well drilled, well armed European force threatening to rise too, there being evidence, through intercepted letters, that they had made communications inviting the Sikhs to join them in driving the Queen's army out of India. Luckily the mutinous force was not a large one; but imagine what would have been the case if the local army had been two-thirds and the Queen's one-third of the whole body of troops in India—if, instead of 10,000 of these misguided men coming home and receiving their discharge, you had had double the number of troops abandoning your service in this way. No, Sir! You cannot over-rate the gravity and importance of mutinies by armed men.

We have heard much as to the discipline of the local force. Now, I am not going to enter into the disputes or the jealousies which exist between the Queen's and the local armies. So strong are they that even we civilians, though not mixed up in these transactions, insensibly fall, when discussing them, into a tone of no very good feeling one towards another. I have heard insinuations made by those who advocate amalgamation against the local, and by those who oppose amalgamation against the Queen's troops. If we choose to listen to insinuations against either, we may, perhaps, blacken both, but we shall not advance the question at issue. Both armies have covered themselves with glory, and it is not necessary now to look to the weaknesses of either. But I have in my hand a statement which seems to go far to account for the indiscipline of the local force. It says:—

"The cause of the inferiority of discipline in the local European corps is patent. It originates in the system of the service, and will exist so long as the system is maintained."

An officer in command of Natives has to do with a class of men who are apparently the most docile soldiers. He does not himself enter into minute details in the management of his corps, because if so he would offend the prejudices of his men. He therefore leaves all these to the Native

[First Night.

non-commissioned officers. But that is not a school in which an officer can learn afterwards to manage the material which is found among the Anglo-Saxon race. English soldiers are not so docile; they are not so easy to lead; they are far more difficult to drive, and of course such officers are unable to conquer the good-will of the men placed under them. Now, in the Queen's army the case is quite different. I believe the public generally have very little idea of the relations which exist between officers and men in the service. The officer is seen with his men on parade, and when the parade is over he walks away, and it is supposed that his connection with them begins and ends there. But that is no measure of the relations between them. The non-commissioned officers of the army are admirable, but the officer does not trust to these alone. You find the most intimate connection existing between officers and men, and constant kindnesses proceeding from the one to the others. When a soldier is ill, or his wife is ill, the officer is sure to attend to their wants and to alleviate their sufferings, or if married his wife attends to the soldier's wife. There thus grows up a family feeling in regiments which must be unknown in Native corps, though these are the schools in which officers are formed who afterwards are to deal with English soldiers. If that be the case, I say we need not cast blame upon Indian officers because they are unable to discipline English troops. It is the natural result of a system which is not their creation, but is the creation of the Government under which they serve. Sir Hugh Rose writes to me a letter which is too long to read, but in which he speaks of a report of the Adjutant General showing that ninety-six officers from Bombay regiments above the numbers allowed are serving away from their regiments on the Staff and on civil appointments. How is it possible that efficient discipline can be maintained in the face of such a system? The same thing happens with regard to the medical department. Men get other appointments; the Postmaster General, for instance, is a medical officer; and their regiments are left without their proper share of officers. The regiments are stripped of their best men, and are left with what is here called "the refuse."

It has been said by some hon. Gentlemen in the course of this debate, "But you will never get Queen's officers to take the place of the local officers." Now, Earl

Mr. Sidney Herbert

Canning has written a Minute on which great stress has been laid; but if I wanted to argue for the non-continuance of the local army I do not know that I could desire to have a better brief. The largest admissions are made in this Minute, and are reasoned out in the most conclusive manner. What does Earl Canning say in the very first paragraph as to the necessity of a local force, every man in such a force having his interests bound up in India, and being supposed to be willing to reside there for the rest of his life?—

"In my memorandum of 1858, I stated it 'to be most important that in the event of an amalgamation of the local army with the Line being found to be too difficult for adjustment, too expensive, or for other reasons not advisable, some arrangement should still be provided by which the local European army should be made to feel that it is composed of the same Staff, and is in all respects in an equally honourable position with the Line;' that it was 'very desirable that officers should be enabled to pass from the one into the other, though here also the difficulties are not slight; that there should be a clear understanding that the senior officers, whose service and ability may render them fit for such marks of Her Majesty's confidence, shall be permitted to serve Her Majesty out of India as well as in this country; and that divisional and brigade commands should be distributed between the two armies in a fair proportion.'"

There is an admission which goes to the root of the whole question. He does not want the Queen's to occupy the position of the local army, but that the local army should be allowed to take the position of the Queen's. He expresses his fear that men who come accidentally to India—and I will presently show how far the word "accidentally" applies to the question before the House—that such will never have the same interests in India as officers of the local force; and then he proceeds:—

"I know of no mode of effectually or speedily training the local European troops to the required degree of efficiency, which is more likely to be successful than that of obtaining for a time from the Line regiments, whether serving in India or elsewhere, the assistance of officers of experience. No doubt this measure will be, to a certain extent, distasteful to the officers of Her Majesty's Indian forces, and not without some unpleasantness to the officers of the Line selected for the purpose, and much tact and mutual consideration will be requisite on both sides. But if the army of the Line will lend to the Indian army officers of sufficient standing and experience, and if such Indian officers as are about to be attached to the new local European regiments are admitted to learn their duty with Line regiments until their services are required with their own corps, I believe that the measure may be carried out with good prospect of success."

I was struck to-day by reading in The

a letter from General Hancock. He was shocked by the notion advanced by the right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) to build up a very large local army to take the place of the Queen's army, and to destroy the Queen's army to make room for the local force, would be a very costly and expensive operation. General Hancock says, "Not at all;" and he proposes to do this very thing. He says all the Queen's regiments must allow their men to volunteer into the local regiments; cannot be done in sufficient numbers in India; the regiments at home must furnish the requisite number for this new army, and if you have any officers displaced by that arrangement they will be placed on half-pay. The arrangement is the most satisfactory one in that I ever saw; but I must say, if it is to be done only at the trouble and expense and with the jealousies and the wranglings to which such a plan would give rise, he would be a very bold man who seriously bring forward such a proposal. Sir Charles Trevelyan states his opinion that the Queen's officers would very readily apply themselves to languages in order to fit themselves for Indian life and obtain the position hitherto held as a monopoly by the British force. He says that even now the Queen's Line regiments could furnish a sufficient number of officers for the Staff, notwithstanding the absence of all facilities and arrangements; but if such appointments were given to Line officers on their attaining a certain proficiency in Native languages, the objection is that young men would crowd into the Line regiments serving in India, and try to push their fortunes in that country. But the answer generally given to this—and it showed a magnificent display of facts—"The Queen's officers must cultivate the study of languages." Do they? The other day I asked a man who has recently returned from India, and who has great powers of perception, what was his opinion on this subject, and he said "I was more engaged in military operations, but the opinion I formed was that so long as there exists in India a local army propped up and buttressed by the fact of all the prizes of the profession being a monopoly of place, it will be held in esteem; but, if once you break down the monopoly, and throw the field open by allowing Queen's officers to compete for places, then a small local army will very readily fall into disrepute." I believe this is perfectly true.

At this late hour I will not go into all the points which have been raised, but the hon. Baronet behind me said there is a great advantage in having a local army, because they become acclimatized to the country. Now, what is this theory of acclimatization? It is this; that a man who arrives in India and suffers from illness in the first year, recovers by continuing to dwell there, and becomes habituated to the climate and turns out a healthy and strong man. Now, the greatest authority on Indian and tropical diseases (Mr. Martin) scouts such an idea, and he takes the case of a certain number of ensigns—and everything that applies to the officers applies tenfold to the men, whose habits are more intemperate, and who take less care of themselves. With regard to ensigns he says, that they come out about eighteen years old; and that the mortality as respects them is 23 per 1,000. With regard to lieutenants, who on an average are of three years' more residence the mortality is 27 per 1,000; with regard to captains of from 12 to 13 more years' residence, 34 per 1,000. And so it goes on. Diseases originating in carelessness and youthful intemperance can be cured by care, but the physical degradation produced by long and constant exposure to the climate cannot. The following table exhibits the rate of mortality per 1,000 of troops in tropical climates, from the 1st of January, 1830, to the 31st of March, 1837, and how far acclimatization acts:—

Station.	18 to 25.	25 to 33.	33 to 40.	40 to 50.
Jamaica .	70.	107.	131.	128.
Mauritius .	20.8	37.5	52.7	86.6
Ceylon .	24.	55.	86.4	126.6
Bombay .	11.7	34.6	46.8	71.1
Bengal .	23.8	50.3	50.6	83.3

What, then, is the meaning of this theory of acclimatization? It means that if a thing is unwholesome to the constitution, then go on with it. Now, if that theory is good as regards climate, it is good as regards food; and so, with like reason, you might be told that if you eat food that is bad for the human stomach you should go on eating it. Indeed, there is no knowing to what extent the application of such an absurd theory might be carried. With regard to the comparative healthfulness of the Queen's troops and the local troops, I went into the question some years ago, but I found the statistical records relating to it so confused that it was impossible to arrive at the exact truth, owing to the circumstances that some of the troops were in the field and others in cantonments. It generally happens too that the local forces are gradually reinforced by recruits, who fall easily into the settled habits of that branch of the army, whereas Queen's troops arriving all together are less accustomed to the climate and to the necessary habits of life. My impression therefore is that if there is a difference, it is on the whole in favour of the local troops, and not of the Queen's troops.

[First Night.

There is one important feature with regard to the Staff corps which should be clearly understood. If you have one Staff corps for the whole army, every man who fails to pass through his probation will return to the army, while the officer who goes through his probation satisfactorily is struck off the strength of his regiment, his place is filled up, and he becomes a local Indian officer. India is then his home, and the place to which he looks for promotion and reputation; and under the old system no officer was more thoroughly localized than would be the officer I have just referred to. He will be an Indian servant to all intents and purposes, receiving promotion in the Staff corps alone, and not sharing promotion in the regiment he has left.

Then it is said that this great evil will arise, that India at any moment might be denuded of troops by their withdrawal for home service. I do not myself see in what respect there will be a difference from the present system under which the number of European troops in the service of the Indian Government is fixed at 15,000 men. The argument is founded on the statement that India was deprived of troops for the Crimean War to an extent that endangered the security of the country at the breaking out of the mutiny in 1857. The fallacy of this is shown by the following figures:—the number of European troops in India in 1854 was 47,146; in 1855 the number was 46,093; in 1856 the number was 45,104; and in 1857 the number was 45,522; so that the difference between 1854 and 1857 was 624 men. The mutiny broke out in May, 1857, before the draughts for the year had arrived, but if the draughts were counted there would have been in India on their arrival about 1,000 men more than in 1854; and besides that, some of the troops had been sent to Persia. The troops on their way to China were also diverted from that expedition, and went to reinforce the garrison in India, so that it could not be said that India, at that period of her utmost need, was deserted or neglected by England.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

In answer to the statement that Queen's officers would not take pains to learn the Native languages, in order to obtain local employment, I will read the following statement in reference to Queen's officers: On the Staff, 92; irregular cavalry, infantry, levies, and police, 41; public works, 4; civil employ, 8; total, 145. Besides these, there are a number of regimental officers who have qualified themselves in Native languages. This shows that there is no indisposition on the part of the Queen's officers to make themselves fit to hold important offices in the country. Under the old system you gave a monopoly to a small local army. You took away from the regiments of that army all the ablest men you could find, until you came down to what Colonel Jacobs called the refuse; the most intelligent officers of the Queen's service could not be taken for these political offices, and they had no encouragement, therefore, to qualify for offices which they had no chance of getting. My right hon. Friend the Member for Stroud says the Horse Guards are going to take all the patronage—but what is the patronage? There is no change going to be made in the distribution of commands in India. What exists there now will exist then. There is no change going to be made in the purchase system. My right hon. Friend says that while this House and the country are dead against the purchase system, Her Majesty's Government are going to introduce it into the Indian army. I cannot say that I have ever seen this House very warm against the purchase system; but I can assure my right hon. Friend that he is entirely mistaken. [Mr. HORSMAN: I quoted the Secretary of State's speech.] Yes, no doubt, but not accurately. The Secretary of State for India stated that there was to be no purchase system introduced into the amalgamated regiments; but, strictly speaking, he was not quite accurate, because a purchase system does exist in the Indian army, and to the extent to which it exists it will continue. Of course, the officers will carry with them their own habits and regulations and rights. The existing rights of the Indian officers are guaranteed by Act of Parliament, and until they die out you cannot introduce the purchase on the Queen's system into any of those regiments. In the Indian army, as it stands, every man, poor or rich, is compelled to purchase, or to join the others in purchasing; for if he would not do it promotion was stopped in his regiment, and although the required sum might be made up by the rest without him, he would be placed in such a position that he would prefer to yield to the system. It could not, however, be intended, if faith were to be kept with Indian officers, to introduce anything like the system of purchase which prevailed in the Queen's army. Indeed, I do not wish to see the Queen's system of purchase introduced into those regiments at all. Under the Act of 1858 one-tenth of the nominations at the disposal of the Indian Council are appropriated to the orphans of officers of the Indian military and civil services, and of Queen's officers serving in India, and under the new system of course similar advantages will be secured to them in the same proportion. It will be for the Government to ascertain the number of these, and to give to an equivalent number the same advantages which they now enjoy. For that purpose it will be necessary to retain a certain number of regiments without purchase, because to put a young man who has received assistance from the State in the way of education a first commission without purchase and so on into a regular Queen's regiment, would place him at a much greater disadvantage than if he were put in an Indian regiment where there was no purchase right through.

I should be the last person in the world to attribute to the Indian Council or to the Commander-in-Chief that in viewing this great question they had been biassed by the wretched consideration of having the disposal of a few first commissions. The Duke of Cambridge, in his evidence on the subject, said, "For God's sake, whatever happens, don't give this patronage to me. I know what complaints will be made, and I would rather be without them." There is no great favour in getting a first commission—any person with decent references can go to the Horse Guards and get his name put down. As far as the patronage question goes, therefore, I think we may dismiss it altogether from our minds, but I do not wish to dismiss it, because I wish to explain exactly what it is that we wish to do. My right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) alluded the other night to the evidence given by the Duke of Cambridge. His Royal Highness expressed his opinion that the whole system of nomination was a bad one; that it was very disagreeable to himself; that all the officers ought to enter the army through one college, and that instead of going to Sandhurst, as they do under the present system, they should receive their general education elsewhere, and then go to Sandhurst later for a professional course before entering the army. That plan would dispose of the whole question of nomination; but at present, as long as a young man can get a direct commission by purchase he gets it cheaper than by going to Sandhurst, and the consequence is that there are many vacancies at Sandhurst and not applicants enough to fill them. But a young man who comes fresh from some cramming tutor and answers a few unintelligible questions, is not in the same position as a young man who has gone through a regular professional course and who becomes immediately available for regimental duties. I think the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief is a sound one. I made a similar proposition some years ago when out of office, and I should be very glad if I could be the means of carrying it out. But Sandhurst would not be large enough for the purpose. You would have to take Addiscombe as well, and with a mixture of the two establishments you would be able to get all your young men into the army with a professional training. Until you have got these establishments ready—and it will take some time—what will you do? I should say, why make any change at all in the interim? If vacancies arise in the Indian regiments, I think the Secretary of State and his Council are fairly entitled to recommend to the Commander-in-Chief the names of those whom they may think fitted to fill them up. I hope this will satisfy my right hon. Friend that the Horse Guards are not grasping at patronage. An objection may be raised that the Council are independent persons, that they are not responsible to Parliament, and that we are placing in their hands patronage which ought to be exercised by the Crown; but if you turn to the 36th clause in the Act, you will see that the Secretary of State has a veto on all nominations, so that in fact you have a Minister responsible for all that is done.

As for the statement that the officers of the Indian army and of the Queen's army are taken from different classes, I do not believe a word of it. If you except to the term "middle classes" I should say that both services were officered mainly from the professional classes. The great mass of the Queen's officers are certainly taken from those classes—though you may have a few noblemen's sons among them, especially in the cavalry regiments. My noble Friend the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) said the other night that it would be impossible to get these men to go to India, and he argued that it was a matter of policy to attract men of birth into the army, even if it involved a slight lowering of the intellectual standard. For myself I do not think you have any right to attract any class of men into the army except those who will make good officers. My noble Friend is a very good specimen of his order, but he certainly did not speak up handsomely for it when he argued that a lowering of the standard of examination might be necessary to attract them into the service. But the fact is that examinations are no more favourable to poor men than to the nobility. They are favourable only to wealthy persons who can afford to give their sons an expensive and a special education. I will say this for the upper classes, that there is nothing you can ask Englishmen to do which they will not do as readily and as well as any other class. The gallant Officer (Colonel P. Herbert), who spoke from the opposite benches to-night, and who has seen service at the Cape of Good Hope, in the Crimea, and again during the Indian mutiny, is a specimen of the class to which he refers, who did not enter the army as a mere holiday pursuit.

[First Night.]

In spite of that contempt which was poured by two hon. Gentlemen behind me on the argument that it would be enormously expensive to create a local army as large as has been asked for by Lord Canning and others, I will ask the House to consider what are the facts. The members of the Indian Council and the authorities in India who are for maintaining a local army, have declared that it would be useless to do so if that local army lost its predominance. Formerly the Queen's army was the larger force, and the local soldiery a mere adjunct. If you are to maintain a local army, they say, these proportions must be reversed. I think they are wise in their generation to make the demand; but, if you accede to it, in what manner is it to be carried out? You have made the experiment of creating a small local army, and it has signally failed. I say that has signally failed, because on the first occasion on which a disagreement arose as to terms it mutinied and placed you in a most disastrous position. You say the Queen's army would act in the same way under similar circumstances. But what happened the other day? Some regiments were detached from India to go to China, under the command of Sir Hope Grant, and for some inexplicable reason they proceeded to pay the officers on a scale calculated according to Indian allowances, because they were drawn from the army in India, but did not pay the soldiers in the same manner. The men remonstrated, but they had confidence in their officers; the officers said that the thing could not be right, and that they would see how the mistake had arisen. There was not a sign of mutiny. They consented cheerfully to receive the reduced rates, though they knew they were entitled to more; a board of officers communicated with us on the subject, and we at once said that the thing was a complete error, and that the men should receive the money to which they were entitled. But in the interim there was not a murmur—very possibly dissatisfaction existed, but there was nothing like a threat, nothing like disturbance; the men had confidence in their officers, and they remained true to their colours. You have tried the experiment of a local force on a small scale, and because it has failed you now want to introduce it on a scale still larger; you created a magnificent army to put down the Indian mutiny, and you say—"It has been successful—let us destroy it." Is it acting sensibly to shut our eyes to the experience of the last few years?

Mr. Sidney Herbert

It is said, again, that the difference between the forces is entirely fanciful; that one class of army will cost just as much as the other; and that the advantages are in favour of a local force. Yes; but the maintenance and creation of an army are two different things. Let us see what would be the cost of reducing the Queen's army from two-thirds to one-third of the whole. I am not speaking now of what the cost would be ultimately, if you were to capitalize it, but of what you would have to pay in the first year. You would have to give in half-pay to officers £221,000; gratuities to non-commissioned officers and men £295,000; and pensions to men £75,000; making a total of £591,000 for the first year. And that outlay would be, not for creation, nor for greater efficiency, but for the purpose of destruction and died efficiency. Again, in forming this army, what do you do? You assemble a body consisting of young men, without any kind of discipline; and how are you to drill them? Will you bring home officers from India to drill them, when, as you all know, they are unable to do so; and you, for that purpose, insist that, to prevent injury and dissatisfaction, they should be put up the posts of honour and emolument which they hold in India? What is the character of this new army you wish to raise? The tradition of a successful mutiny would be perpetuated in the men; and would become their strength. Every man, on every occasion, when he had a grievance, however small, would remind him of what had happened in 1859. If there were two-thirds, instead of one-third, of the men, they would be at their mercy. I did not come to this conclusion speedily or willingly. Even if it were possible to create a new force, and to maintain it perfect in discipline, and with traditions marked by loyalty to the Sovereign, the financial difficulties in the way, and cannot be got over. You are asked to spend £295,000 for the purpose of destroying an army, and I know not how much of Indian force to reconstruct a force which, in a time of the utmost danger, proved faithful in its colours, and threatened the security of India.

RICH moved the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I hope the debate will come to a division, as the subject has not been fully discussed. I shall oppose the Motion for adjournment.

HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he hoped the House would consent to the postponement of the debate. The question of the most important which could be brought to the consideration of the House of Commons, and the Government had placed on the table those papers which the House was entitled to see. He did not mean to believe that the Indian Council had unanimously adopted a different view from that taken by Her Majesty's Government on the India question the opinion of that Council, which had been appointed to look after the concerns of India, the members of which were specially selected from that House, was at least entitled to be heard. The speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sidney Herbert) was, however able, he believed was capable of receiving an answer to several of its most important details. The House was bound to see that good faith was kept with the 6,000 officers and 15,000 or 16,000 men who still remained of the local force; and he believed that much of the trouble—for he declined to call it a mutiny—connected with these troops had originated in the want of attention of a former House of Commons. If any man more than another was individually responsible for the consequences it was the noble Viscount, who had declared that the Europeans in the Company's service were entitled to be considered in the change. The noble Viscount certainly intended nothing unfair or unjust, and he remembered that at the time he perfectly concurred with him. But it certainly was surprising that for the mere consideration of £2,000 or £3,000 matters should have been suffered to proceed to such extremities.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 262; Majority 179.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he hoped that, as important papers relating to the subject under discussion which had been moved for had not been laid upon the table, the Government would not at once press the second reading of the Bill to a division. He begged to move the adjournment of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The Gentlemen who still wish to state their opinions should recollect that there are other stages of the Bill upon which they can have a full opportunity of stating all they can have to say upon it. I should hope that hon. Gentlemen would consent to the second reading.

MR. HORSMAN: We want the papers. The papers were moved for on the 17th of February.

MR. SPEAKER: The question is, that the Bill be read a second time.

MR. HORSMAN: They were laid on the table on the 23rd of March, and it is now three months since, and we have not had those papers which it is absolutely essential that we should have; and I think with those facts it is utterly impossible for the Government to press the decision. I am satisfied that Gentlemen ought to persist, and I know they will persist; I, for one, will not agree to the Motion being put.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was one of those who voted in the minority, hoping that Her Majesty's Government would, in a matter of this importance, give every hon. Member an opportunity of stating his opinion,—but he wished to explain that he had so voted solely on that ground, because, on the merits of the question itself, he was quite prepared to support Her Majesty's Government. At the same time he thought that the Government ought, for the sake of satisfying hon. Members' minds, to accede to the request for the production of the papers before pressing the second reading.
[First Night.]

COLONEL SYKES said, he had asked for papers in reference to Indian financial matters some time ago, but they had not yet been produced. In their absence he confessed he was unable to discuss the present Bill in a satisfactory manner.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he presumed hon. Members would not agree to the adjournment of the House, as that would throw back all the other business on the paper. The objection of his right hon. Friend would be equally good next night as then, unless he meant that they should not read the Bill a second time till the printer had produced the whole voluminous mass of papers on this subject. Did his right hon. Friend mean to postpone the second reading until such time as it would not be received by the House of Lords? As far as his right hon. Friend was concerned, the papers would not enable him to add at all to the lights of the House, as he had already spoken on the second reading; and therefore his argument did not apply to the second reading. He might wish to postpone the future stages of the Bill till he had an opportunity of reading these voluminous papers, but the papers could afford him no additional arguments on the second reading.

Motion made, and Question put, "That this House do now adjourn."

The House divided: Ayes 51; Noes 229: Majority 178.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. HENNESSY moved that the debate be now adjourned.

MR. BLACKBURN seconded the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he knew very well that a small minority at that hour of the night could prevent progress. [Cries of "Go on!"] He was not surprised at the feeling expressed by the majority as to the conduct of the minority, who, feeling they could not impede the measure, only wished to delay it. Still he would recommend the House to adjourn the debate until the next day.

Sir John Pakington

GENERAL PEEL said, he could not see that any object would be attained by the adjournment of the debate until the next day, the object being to obtain the papers. He would recommend the withdrawal of the Motion, on the understanding that the papers should be produced before the next stage.

MR. HORSMAN said, the Bill consisted of only one clause, and they would not have the opportunity of a full discussion in Committee. He did not wish to delay the Bill, but he thought it a hard case that the papers were not in their hands.

SIR CHARLES WOOD repeated that all that depended upon him and his department had been done. These voluminous papers had been laid on the table three months ago. He was not responsible for their not being printed.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER asked who was responsible.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the printer of the House.

MR. A. MILLS repudiated the charge that the minority sought only to delay the Bill. He would use every effort to prevent further progress until the papers were produced.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided: Ayes 43; Noes 190: Majority 147.

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. A. MILLS moved that the House do now adjourn.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, if it was a mere question of how long the debate should be kept up, he would be willing to sit up as long as any one; but it would be most unjust to the Speaker, and to hon. Members who wished to attend the morning sitting, to go further to-night. He should, therefore, on that ground, and that ground alone, advise the House to accede to the adjournment of the debate.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the House would be quite justified in calling the printer to the bar, on account of the extraordinary delay in the printing of the papers relating to this question.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that any complaint on that score should be addressed to the Members of the Printing Committee, who had the control over the printing of use. It was not the business of the Government to superintend the printing arrangements.

BROOKE BRIDGES said, he hoped the Government, for their own credit's sake, would use their influence with the Printing Committee to expedite the production of the papers.

DANBY SEYMOUR asked whether the Secretary of State would lay upon the table the Minutes of the Indian Council on this matter.

CHARLES WOOD said, he could not at that moment give an answer to this question.

HORSMAN said, he could not see the discussion on the Bill could be resumed until the papers were before the House.

On motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn," put, and nega-tion again proposed, "That the House now stand part of the Question." The House adjourned till to-morrow.

House adjourned at a Quarter after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, June 29, 1860.

[P.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Isle of Man Harbours; Universities and College Estates; Naval Discipline. Endowed Charities; Local Boards of Health, &c. Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment.

TROTMAN'S ANCHORS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE wished to ask a question of his noble Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty on a subject of much importance in the navy. The Secretary of the Admiralty was reported to have given in answer to an inquiry made of him "another place," that Trotman's anchors were not in general use in the navy because they were objected to by the profession generally; and there were only a few officers who did not object to use them.

He (the Earl of Hardwicke) was desirous to deny that; and he would show the Lordships in a few words that Trotman's anchors had undergone great trials on the order of the Admiralty, and with the successful results. The results were given in an official paper, which he at that moment held in his hand. The Secretary of the Admiralty was further reported to have said that officers might, if they chose, have this anchor; but he (the Earl of Hardwicke) had before him the records of instances in which officers had applied for it and had not got it. The late Sir William Peel applied to have one of them for his frigate. He was answered in an official letter, which stated, "Trotman's anchor may be supplied if in store, but no new anchors can be ordered, as the establishment of anchors is complete." As Trotman's anchors were not then in store, and there had never been any in store since, it was of course impossible that captains could get them. That was an answer to the statement of the Secretary of the Admiralty that officers might have them if they liked. Where did their Lordships suppose the only Trotman's anchor now in the navy was to be found? To the bow of what ship did it hang? It hung to the bow of the ship the welfare of which every one of them had more at heart than that of any other vessel afloat—namely, the yacht of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. That was the only Trotman's anchor the navy had ever had, and that one had been tested aboard the Royal yacht to the extent of more than once breaking the cable. He should now go to what was stated in the report of those gentlemen who were appointed to test the several kinds of anchors submitted to the Admiralty. Those gentlemen gave a summary of the results of these experiments, which showed the Admiralty anchor to be the worst of all, and Trotman's to be the best. When the comparative values came to be collected, the Admiralty anchor was found to stand at 18·17, and Trotman's at 23·30, the latter being higher than any other tested. The Admiralty anchor, taken as the standard at 1, was worst but one of all those which were tried. Trotman's was 28 per cent better. The result of all the experiments was that Trotman's was the best under all the trials, which were very long and numerous. He thought the statement about Trotman's anchor being objected to by officers in the navy arose from that anchor having been by some officers confounded with Porter's. But the report of the trials stated that, when competing with Trotman's, Porter's anchor failed to bite till it had slipped along the ground to a length of fifty feet, while Trotman's bit at once. The principle in which Trot-man's anchor was constructed enabled it to bite readily, and to maintain a very firm hold on the ground. He was sure that a statement of these facts would induce the noble Duke to do justice in this case—justice, not to Mr. Trotman, but to the service generally. He should now mention a fact which went far to show the great merits of this anchor. There was a shank-pin which was put in under the crown, and in consequence of the crown being secured in that way a doubt had existed as to the strength of the anchor. An accident had, however, proved its wonderful strength, and that it did not depend upon the shank-pin. The pin was lost from a model which he now held in his hand, and a common quill toothpick was inserted in its stead in order that the fluke might not be lost. Any of their Lordships might catch the fluke under a board, or any other substance, and they would find that the model would not give way at the place where the toothpick served the purpose of a shank-pin. [The noble Earl illustrated his remark by producing a small model of a Trotman's anchor, and subjecting its holding powers to several tests.] That was enough to convince him that notwithstanding this joint the strength of Trotman's anchor was as great in the crown as that of any other anchor of a different construction. For sake of form he should conclude by asking the noble Duke opposite whether he had any intention to order Trotman's anchors to be supplied to the ships in Her Majesty's navy.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that one would have supposed from the speech of the noble Earl that great blame was to be attached to the present Board of Admiralty for not having given a fair trial to Trotman's anchor. It was not the present but the late Board, however, which he had now to defend in regard to this matter, and he hoped that, should occasion arise when he quitted his present position, some noble Lord opposite would perform the same kind office for himself. It was a very remarkable fact that this anchor, if it held nowhere else, had, at least, very strong holding ground in the lobby of the House of Commons. That was where it bit best, and in that respect it certainly excelled all other anchors. Of course, therefore, he had not long been in office before this anchor was brought under his notice. He inquired what course the former Board had pursued in regard to it, and found that a long correspondence had taken place between Mr. John Trotman and Mr. the Secretary to the Admiralty. In January, 1859, Mr. Corrie wrote the Admiralty held that Trotman's anchor, while undoubtedly an improvement, but a slight modification of Porter's anchor, which had been condemned in Majesty's ships notwithstanding that it had been most extensively tried, and that there were many remaining in the fleet. "It is true," Mr. Corrie wrote, "that in Trotman's anchor the size of the projecting part of the fluke is increased, as to cause it to bite the ground, but it does not alter the principle of the anchor, which holds well when once it gets into the ground, but no one can tell, whether it let go, whether it has taken the ground or not." Then, again, in March, 1859, Mr. Corrie wrote to say that the Board were willing to test the anchor on board Her Majesty's ships, if anchors were supplied for the purpose. Mr. Trotman replied that he considered the experiments made in 1852 sufficient to prove the merits of his invention, and "respectfully declined to become the victim of any procrastination." In April, 1859, Mr. Corrie wrote in answer to another letter from Mr. Trotman that the Admiralty were still prepared to afford a fair and impartial trial to Trotman's anchor on board one or more of Her Majesty's ships. All this took place before the Duke of Somerset came into office. It was said that this anchor was found to be so good; but what had happened in regard to the Great Eastern? As she was launched application was made to the Admiralty for an Admiralty anchor. They would not trust her to Trotman's anchor. The Great Eastern afterwards went to Holyhead. She then had Trotman's anchor on board, and that was the end of it. So far that was not satisfactory. For himself he was quite unprejudiced, and was uninfluenced on either side. He was not defending the acts of the last Board, but before Trotman's anchor was dropped some proof of its merits ought to be given. Their Lordships might remember the great hurricane in the West India Sea. He was told that not one of Her Majesty's ships dragged her anchor, but some of the merchant ships went ashore. He had heard, although he did not know for the truth of the statement, that Trotman's anchor was on board some of the ships that went ashore. Before, therefore, the Admiralty could be called upon to supply Trotman's anchor, they had a right that it should be fairly tried. It was right for inventors to come to the House of Commons with their inventions, and canvass Members, calling upon them in the morning, and waiting in the lobby in the evening, and converting the House of Commons, in fact, into a great advertising van for their inventions. The Government were asked why they did not take up such or such an invention; the public press called attention to the matter; and by these means a great effect was produced adverse to the Government. The Government considered that this was not fair to the Government, and that it ought to be left to the Departments to try the merits of the inventions. It would have been easy for the Government to fall into the complaint against the late Board, to say that Sir John Pakington had committed a great fault in not trying the anchor, and then to call upon the Lordships to remark how superior the present Board. But the other course was, he thought, far more fair to the Department. The late Board would incur the expense of discarding the anchor now in use in the navy, and adopting this particular anchor. All sorts of inventions were every day brought to the Admiralty, but it was not the business of a public Department to be continually incurring the public to enormous expense in making new experiments. He had no objection to Trotman's anchor. From what he had seen of it, that anchor seemed to him to have many advantages, and to be very ingenious. He had asked professional persons, however, not connected with the Royal navy, what they thought of Trotman's anchor; to which they replied, "It is an excellent anchor to put away in the dock—it takes so little room." Now, it was not a great recommendation of an anchor to say that it was good to put away in the dock, and he had not heard any officers of the navy say that they would trust Her Majesty's ships to this anchor. It was said that one merit of Trotman's anchor was its lightness; but a large ship-of-war required a heavy anchor. The very weight of the anchor was a great advantage in mud, and if Trotman's were adopted it would be an advantage to have the anchor made of greater weight. He hoped that for the future that and the other House of Parliament would not give so ready an ear to the plans of inventors, but that professional questions would be left to professional men. With regard to the expense, Trotman's anchor was cheaper, because it was of less weight than the Admiralty anchor. If, however, the weight were increased the cost would be proportionably greater than the Admiralty anchor, as Trotman's anchor contained a hinge, and was therefore more complicated in its manufacture.

The Earl of Hardwicks

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE could not but regard the reply of the noble Duke as very unsatisfactory. He held in his hand a Parliamentary document—not an advertising placard—of the cost and relative merits of the Admiralty anchor and Trotman's, every word of which was authentic and reliable. The noble Duke said it was right that Trotman's anchor should not be adopted without trial. But the trial had been made on the most extensive and expensive scale, before a competent Committee; and the result was that Trotman's came out supreme as the best of all the anchors that had been tried. If the noble Duke thought the merits of this anchor as doubtful as he affirmed, why did he persevere in perilling the safety of the Queen on this anchor alone? Would the noble Duke ask Captain Denman whether he shared his opinion about this anchor? After what the noble Duke had just said, he should expect that an Admiralty anchor would be substituted for Trotman's to-morrow. The noble Duke said this was a doubtful anchor; and yet he allowed the Royal yacht, with Her Majesty on board, to ride at that anchor. Unless that anchor were changed to-morrow—well, he was going to say something unparliamentary, but he would not. The noble Duke said that the Great Eastern, in the gale at Holyhead, broke her anchor. There could be no greater proof of the holding power of an anchor. If the noble Duke had told him the Great Eastern "drove," he would admit that the safety of the ship might have been imperilled by her anchor. When an anchor broke, however, it was the strongest instance of its holding power, and the noble Duke had therefore pronounced the greatest possible encomium upon Trotman's anchor.

COMMANDERS OF PACKETS BETWEEN HOLYHEAD AND KINGSTOWN.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON asked the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Appointments to the Command of the new Steamers about to convey Passengers and Mails between Holyhead and Kingstown have been all filled up; and whether it is correct that Two Appointments to those

Vessels of Commanders have been made whose Age is far advanced, and whose state of Health was such as to preclude their being able during the last Winter to cross over in person with the Packet Boats under their direction? The subject was of the greatest importance to the public generally, but more especially to that particular portion of it that was perpetually crossing and recrossing the Channel. Their Lordships were aware that it had been for some time in agitation to construct vessels to perform the passage of a larger size than those formerly employed. Three of the new vessels were now completed, and would commence running, he understood on the 1st of August. He had been given to understand that the direction of two of the vessels had been given to officers whose age was very advanced, and whose state of health precluded them very often from going over in person with the vessels under their charge. He believed these officers to have great nautical knowledge and long experience; but their ages were very advanced; and one of them during the whole of last winter was, he was credibly informed, unable to go across the Channel in person with the vessel under his command, while the other was also laid up for several months. These new vessels would move with far greater speed than those formerly on the station; it was well known that frequently there was a very heavy sea between Holyhead and Kingstown; and on approaching the coast of Ireland the Channel presented a very crowded appearance, so that there would be a hazard that these large vessels, going with increased speed, would experience collisions. It was obvious, then, that the commanders should be persons not only of nautical experience and science, but men in the full vigour of health and strength. Yet he understood that both the commanders he had referred to were past the age of 70. Considerable anxiety had been manifested on the subject, and he should be glad to hear from the noble Duke opposite how far the information which had reached him on the subject was correct.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET replied that the Admiralty had nothing whatever to do with the appointment of the officers in question. The Company appointed their own officers, and he had no right to call on the Company to tell him what officers they were going to employ. He should be very glad if these appointments were in his gift, but they were not.

Viscount Duncannon

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON thought that at any rate he might have been informed where to apply in a matter of this kind. The safety of the public was completely in the hands of the Company, and it was a notorious fact that the two officers, though experienced and skillful, were of such age and in such a state of health as rendered it improbable that they would be able during the winter to take charge of their vessels.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, the Government had no right to interfere with the transactions of a private Company, and the Company, having the contract of the boats between Holyhead and Kingstown stood precisely in the same position to the Admiralty that any other Company stood in, and the Companies appointed their own commanders. The action and pressure of the public, he thought, would be sufficient to cause them to appoint proper officers.

LORD REDESDALE said, the noble Viscount was right in calling the attention of Parliament and the public to the matter; and, as the Company received £200,000 a year for the postal service, some questions might be asked them by the Post-office authorities.

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON said, he should sincerely regret if no means could be found to remedy the evil.

ENDOWED CHARITIES BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that formerly the funds of small charities were greatly wasted in litigation, and as a check Charity Commissioners were appointed—learned, assiduous, and able men, the Chief Commissioner, Mr. Erle, being almost as great a lawyer as his brother, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. Still it was found that there were many matters of great importance which properly fell within the province of the Commissioners, in which they were at present unable to act; and many more of a merely formal character, which nevertheless necessitated an application to the Court of Chancery, at an average expense of £50 for each application. By this Bill it was therefore proposed to give to the Charity Commissioners power, under certain restrictions and conditions, to make such effectual orders as might at present be made by a Judge at Chambers, or by the y Courts or district Courts of Bank-for the appointment or removal of trustees of an endowed charity, or the of any schoolmaster or mistress or officer, or for dealing with the proof the charity. Their power was to over any endowed charity the inof which did not exceed £50 a year; to charities whose income exceeded amount without the consent of the ty of the trustees. Much litigation rised in compelling discharged school-rs to deliver up the schools and build-and a clause therefore enabled the trates, in the case of the proper reof any schoolmaster or mistress, or ficer, or any recipient of a charity, to possession of any buildings or other ty held over. A clause also facili-the removal of schoolmasters by the es, with the approbation of the Comners, and of the visitors, if there ny. He believed the Bill deserved probation of their Lordships. and he they would assent to the second ed That the Bill be read 2^a.

BROUGHAM entirely concurred panegyric which the noble and d Lord on the woolsack had pro-ed on the Charity Commissioners, lt sure that the Bill would receive animous assent of their Lordships.
CRANWORTH congratulated his and learned Friend on the introducof so excellent and useful a measure.
fact that the annual amount trans-to the Charity Commission had risen £1,000 the first year to £129,000 in and that no less than £600,000 now in the name of that body, proved the ence which the public reposed in it.
CHELMSFORD concurred with ject of the Bill, that of saving the se which was now uselessly imposed small charities by their being comto go to the Court of Chancery. The however, gave additional powers to Charity Commissioners, and he should o know whether the Charity Comners were to have any powers beyond now possessed by the Court of Chan-

LORD CHANCELLOR: No.
CHELMSFORD: Then there be no objection to what was pro-
; for it would be simply saving the e of going to the Court of Chancery; had thought it right to watch care-see that no powers should be conferred on the Commissioners which was not now possessed by the Court of Chancery.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE:
moved—

“Select Committee be appointed to inquire how far it may be practicable to afford better Shelter for Shipping upon our Coasts than is at present afforded by the Adoption of some Plan for the Construction of Breakwaters and Har-bours less costly and better adapted for certain Localities than the System of solid Masonry hitherto in use; and whether any such Plan appears likely to be also serviceable for the Improvement of our National Defence.”

The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

D. Somerset.	L. Colchester.
E. Shrewsbury.	L. Ravensworth.
E. Caithness.	L. Somerhill. (M.
E. Hardwicke.	Clanricarde).
E. Stradbroke.	L. Wynford.
L. Colville of Oulross.	L. Stanley of Alderley.
L. Mont-Eagle (M. Stigo).	L. Aveland.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, June 29, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Game Certificates, do.; Dominica Hurricane Loan; Postage (Army and Navy); Medical Act (1858) Amendment; Court of Queen's Bench Act Amendment.
2^o Local Government Act Amendment.
3^o Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Act Amendment.

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read:

House in Committee, Clauses 27 to 31 agreed to.

Clause 32 (Lan dlord

Mr. LONGFIELD said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Hennessy), he wished to propose an Amendment. The Bill in its present form applied only to tenants from year to year. That, he thought, was limiting too much the scope of the Bill, and narrowing its beneficial character. Everything was to be done by agreement, and it was desirable to promote such arrangements between landlord and tenant, as tending to a good understanding between them. It was desirable to enable landlords and tenants to carry out improvements in regard to land not included originally in a lease. Cases would arise from time to time in which a tenant might wish to drain and otherwise improve a portion of land not included in his lease, and a slight change in the wording of the clause would enable him to do so. If such a power were given, the industry and wealth of the country would be greatly promoted. He, therefore, proposed that in part 3, the word "tenant" should mean all occupying tenants, holding from year to year, or under written leases or agreements (not containing stipulations as to the execution of any improvements) for a less term than three lives, or for thirty-one years.

MR. DEASY said, he did not see any objection to the clause, since nothing was to be done without agreement. He would propose, however, that the Amendment be not introduced at present; but if he found that there was no objection to it on the part of the Committee, he should be willing to insert the Amendment on bringing up the Report.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he would withdraw the Amendment for the present.

Clause agreed to; as was also Clause 33.

Clause 34 (Definition of "Improvements").

MR. MONSELL proposed, that the tenant should be entitled to receive a lump sum, instead of an annuity, from the landlord.

MR. CARDWELL opposed the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn;
Clause agreed to.

Clause 35 was also agreed to.

Clause 36 (Consent of Landlord).

MR. BLAKE said, he thought that the tenant should have power to make improvements in spite of the landlord, in case the latter should refuse to give his consent, and that he should receive compensation for those improvements in the same manner as if they had been effected by previous agreement. He, therefore, proposed to add at the end of the clause words which would secure the tenant from eviction after commencing improvements except for nonpayment of rent (unless the Chairman considered there was unnecessary delay in the completion of the improvements), until the expiration of the longest period named for such improvements and building leases.

MR. CARDWELL said, the Amendment of the hon. Member was perfectly foreign to the object of the Bill, which was to secure certainty of compensation by way of annuity. The Amendment, indeed, would be fatal to the working of the Bill.

Mr. Longfield

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GEORGE proposed the insertion of words giving power to the landlord to execute works of improvement were proposed by the tenant to execute them, and to charge the tenant with interest at 5 per cent on the outlay, to be recoverable in the same manner and along with the rent, as the tenant agreed with the tenant.

MR. DEASY said, he did not object to the principle of the Amendment, but he would suggest that it should be carried out in somewhat different manner, and observed that he would prepare a clause on the subject, which he hoped would meet the approval of the Committee.

MR. GEORGE said, he would not move his proposition on the understanding that the hon. and learned Gentleman would bring it up embodied in a new clause.

LORD NAAS said, with regard to the suggestion for securing the tenant from eviction while carrying on an improvement, he thought that the tenant should be required to say beforehand within what time the improvement should be completed, and that during the interval he should be secured from eviction.

MR. CARDWELL said, he approved of giving the tenant such a security, but thought it would be better to do so in a separate clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 37 (Statement of Expenditure) to be lodged with the Clerk of the Peace.

MR. MAGUIRE said, the clause as it stood at present was to the effect that if the owner might, within three months of the service of a notice to improve the land, serve the tenant with a notice in writing, stating that he disapproved of the proposed improvement, or of any part thereof; and the tenant who had received such notice should not be entitled to commence any improvement from which the owner had so dissented. That clause, in its present form, was an improvement upon the original proposal of the Bill. He feared that even as the clause now stood it would give a sanction to a denial of improvements on the part of a very large section of the Irish landlords. There was a certain class in Ireland who had the absurd apprehension that the tenant would be likely to improve them out of their property; there were many landlords in who would deny that the land wanted improvement—who could not be brought to see why the tenant should need a comfortable house instead of a cabin—who would not admit that the soil required thorough draining, and would perceive no necessity for the making of a road; the cost of the expense would deter landlords sometimes from allowing the tenant to improve, and would urge them to act upon every letter of the clause; there were landlords in Ireland, and not an inconsiderable number, who refused to grant improvements because they wanted to have their power in their own power for political purposes; there were landlords who were usually envious of their tenants, and did not desire to see them prosper. That might seem to many a strange assertion, but he knew cases which rendered it incontrovertible—cases which he could bring before the notice of the House, and which had been substantiated upon oath in courts of justice. Thank God, such cases were not the majority. But, although the intention of the present Bill was to induce every man who had a desire, the hands and the means to work, to put forth all his energies for the improvement of the country, it must be remembered that in its present form it was a purely permissive Bill, and only a certain number of persons might avail themselves of it. Believing then that there were landlords who would not avail themselves of the Bill, and who ought to avail of it, he begged leave to propose an Amendment which would make it, to a certain degree, compulsory upon them to do so. If the tenants were really anxious and able to improve the land, to build a better house, erect out-offices, why should the landlord receive a legislative sanction in refusing to allow him to do so? Such a power conferred upon the landlord would be a terrible barrier to improvement, which he ought to have the sanction of the Legislature. Was the tenant to be allowed to make improvements which would be unsuitable to the farm, and to compel his landlord to pay for them, in case of eviction? By no means—the improvements must be shown to be suitable, beneficial and necessary to the agricultural operations of the farm. If, in such a case, the landlord were still so foolish as to resist the improvements, let him be dealt with as if he were an idiot or a lunatic. Let the Legislature step in between him and his folly, and tell him that he should not prevent the tenant from performing that improvement, which would result in the benefit of the landlord's own property. He appealed to the House on behalf of the general interests of Ireland, because he knew that there was a deadly stream of emigration increasing every day, and which without exaggeration, was taking away the bone and sinew of the country. He wanted to give those who remained at home a stake in the country—something to defend, something to attach them to the institutions of the land. If the House refused to give that security they would but perpetuate a spirit of discontent, and, as a man anxious to preserve peace in the country, he warned them that they would not be legislating in a wise spirit. It had been sometimes urged upon him by friends that the effect of the Amendment he proposed, would be, that the landlord would, where any difference arose, proceed at once to evict the tenant. But there could be only very few men who would thus dare to outrage public opinion by punishing a man simply for his desire to improve the land. Even admitting that there were found a dozen or twenty such cases in Ireland, yet hundreds of thousands would on the other hand be benefited. They were on the horns of a dilemma, but while one horn was very small, the other horn was very great. One would at worst but gore the individual, while the other would gore the nation. He asked nothing against the rights of the landlord, or the rights of property. The landlord's rights must be co-existent with the improvement of the property, and the increase of the productive powers of the land. The hon. Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 10, line 41, to leave out from the word 'thereof' to the end of the Clause, in order to add the words 'if, upon the hearing of the case before the Chairman, it shall be proved that the proposed improvements are not necessary, or that they would be prejudicial to the estate, the tenant shall not be entitled to commence such improvements; but in case the Chairman shall decide that the proposed improvements are necessary, useful, and beneficial to the estate, the tenant shall be enabled to proceed with the improvements in the same way as if he had received the assent of the owner.'"

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART entreated the hon. Member, if he wished to give the Bill a fair chance of passing, to withdraw his Amendment, for he was convinced that with such a clause it would never pass the other House.

MR. DABBY GRIFFITH said, he thought the Amendment was based altogether on a wrong idea of the rights of property. It would have the effect of changing the possession of property from one class of hands to another.

MR. DEASY said, this Amendment was an important one, and its success would involve the entire destruction of the Bill. It was precisely the question that had proved fatal to all the Bills that had been introduced on this subject. It proved fatal to the Bill introduced by the Government of the Earl of Derby, to the one introduced by the Government of the Earl of Aberdeen, and also to the Bill brought in by the present Government of Viscount Palmerston. He believed that if the Amendment could be carried into effect it would operate to the disadvantage of the tenant. The Bill applied to tenants at will, and the moment a tenant made the attempt to carry out improvements contrary to the will of his landlord the latter would at once use the powers which the law gave him, and proceed to eviction. He believed it would be impossible to pass any measure that would give a compulsory power to the tenant over the landlord.

MR. MONSELL said, he could not agree with the view taken by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Deasy), of this Amendment. The Bill of the Earl of Aberdeen's Government was thrown out not because it contained a clause of this nature, but because it contained a clause for retrospective compensation. The Report of the Devon Commission recommended the principle embodied in the Amendment, and the Earl of Derby himself supported it with all his eloquence in the other House, and therefore the weight of authority was in favour of the Amendment. He did not believe that any portion of the landlords of Ireland would act as the Attorney General had stated—cruelly evict tenants that wished to make improvements contrary to the will of their landlords. Such a statement was no better than a slander on the landlords of Ireland. After all, according to the Report of Dr. Phillimore, the proposed Amendment was a part of the Roman civil law in use in several countries on the Continent.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he supported the Amendment. He did so as the representative of an agricultural county in Ireland, and had no fear that he would be regarded as acting contrary to the interests of the landlords. By a previous clause the landlord had the power of making improvements himself, and why should it be regarded as an interference with his right to give the tenant the power of making those improvements which his landlord refused to carry out? He believed that an overwhelming majority of the Irish landlords wished to give leases to their tenants, but at the same time he was ready to assent to the truth of what the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. Maguire) had stated, there were landlords, chiefly small proprietors, who refused to give leases from fear that they would lose their influence over their tenants. The land should not be allowed to remain entirely at the caprice of some individuals, who might be averse to improvement. However, as he had proposed the proposal which made the Chairman of Quarter Sessions the arbitrator in other matters included in the Bill, he could not assent to that portion of the Amendment. He would suggest that the Land Estates Court be the tribunal to decide, and he would then give his cordial support to the Amendment.

Mr. Pollard Urquhart

MR. BUTT said, the rest of the Amendment, as compared with that Amendment, was utterly insignificant. The rest of the Amendment was the landlords' Bill—this was the tenants' Bill. This very Amendment, which to some hon. Members seemed now so objectionable, was no result of proletarian popular agitation. It was one of the results of the Devon Commission, and was embraced in a Bill introduced in the House by the Earl of Derby in 1846, and in another introduced into the Commons by the Government of Viscount Palmerston. Opposition was not to be expected in the other House. If opposed there it would be in the House of Commons, not in the House of Lords. Suppose a farm which was not so productive as it might be; the landlord was unable or unwilling to expend the necessary capital to make it productive; the tenant offered to do it himself; but, on account of some fancied rights of property, the landlord was to be allowed to prevent it being made as productive as it might be made for the general good of the country. He would ask whether hon. Gentlemen opposite who supported the Earl of Derby's Government were prepared to vote against the Amendment, which embodied the principle contained in the Earl of Derby's Bill. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. George) supported that Bill. Would they find him acting the part of an opponent?

The Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Dungarvan; and was the noble Lord (Lord Naas), whose name was on the Bill of the Earl of Derby's Government, prepared to oppose the Amendment? The emigration of the Irish had been spoken of. It had been urged that it was not owing to evictions. Agreed; it was not owing to actual eviction. But it was owing to the consciousness of the want of security to the tenant in the occupation of his land; and unless such security was given as was contemplated by the Amendment before the Committee he was of opinion that the pre-emigration would end in the extinction in Ireland of the old Celtic race.

Mr. JOHN WALSH said, he was perfectly sure that the insertion of this Amendment would be fatal to the Bill, and the hon. Member for Dungarvan might as well move the rejection of the Bill on the third reading as propose its amendment. The principle of the measure was, that the landlord should have a share in all the improvements that were made, and the Amendment, therefore, was a direct violation of that principle. He had been amazed at the vagueness and generality of the language used in regard to the improvements. The truth was, that many things which were called improvements would greatly deteriorate a property. What were called tenant-rights in Ireland meant, in the estimation of many of the tenants, nothing more than the subdivision of their farms among their children, and a return to that system which had plunged Ireland into the gulf in which, to a great extent, it was now verging. The effect of the Amendment would be to compel the landlord to employ his capital in carrying out works of which he did not approve, and which would prevent him executing improvements that he believed would be really beneficial. Though he disapproved of the Bill as a whole, he thought that the clause which gave the landlord the power to control the improvements to be made involved a very valuable principle, and he trusted that the Amendment now proposed would be rejected by the Committee.

Mr. VINCENT SCULLY said, he would like to impress upon the Conservative landlords that there would not be the least danger in concurring in the Amendment with a little alteration, which he understood the mover would have no objection to make. The Amendment would not interfere with the rights of property, and would to a certain extent, if carried, settle the question for the present at least in the minds of the Irish people—an effect that would not be produced by the Bill in its present form, in consequence of the power given to serve a counter-notice. The Attorney General for Ireland said that the introduction of the Amendment would ensure the rejection of the Bill in "another place;" certainly it would if it would interfere with the rights of property; and, therefore, he wished to impress upon the Conservative landlords that it would not have any such effect. He suggested the Amendment of the Amendment by the introduction of a provision giving the landlord an option of making the improvements if the assistant barrister should decide that improvements were necessary.

Mr. GEORGE said, the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. Butt) had attempted to cast an imputation on his consistency in connection with this question. He knew nothing in the history of the hon. and learned Member's political consistency in that House, or in his political morality that entitled him to catechise him (Mr. George) on his political conduct. The hon. and learned Member alluded to the measure which was brought forward by the ex-Chancellor of Ireland and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside) when they were connected with the Government of the Earl of Derby. He begged to state that he gave that Bill his general approbation; but that he guarded himself at the time against being supposed to favour all its details. He held an independent opinion then, as he did now, upon the important question submitted to the consideration of Parliament. He, for one, objected to the transfer of the control of his property from himself to the Chairman of Quarter Sessions. He was averse to being dragged, at the instigation of his tenant, before an assistant barrister, there to produce his title deeds, and to show the reason why he did and why he did not grant a lease, or assent to projected alterations which might or might not be improvements. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would adhere with fidelity to the great principles of the Bill; but if they agreed to the Amendment he did not think they could carry the measure by any majority in that House, and from previous experience they might expect that it would not be approved of elsewhere.

MR. CARDWELL said, he had no complaint to make as to the manner in which the hon. Member for Dungarvan had brought forward his Amendment; but he thought it exceedingly doubtful whether his proposal would be one advantageous to the tenant. If they continued the power of eviction, every compulsory power they gave to the tenant over the landlord, would operate to the injury of the former. It was of no use to refer to former Bills. This they must make up their minds to, if they wished the present Bill to pass—they must avoid compulsion and retrospection. Where there was a willing landlord and a willing tenant, improvement could take place; and where a limited landlord was unable to make improvements, the clause set him free from the fetters of settlements, and gave him the power of a fee-simple landlord; it gave to the family that benefit of the settlement, and gave to the present occupier the benefit of the freehold. It would also render it impossible in future for a tenant who was evicted to lose the benefit of the bond fide improvements that he had made. These two advantages would be gained by the Bill, and he earnestly pressed the Committee not to destroy these principles by the introduction of a compulsory power over the landlord by the tenant.

LORD FERMOY said, he did not believe that the landlords of Ireland were such bad men or such fools as to evict tenants because they were anxious to improve their estates. He would support the Amendment, notwithstanding that some Members seemed to think it would endanger the Bill in that place where there was very little redemption for anything that was good.

MR. CONOLLY said, that as a landlord he should most cordially vote for the Amendment. He would compel the landlord, in certain cases, to make improvements; and, in doing so, he would not be doing him any injustice. He knew there were landlords who would prefer to sit down with their hands in their pockets, and very little else in their pockets besides their hands, rather than comply with the just requirements of the tenant. In supporting the Amendment, he was not acting against the interest of his class; because, if they understood their interest, they must see that the improvements of their estates would be for their advantage.

SIR WILLIAM SOMERVILLE said, he thought there was nothing in the proposition of the hon. Member for Dungar-van that should excite alarm in the of the most sensitive stickler for the of property. His right hon. Friend (Cardwell) had not stated that the introduction of the Amendment would be to the Bill, and therefore he would give his support.

Mr. George

Question put, "That the words 'no tenant,' stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided: Ayes 140; Noes 48: Majority 92.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit on Tuesday next, at Twelve of the Clock.

GAME LICENCES (SCOTLAND) QUESTION.

MR. FENWICK said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether a Licence was required for the Sale of Game in Scotland, and, if not, whether there are any reasons why the Law should not be assimilated to that of England on the subject?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was no Licence at present required for the Sale of Game in Scotland. He could not see any reason why the law on the subject should not be assimilated to that of England.

LANDED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND) QUESTION.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Irish Landed Estates Court employed the Ordnance Department exclusively for all its Surveys and Valuations, and whether at a higher rate of remuneration than used to be paid to professional gentlemen previously employed for that purpose?

MR. CARDWELL stated that the Joint Committee of the Landed Estates Court finding the plans on which the titles sought to be established were incorrectly and imperfectly made out under the former system, had recourse to the Ordnance Department for assistance. The total cost of the survey was now 4d. per acre, but the charge for the aggregate was less than under the former unsatisfactory mode of preparation.

VOLUNTEER CORPS FOR IRELAND QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he rose to enquire, Whether the attention of the Officers of the Crown have been called to 42nd Geo. III., c. 66, which enables Government to accept the services of corps of Volunteers which it is proposed to embody; and whether, in their opinion, it will be competent to form Volunteer Corps in Ireland.

MR. DEASY said, the attention of the officers of the Crown had been directed to the difference in the law respecting Volunteer Corps in England and in Ireland. It was their opinion that, although the Crown was enabled to accept services of the Volunteer Corps in Ireland, no power existed either to regulate or control those corps when once levied, and even the Commanding Officer was wholly destitute of authority. All the Crown could do was to disband the corps, and to compel them to return their arms and accoutrements into store.

SUPERANNUATION OF DOCKYARD LABOURERS.—QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask the noble Lord the Secretary to the Board of Admiralty, Whether it was true that certain dockyard labourers had been refused superannuation, and on what grounds that refusal has been given? He also wished to know what steps the Board of Admiralty have taken since the passing of the Superannuation Act last session, to place the admission of labourers on such a footing as to secure for those permanently employed the benefits which the Act intended to confer upon them.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was true that seven dockyard labourers had been discharged without receiving superannuation. The Act of 1859 did not give retiring allowances to those who were not previously entitled to it, and the ordinary labourers in dockyards had not been entitled to superannuation since 1833. The Admiralty had no intention of proposing any alteration of the law.

EUROPEAN FORCES (INDIA) BILL. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES: I beg to ask the right hon. Baronet, the Secretary of State for India, Whether the Papers of which the want was so much felt during the debate of last evening are now forthcoming; and if not, whether he can explain the cause of the delay in their production?

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I felt it my duty last night, in consequence of what occurred during the debate, to make inquiry into the circumstances connected with the papers relating to the mutiny of our army in India, a portion of which I now hold in my hand. They are very voluminous, and some of them have not yet been printed. I referred for information on the subject to the Military Secretary of the Indian Department, and I have found the circumstances to be as follows. My hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid) asked me early in February, whether there would be any objection to the production of these papers, and I said that he was perfectly welcome to them, if they were moved for as an unopposed Return. My hon. Friend accordingly made a formal Motion for them on the 15th of February. They were prepared in the military Department of the India House, and they were given to the private Secretary of my hon. Friend on the 20th of March, and on the 22nd. of that month they were laid on the table of the House, and ordered to be printed. They were afterwards sent for verification to the Military Secretary of the Indian Department, and I am sorry to say that some delay took place in revising the papers. The Military Secretary thought that he was going on fast enough, as long as the other papers were not sent to him, while we waited to forward the further documents, until he returned the first portion revised. The whole series of Indian papers amounts to about 800 pages, but there was a portion of them referring to the case of Sir Charles Trevelyan, which being a personal question, we thought it desirable should be pressed forward as much as possible. This is the course that has been pursued, and this has been the cause of the delay. I do not wish to blame either the printer or the Military Secretary, although like the Earl of Chatham and Sir Robert Strachan, they certainly have been waiting for one another. But at this present moment there are about 500 pages printed, and there still remain 300 pages to be printed, and I may add that the matter was not brought to the notice of my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of the India Board, until the 27th ultimo, when he received a note stating that an hon. Member of the House had been inquiring about the papers, and the steps which he took upon that information evince every desire on our part that the printing should be proceeded with as rapidly as possible. The Military Secretary is, in common with the Council, entirely opposed to the amalgamation, and the House will easily judge that if there has been any delay on their part, it has been quite unintentional, and has certainly not been with the view of furthering the course that I have proposed.

On the Motion for the Adjournment of the House to Monday next,

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I wish to take this opportunity of stating briefly the course which we propose to take with reference to the order of business for to-night and the early part of next week. Objection was taken last evening to going on with the discussion upon the Bill for the Amalgamation of the European forces in India, upon the ground that papers which were said to be necessary to the formation of a proper opinion on the subject, had not been placed in the hands of hon. Members. I hope, however, that my right hon. Friend, the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), will waive his objection to going on on Monday with the discussion on the second reading of the Bill, provided a portion, if not the whole of the papers, are in the hands of hon. Members on Monday morning, and on the condition that the Committee on the Bill should be put off until the whole of the papers are in the hands of hon. Members. If that should be agreed to, of course the order for to-night will be put off till Monday. I am sorry to say that my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General is confined to his house by indisposition, and therefore is not able to be here to-night to go on with the Bankruptcy Bill, which is the next order of the day. I should hope that under these circumstances the House will agree to going into Committee of Supply, to enable my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to proceed with such Estimates as he is prepared to go on with.

MR. HORSMAN:—As I understand that we shall have the greater portion of the papers relating to the Organization of the Indian Army in our hands on Monday morning, and that the Bill will be read a second time on Monday evening, with the understanding that the Committee on the Bill shall be postponed until we have the whole of the papers in our hands, I think it would be better, for the convenience of the House, that we should defer the Debate until Monday. But I think it is necessary to state what the papers which we require, and in doing so, I beg to call the attention of the House to the very singular statement which has just been made by the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary of State for India. He told us this morning, two or three times over, that the delay in the production of these papers did not rest in any way with his department. He said that he had presented these papers three months ago, and that the fault of their non-production lay entirely with the printer. Another Member of the Cabinet got up and stated also that it lay with the Printer's Committee. I am informed that the right hon. Baronet has been going about the House, from one hon. Member to another, asking them to put a question to him on this subject, so as to anticipate any comment that I might make. I have to-day that those papers were sent to the printer, but that the right hon. Gentleman has had them taken back from the printer to the India Department, and that they have been in the right hon. Gentleman's department ever since, and unless I am correctly informed, at 1 o'clock this morning, when the right hon. Gentleman said that those papers had been for three months with the printer, and that non-production was attributable to him in the morning, those papers were still in his department and had not been returned to the printer. Now, is that true, or is it not? If it is true, then I say an amount of carelessness has been displayed, which is scarcely credible on the part of a Cabinet Minister. Last night he sought to carry the House with him, by stating, three times over, that these papers had been three months out of his hands, and in the hands of the printer, and that the fault of their non-production rested entirely with the printer, when at the very moment he knew they were in his hands, or in the hands of a subordinate of his department. I ask again, is that true? I have not had time to make myself perfectly acquainted upon all the details, but I have reason to believe that these are the facts of the case, which the right hon. Gentleman has now attempted to substantiate by saying that the question was which lay between the Military Secretary and the printer. But now, passing that point, I wish the Government to state to the House clearly to understand what they want those papers, and why we cannot have them as a necessary preliminary for tory discussion of the Bill. Last night the Government introduced a Bill to maintain a local army in India, and this they have introduced a Bill to repeal that of last year, and the Secretary of State in introducing that Bill, stated to the House, as a ground of justification of change of policy, that circumstances since August last come to the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government which were not known to them last year. But, I endeavoured to show the House last night from a telegram which I read, addressed by Lord Clyde to the Governor-General in 1858, that those circumstances known to the Government at the time, and therefore that change of policy was to have been based upon something which they have not thought fit to explain.

Sir Charles Wood

I also stated that I had reason to believe that the right hon. Gentleman had dealt frankly with the House, as to the other papers which had been presented; that he had given to this House a statement professing to be complete, but which was only extracts; and that important papers had been omitted from papers which he professed to give entire. It was open to the right hon. Gentleman at the time to have refuted that statement, and to have challenged investigation upon it; but far from expecting that he would do so, he voted for closing the debate last night. Before he gave an explanation, I had thought that he would have been the first person to have insisted that a division on the second reading should be taken, until an opportunity for explaining these matters had been afforded. But the right hon. Gentleman remained perfectly silent—glued to his seat—and thus, in the opinion of many Members of the House, he thereby invited judgment to go against him by default. Under such circumstances, I felt myself justified in insisting that that Bill should not proceed until we had the papers before us, to enable us to judge whether the reasons on which this change of policy was justified, had any existence except in the right hon. Gentleman's imagination, or were based upon more substantial grounds. Now, Sir, I wish further to state that, when the papers are produced, that they will be the real thing for which we ask, and that the right hon. Gentleman will produce the real papers which we desire. The right hon. Gentleman has just told us that they contain 800 pages of printed matter, and he said last night that when produced, they will not afford us much assistance. Then the delay has occurred from the encumbering of those Returns with an enormous mass of matter which no one desires to have, but there are important and interesting documents which we do desire, and we do expect to have—we wish to have all the early despatches of Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield—we wish to have a continuous and unbroken narrative of all those circumstances which have been misnamed a mutiny in the European force in India. I moreover understand that within the last day or two, protests from various Members of the Council have been lodged with, and are in the hands of, the right hon. Gentleman. If so, I trust that those papers will be also produced, and I trust that they will be the real papers that we ask for, because I must say, after what I showed from my Lord Clyde's telegram last night, and after the statement of the right hon. Gentleman himself this morning as to the papers having been so long out of his possession, and the fault being in the office of the printer, I think that the House is justified in looking with great vigilance indeed, to all the proceedings of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to this matter.

Mr. ARTHUR MILLS: I only wish, Sir, to express in one word my entire satisfaction with the proposal of the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government with respect to proceeding with this Bill. I think it is a most satisfactory arrangement, and I can only say, with regard to the proceedings that took place this morning, that if any suggestion had been made that those papers should be guaranteed to be before the House when we go into Committee, I should have been quite ready to have assented to the second reading of the Bill last night; but the circumstances certainly were rather peculiar. There were many hon. Members who would wish to speak, and whom I am sure the House would have been glad to listen to. Certainly on this very important subject it did strike me as most desirable that no impression should go abroad that at a time when public apprehension was relieved in a great measure in reference to our great Indian Empire, public interest in our Indian Empire and in its prosperity had been abated. I will only add the expression of my hope in confirmation of that which has been said by the right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, that those papers, be they memoranda, or Minutes, or protests, or by whatever other name they may be called, of the Members of the Council, will also be laid upon the table of the House, because I think that they would contribute very greatly to elucidate the question at issue, and enable us to form a correct conclusion upon it. I must say, and I beg to be excused for making this observation, that it has been said with regard to myself, and others who have taken a part in this question, that we have ventured to volunteer statements that are unsupported by personal authority here and in India, and that we are certainly in a minority in this House. I should state that the views which I entertain have been supported by three successive Governors-General of India, and they are supported by many of the Members of the Council; and, therefore, it is not correct to say that we are obtruding opinions which are not seconded by those in authority, both in England and in India.

COLONEL SYKES: With regard to the Returns granted by the House to my Motion two of them are very important. I have made frequent inquiries with reference to them in the Journal Office, but I can obtain no information about them, and they are not forthcoming. I trust therefore before we are called upon to express an opinion with regard to the second reading of this Bill, those Returns also may be added to the Order of the House.

SIR FREDERIC SMITH: I am unwilling that this discussion should close without making an observation with regard to a gentleman whose name has often been mentioned by the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for India. I have long been in official communication with the Military Secretary for India, and I am quite certain that no man in this country is more deserving of the confidence of the House of Commons. He is a most honest, upright, zealous, and indefatigable public officer, and I am quite certain that if any delay on his part has taken place in the production of those documents to the House of Commons, it has been entirely the result of his scrupulous anxiety to have them presented to the House in as perfect a form as possible.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: I had not supposed that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) would have rendered it necessary for me to refer again to the statement which I made last night. What he stated last night was, that I had suppressed the papers, obviously because I did not wish the House to be in possession of the time when I brought forward the motion for the amalgamation of the army. It was not a charge of neglect on my Department, as I should have been expected to have done, but it was a charge of wilful suppression of truth on my part, and the withholding from the House information might enable it to come to a conclusion different from that which I recommended. My statement was not that they were out of the hands of my Department, but that I knew nothing about the papers, and that at the time that they were laid upon the table of this House. What I did say, was that I deny, and what I deny again, is that any act of mine, direct or indirect, had sent back those papers from the House under the strongest terms that I can do consistently with civility to the right hon. Gentleman, I beg to say that the charge is totally unfounded. The fact is, as I stated last night, not that the papers were sent back to the India Department, but that the proof sheets were sent from time to time to Colonel Baker for revision, as has been stated by an hon. and learned Member on the opposite side of the House, he is the most honourable, scrupulous, and one of the best public servants with whom I ever was acquainted. His opinion on the subject of the amalgamation of the army is opposed to mine, and no one would suppose that he was influenced by any other motive in the world in sending these papers back, except for the purpose of insuring their accuracy. I have indeed heard that those revised papers, to a certain extent, have been perused by others. I am not sure that some of the hon. Gentlemen may not have received information of the contents of these papers, but certainly it was not on my part, in any way whatsoever, that the leakage has occurred, in the production and printing of those papers. Now, the right hon. Gentleman says that I withdrew from the discussion last night, by opposing the adjournment of the debate. Certainly I should rather say that I withdrew from the debate because I was perfectly ready and anxious that the debate should have gone on last night. I should have been prepared to take my part, and to justify any portions of my conduct which might have been objected to by the right hon. Gentleman—but I rather too much that he who voted for the adjournment of the debate, should round upon me, and accuse me of quietly by, without giving explanation which I was perfectly willing to do, of allowing judgment to go against default. According to the invariable use of the House, the hon. Member moves a Bill waits for the close of the day to hear the different arguments which are adduced against the measure, and according to that rule, I was waiting for the close of the debate, and it was the hon. Gentleman who urged the rejection of those papers, and the hon. Member who voted for the adjournment of the House, who prevented me on that point from taking that part in the debate which I otherwise should have done. The right hon. Gentleman now complains of overloading these Returns by unnecessary details. He must know, as the House knows, that the Department is bound to answer the Order of the House; and if my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen moved for certain papers, it was our duty to return those papers however long it might be. Her Majesty's Government have no wish to withhold those papers, although they do not think that they throw much light upon the question; the hon. Gentleman having moved for them, we felt that we had no right to refuse the production of those papers. If, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud should find that they are more voluminous than he thinks convenient, all I can say is, that I beg that he will not throw the blame on me. The papers that were moved for were produced, and are now in course of being printed, and they will be placed upon the table of the House; and if any delay has occurred, that I beg to say is that I am not responsible for keeping back those papers. The right hon. Gentleman has made an imputation against me of garbling papers. Perhaps I may be permitted to state what the fact is upon that matter. The papers are now on the table of the House, and the extracts from private letters. I thought it desirable that my colleagues in the Cabinet and the Indian Council should have these private letters, and they were sent confidentially for their use. Three members of the Council prepared confidential memoranda on those extracts, and they were also printed for the use of the Council. Before they had been printed, and my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) moved for the production of those papers, and I stated to him at the time that it seemed to me to be a most unheard-of proceeding that he should move for confidential memoranda of the very existence of which he had no right to be aware.

Mr. Arthur Mills

COLONEL SYKES: I did not know that they were confidential.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: My hon. and gallant Friend has said that he was not aware that they were confidential; but how the fact of the existence of those confidential memoranda was communicated to him I cannot say. I can only say that I objected to their production. I stated, and I repeat it again, that I thought they were not papers which ought to be laid before the House. Indeed, Sir, even if I had wished that those confidential memoranda should have been laid before the House of Commons, it was obviously impossible that those papers could be laid upon the table of the House without the letters on which they were founded; and before I could lay them on the table of the House, I was obliged to telegraph to India to ask the permission of Lord Clyde, Sir William Mansfield, and Earl Canning, to lay upon the table of the House such portions of those papers as I thought desirable. There were some expressions in the letters which had been laid before the Council, which I did not think advisable, or fair to individuals, to lay before the public, and I omitted them, after obtaining the permission of those who had written them. I have now only to say that the extracts which I omitted were of two kinds—one expressing an opinion more favourable by far to my view than anything I had left, and another an expression to which I suppose the accusation of the right hon. Gentleman refers, an expression of Colonel Durand. That is the only case to which I am inclined to suppose this accusation can refer, and I shall be obliged to him if he will state whether I am right in that. The right hon. Gentleman declines to do so. I will, therefore, state to the House that the only instance to which his imputation can possibly apply is with reference to one of Colonel Durand's memoranda. I will state to the House exactly what those facts are. I have no wish to keep back anything that occurred. In Colonel Durand's confidential memoranda there were two paragraphs which referred to a private letter of Sir Patrick Grant, which I did not think it right to lay before the public. I sent for Colonel Durand, and suggested to him that it would be better if those two paragraphs were left out, and he said that he had no objection on his part, except for this reason, that though he had kept these confidential memoranda perfectly secret, he knew that they had been shown about to many persons, and he would not like himself to withdraw any paragraph to which he had put his hand, but that the memoranda were in my possession, and if I chose to take upon myself the responsibility of striking out those two paragraphs he had no objection. I said, "I will take upon myself to do that, because, as I do not lay upon the table of the House the private letters of which those paragraphs are part, I think it is better that those paragraphs should not appear." I beg to say that the omission does not in the slightest degree vary, alter, or retract the opinion expressed in the memoranda. I have stated to the House fairly and openly why I left them out. I had authority from Colonel Durand to keep back such portions of private letters as I have mentioned, and it would have been absurd to have left in the hands of the printers paragraphs referring to private letters which do not appear. I do not think, therefore, that I am in fairness open to the accusation of garbling those papers.

Now, Sir, I will not enter into the question of whether I am justified in taking a different course this year from that which I pursued in August last year. I think that the circumstances which I have already stated perfectly warrant that change of course, and I beg to remind the House of this, that when I introduced the Bill in August last, for the purpose of covering an illegality which had been committed by the Government which preceded us, in having a larger local force than was warranted by law, (for by law the limit was 24,000, which limit was exceeded) I stated distinctly the reason why I introduced that Bill, and I stated at the same time—in the middle of the month of August—that the introduction of that Bill was in no way to prejudice the question of the Indian army which we should be compelled to take up this year.

I must beg pardon of the House for having made these statements. It is certainly no fault of mine, but I think that after the right hon. Gentleman last night and to-day has imputed such motives to me, I could not, with due regard to my character as a Member of this House, avoid making the observations which I have done.

Sir Charles Wood

Subject dropped.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. KEKEWICH said, he rose to call the attention of the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the disturbances which took place on Sunday last in the neighbourhood of the church of St. George's-in-the-East. He had collected a few facts from the public journals relative to what had occurred, but he did not rely on that source of information alone as he had also been in communication with persons who were present on the occasion. He found it stated that great disturbance occurred during the service, but the sermon was not interrupted, but afterwards,

"The mob collected in the yard round the entrance to the rectory, and as the clergy and choristers passed in they were hooted and hustled. Two or three of the choristers attempted to make their way home, and for that purpose went out into Cannon Street, where their appearance was the signal for a terrific uproar. They were followed by several hundreds of people, who hissed and yelled, and threw at them dirt, stones, and anything else they could obtain. Once or twice the choristers, who wore round collars similar to those adopted by Roman Catholic priests, and long coats, made a run for it, but the mob ran too, and increased in numbers at every step."

He (Mr. Kekewich) must correct one statement in that Report, for he was assured by the parties themselves that they wore nothing in any way resembling the dress of Roman Catholic priests. The Report went on to say:—

"On arriving in the Commercial Road an attempt was made to beat the choristers, and a desperate rush was made upon them, but three or four policemen who arrived at the time kept the mob back as well as they could, and the choristers darted down a narrow street. The mob followed and drove them back into the Commercial Road. At this time they seemed undecided as to the course they should pursue, and one of them tried to go back so that he might take refuge in the clergy house in Cannon Street, but the mob refused to let him do so, and drove him and his friends in an opposite direction along the Commercial Road, on reaching the top of which they made another attempt to escape by running down a street at the rear of Whitechapel Church, into the Whitechapel Road. The mob, which at this time consisted of at least 1,000 persons, followed them with loud execrations, and matters threatening to become serious, two of them took refuge in a coffee-house. Peremptory orders were shouted by the mob that 'the Puseyites should be turned out,' and turned out they were, to be knocked about by their ruffianly assailants."

When the subject was last before the House the Secretary of State, referring to what had occurred within the church, said he did not know whether what had happened could be called an outrage. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would admit the proceedings of last Sunday were outrageous, and take steps to prevent their recurrence. He (Mr. Kekewich) did not appear for the rector of St. George's, whom he did not know. He believed that rev. Gentleman to be an amiable man, attentive to his pastoral duties, but it was to be regretted that he had not met the irritation that had sprung up in due time, and by conciliatory measures endeavoured to prevent these troubles. He could assure the rev. Gentleman that the people of this country would not brook any departure from the pure and holy system of worship to which they were accustomed, or sanction any forms or innovations which they considered to belong to a religion which was not their own. Having called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to the circumstances he would only ask him further what steps he had taken to prevent a recurrence of such disorders.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The hon. Member has referred to an article which appeared in the newspapers, professing to give an account of what took place at St. George's-in-the-East on Sunday last. He has not said that he has any additional information.

MR. KEKEWICH: I distinctly said I had been in communication with those who were present.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: I did not collect that the hon. Gentleman had received any information from those persons, as all he has stated has been extracted from the newspaper report. In one material particular—that relative to the dress of the choristers—he has corrected the account, and, from information I have received, I am led to believe that in other parts it is overcharged. I have here the report of the superintendent of police who was in the church on Sunday last, which I will read to the House:—

"I beg to report that this day's 11 o'clock morning service at the parish church of St. George's-in-the-East was attended by about 160 persons, twenty-five of whom left the church at the commencement of the sermon. The Rev. T. Dove officiated throughout, and, with the exception of a little feigned coughing during the prayer for the clergy, no irregularity occurred. The lecturer's afternoon service was attended by about 300 persons, who conducted themselves in an orderly and attentive manner. About 200 persons awaited the opening of the churchyard gates prior to the 7 o'clock evening service, which was attended by about 1,000 persons. The choristers (eighteen), as in the morning, wore their white surplices, and sat in the organ gallery, and the clergymen, when not officiating, sat within the communion rails. The Rev. T. Dove read or intoned the prayers, a strange clergyman read the lessons, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Ward. There was the usual amount of noise from feigned coughing, hissing, and some laughter during the first of the service, although but little interruption was attempted during the sermon. On Mr. Dove ascending the steps of the altar after receiving the offertory, he turned his face towards the east; this caused much hissing and noise, which continued during the benediction. The people next attempted the doxology, which for a time was prevented by the organ, but finally sung; afterwards they all gradually left the church and streets."

That is the report of the police superintendent who was present on the occasion, and the House will observe that the disturbances were confined to unseemly and irreverent noises interposed during the service, and that there was nothing which amounted to a breach of the peace, or the use of any force. I have two other police reports bearing more directly on the statement of the hon. Gentleman. One is the report of the inspector and superintendent, dated June 29:—

"I beg to report respecting the attached extract from The Times of the 26th instant, that on Sunday evening, the 24th instant, about half-past 8 p. m., two gentlemen (supposed choristers) were shouted at by a few boys, who, it is supposed, followed them from St. George's-in-the-East Church to the Commercial-road. The police were on the spot immediately, having been posted at short intervals to prevent persons leaving the church being molested. The crowd increased to about 250 or 300 persons, and when at Church-lane, Whitechapel, the gentlemen who were being followed then ran down Spectacle-alley into High-street, Whitechapel, and the police prevented the crowd from following; but some of them, taking another turning, again met the same two persons in Whitechapel. The police then escorted them to George-yard, up which they went, and the crowd was prevented following any further. No mud or any other missile was seen thrown by the police, nor was there any person assaulted, and no complaint was made by any person to the police of any one being ill-treated."

Here is another report by the inspector and superintendent:—

"I beg to report with reference to the annexed paragraph from The Times newspaper of the 26th instant, that none of the clergy or choristers were hooted or hustled in the churchyard near the entrance to the rectory-house on Sunday evening last, nor was there a terrific uproar in Cannon-street-road, nor were three of the choristers hissed, yelled, dirt or stones thrown at them, nor was there any disorder near the church to justify the interference of the police in arresting any person."

I do not find, therefore, that there is any reason for supposing that any peculiar violence or impropriety occurred last Sunday. The House may, perhaps, wish to know what is the police force now regularly stationed at that church and its neighbourhood every Sunday to preserve the peace. There are ten police-constables in the church, with two sergeants and an inspector. In the churchyard there are two constables; between the churchyard and Wellclose-square there are five; a sergeant and twelve constables are kept patrolling near the church; there is a reserve of one inspector, two sergeants, and twenty constables; and in Denmark-street an inspector, a sergeant, and fifteen constables are stationed, making altogether seventy-three men constantly employed there every Sunday for the special purpose of preventing any breach of the peace. The Commissioner of police informs me that, with the exception of occasions when there are great open-air assemblages, he has not for many years brought together so large a body of police for any purpose as now regularly attend the services at St. George's-in-the-East. Perhaps I may also state, for the information of the House, the instructions under which the police act. I will not go into the details, but here is one sentence:—

"The police are, if possible, to prevent the commission of any assault or other breach of the peace, and apprehend the parties offending. They are likewise to enforce the provisions of the 1st of Mary, cap. 3, an extract from which accompanies this order."

After this explanation I hope the House will be of opinion that there has been no remissness on the part of the Government in giving due protection to those who perform Divine service in this church. It is very lamentable that these irreverent interruptions of public worship should so often occur; but, as I have already stated, I think they do not amount to breaches of the peace. They are interruptions in the nature of noisy exclamations, the responses being made at improper times, and other means adopted by which persons, without showing that they interrupt the service, nevertheless contrive to attain their end. They do not appear to bring themselves within the grasp of the law. At all events, the acts they commit are not such as are cognizable by the police. Subject to that exception, every means has been used by the Government and the Commissioned Police for preventing the recurrence of these very lamentable and unseemly disturbances.

Sir George Lewis

HOLYHEAD HARBOUR—QUESTIONS

Mr. STANLEY said, he wished to know if the Secretary to the Admiralty, in possession of any Report or Document regarding the effects of the severe gale of the 25th and 26th October last on the Harbour, Piers, and Works at Holyhead. Also, as to the security of the Eastern and other vessels taking shelter there during that gale, and if any accidents occurred owing to any defect in the construction of the Harbour: And can he state the number of vessels that had taken shelter in the new Harbour during the last two years? The harbour at Holyhead had cost the country a million of pounds, and the Admiralty ought to state what they were of opinion that the harbour was, as he believed it to be, a really useful one, or, as the public prints had lately declared it, of no service whatever. A journal, which they all admired—The Times—had on four or five occasions misled the public as to the state of the harbour. The special correspondent of this journal, who was on the spot at the time, and who had described the gale of October 25-26 in a manner of great ability, made this statement:—

"A large part of the breakwater works at Holyhead have been destroyed, and vessels far inside and sheltered, compared to what a big ship lay, have either gone down bodily or driven high and dry ashore. . . . At the very extremity of the breakwater, where one would have thought the Channel fleet might have ridden through any gale, much damage has been done. High and dry ashore under the mountain lay a fine barque, and around her, in the same predicament, were three smaller vessels. Out in the centre of the harbour the tops of slender tapering masts showed where Henry's beautiful schooner yacht, the Mary, had gone down bodily. Immediately behind her last was another and larger vessel, which apparently only escaped the same fate by being driven against the rocks."

Again, in a leading article of The Times respecting harbours of refuge the following passage:—

"The harbour at Holyhead has been the scene half a dozen times, each time, it is said, of a worse principle than before, and the final result of that last autumn the Royal Charter passed was wrecked at night; the Great Eastern was lost in it; and small vessels were thrown high and dry, or sent to the bottom."

And, upon a more recent occasion, of some remarks upon Trotman's anchor:—

A very practical illustration of the advantages of the invention may be given merely by mentioning that in the terrible storm of last autumn the Great Eastern rode securely in Holyhead harbour, in position by her anchors, and these were supplied by Mr. Trotman. Now, if that enormous vessel of metal, acted upon by the furious gale, held in its place by those anchors, it seems probable enough that under circumstances equally trying they might do the same good service for the war."

"In another place" a noble Lord, whose name had been prejudiced by these statements, had declared that Holyhead harbour was of hardly any use, and did not answer the purposes for which it was constructed. He was an eye-witness of the gale described by the special correspondent of the Times, and if the Great Eastern ever in danger it was not from any want of anchorage, for she was not in the harbour. She was anchored outside, in the first instance, by a single anchor, and during the height of the gale she was hardly submerged to any sea. Towards morning the weather changed, and she was then swung clear of all shelter from the unfinished breakwater. About nine or ten she got under steam and weighed one of her anchors with the view of shifting her position. She steamed ahead; her anchor, however, broke; and he should never forget the sight which presented itself as she continued to be drifting towards the rocks. Of the vessels inside the harbour not one of fifty-nine which took shelter there had received injury in the slightest degree from the construction of the harbour.

TROTMAN'S ANCHORS.—QUESTION.

MR. MILD MAY said, he would beg to draw the attention of the Secretary to the Admiralty. When his attention has been called to a letter in The Times of Monday the 25th, signed "John Trotman," stating that no anchor has been supplied to the Admiralty except the one used by the Royal Navy; and whether he adheres to his statement that any Officer can have one of Trotman's Anchors if he asks for it? Of course it is falling from a man of the noblest high character was of the greatest weight, but Gentlemen in office were occasionally misled by their subordinates, and he had no doubt that was the case in this instance. Mr. Trotman had stated distinctly that he had supplied no anchors to the navy except that on board the Royal Yacht. The merits of this anchor had been investigated by a Committee appointed by the Admiralty, and they reported in its favour as the best which had been brought under their notice, adding that the anchor used by the Royal Navy was the worst but one of eight different sorts submitted to them. Mr. Trotman had spent £600 in his trials, and it seemed rather hard that the Admiralty, after the result, should neither have reimbursed him his expenses nor compensated him by ordering any of his anchors. The anchors now in use were supplied under a contract of 1841, since which time great improvements had taken place in the forging of iron; the invention of Nasmyth's steam-hammer, for instance, made the process much cheaper; and to give the same price for forging now, as nineteen years ago, seemed almost like paying the same for calico as before the invention of the power-loom and spinning-jenny. A shipbroker, from whom he had made inquiries respecting the opinion of the commercial marine in reference to the anchor, told him that he never chartered a ship without insisting that it should carry a Trotman, though, he added, that the captains were rather unwilling to use them, except on extreme occasions, on account of the difficulty of getting them up again. But that seemed to him to be the best character they could receive, as it showed that they held so tight it was not easy to draw them up. He was informed that every ship in the navy carried four bower anchors, and he would suggest that one of those should be a Trotman, and that at the end of six months all the captains should be asked to send in a report of the manner in which they worked.

L. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that in answer to the question of the hon. Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Stanley) he had to state that though he was not in possession of an official report of the Harbour-master of Holyhead Harbour as to the casualties which occurred in the gale there last October, yet he was able to confirm the hon. Gentleman's account of what took place on that occasion. There was no doubt that some casualties did occur among the vessels lying in the harbour on that occasion, yet none of them were caused by any defect of the harbour or by a heavy sea running in, but by the collisions of the vessels one with another. One vessel came in without an anchor, having lost it off Liverpool, and she ran foul of several others, and, as might be expected in a heavy gale, they drove athwart others, and they all drove on shore together. The proof that there was no heavy sea in the harbour was that the damage done to these vessels was generally very slight. The only serious damage done was to a yacht, which was run into by a steam-tug, and both went ashore together, and the yacht was considerably damaged. As for the Great Eastern, she never was under the shelter of the breakwater at all, for she lay all the time outside the harbour. She certainly was in a state of great danger at one time, not from any fault of the harbour, but from the fault of Trotman's anchor. It was thought desirable at one time of the gale to lift the anchor, in order to shift the vessel into a more sheltered berth. She steamed up to the anchor in order to lift it, but whether there was too much way on, or the anchor was not strong enough, he could not tell, but the fact remained that Trotman's anchor broke. The same thing happened the next day. The vessel again hove up to her anchor (also a Trotman's), and it again broke. He (the noble Lord) was very glad that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mildmay) had brought this question forward, because when it was stated that the Admiralty had some prejudice against the use of Trotman's anchors in the Royal Navy, it was right to point out that there was proof that Trotman's anchors could break like any other. He was not prepared to say that Trotman's was not a good anchor, because he had used it in his own yacht, and had found it do very well; but if he were asked, as commander of a large ship, whether he thought Trotman's acted well, he should distinctly say that, apart from its holding qualities, it was not the anchor he should recommend. Holding qualities were but a small part of the qualities required in an anchor; and Trotman's had a vice that was common to the whole family of what were called "tumbling fluke" anchors—namely, that there was a great difficulty in fishing them. He did not know whether the hon. Gentleman would understand what he meant; but when there was any considerable sea there was a great difficulty in applying the fish hook so as to catch the fluke of the anchor. With the common anchor they could catch either one side or the other; but with Trotman's the hook must go into a large ring bolt close to the shank; and it would be a very difficult operation with a heavy sea to effect that manœuvre. Still he was prepared to say that on that account anchor was not to be used. Mr. Trotman made application to the late Board of Admiralty, and the late Secretary to the Board replied that the Admiralty had no objection to a trial being made on board of two of Her Majesty's ships if anchors were supplied for the purpose; but Mr. Trotman by letter declined this offer, saying that nothing would satisfy him but a trial by other Committee. Now, if a Committee were on shore, or on the River Thames, to test the merits of anchors, it might be found, as it had been found by experiment, that anchors which best stood the test in all such experiments were, when brought into practical use at sea, inconvenient and insufficient for their purpose. As Mr. Trotman had got abroad that all Boards of Admiralty had combined against this unfortunate Mr. Trotman, but nothing of the kind was the case, for the Admiralty would be very glad if any captain would take his anchors, and it was to Mr. Trotman's interest to persuade some captain to take one of the anchors, because it was likely that a favourable report would proceed from such an officer than from one who had, against his will, a Trotman's anchor placed on board his ship. He had seen Captain Denman, and had asked him as to the different merits of the Trotman's anchor on board Her Majesty's yacht. He ascertained that the anchors of that vessel were seldom let go. The yacht was generally used in summer time, when the merits of anchors could not be fully tested, as the yacht generally lay at moorings. Captain Denman said that he thought Trotman's anchor, from what he saw of it, a good anchor, but there was the defect in "fishing." If that was the case in a vessel like the Victoria and Albert, how great would be the inconvenience in a heavy line-of-battle ship? It was because officers disliked these anchors that they were not used, and he for one, though he liked Trotman's anchors in a small vessel, should be sorry to have one in a line-of-battle ship. In one thing Mr. Trotman was deceiving the public—namely, in stating that his anchors were very much cheaper than the Admiralty anchors. Now, he took trouble to ascertain what was the cost of the anchor supplied to the Queen's yacht. It was an anchor of 47 cwt., and cost £119 13s. 6d. Mr. Trotman, in a letter he wrote to The Times, stated:—

Lord Clarence Paget

"I have further expressed my willingness to a competent Committee of their Lordships, but whose decision shall be final, a Trotman's anchor of 50 cwt., £90."

could lead the public to believe that anchors of 50 cwt could be supplied; but as the anchors on board the Albert of 47 cwt., cost £119, of an anchor of 50 cwt. would necessarily more, and amount to somewhere £125, instead of £90. The truth is Mr. Trotman's anchors were dearer than Admiralty anchors instead of being, and were disapproved by the officer of the fleet. Under these circumstances there was a question whether the Board of Admiralty, with whom lay the responsibility for the security of Her Majesty's ships, could be justified in ordering capstern ships to use a particular anchor of their own will.

Y.—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

for Committee read.

in Committee. Mr. MASSER in chair.

(In the Committee).

£1,009,778, Packet Service.

COGAN said, he wished to know the reason that the Vote for the contract in Galway and New York was taken from the items of this Vote. The reason which had been given was, that the contract had not yet commenced; but he had the increased Holyhead contract commenced, and yet the sum necessary for ten months at the higher rate was added. It was not dealing fairly with the companies, and, as a right hon. Member had given notice of his intention to divide the Committee on the Galway contract, he wished the Government to say why it was postponed.

LAING said, he wished to state the order in which the Votes would be taken would be, first the packet service, then the revenue departments—Customs, Excise, Revenue, and Post-office — and then the other civil Estimates, beginning with class one. With regard to the Galway contract, the reason it was not included in the Estimates was that at the time the Estimates were prepared and submitted to the House it had not come into operation. The vessels had not then been tendered for survey. A correspondence was going on between the department and the Admiralty as to whether the vessels would be ready by the time specified, and the subject was before a Select Committee, who had since reported, although that Report had not yet been printed and circulated. The case of Holyhead was very different. That contract was made a considerable time ago, in pursuance of the investigation of a Select Committee; the steamers were ready, and the only cause of delay was owing to some arrangement respecting the completion of the pier at Holyhead. With regard to the Galway contract, there was no alternative but to postpone it; and, so far from the Vote being prejudiced, it was obvious that if it had been inserted the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie) would have moved that it be struck out, and that a discussion would have been prematurely raised before the Report and evidence taken before the Select Committee were in the hands of hon. Members, and before it was finally ascertained that the company were ready to perform the service. Those who were most interested in the Vote were of opinion that the question would be more fully and fairly brought before the House by a supplemental Estimate rather than under that Vote.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to get from the Government an assurance that they were sincere in their intentions as to the Galway contract. If the Government acted fairly with the Irish Members they would, on the other hand, render the Government every assistance.

MR. LAING said, he would promise that an opportunity should be given to the House of fully discussing the question of the Galway contract, which would suffer no prejudice from not being introduced into the present Vote. It was impossible for the Government to give a positive pledge as to the course they would pursue in regard to the contract until they had considered the Report of the Select Committee, which had just been presented to the House, but had not yet been printed.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to know whether the Government held this contract to be binding, or whether they understood that question to be under the judgment of the Committee.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the vote for the packet service was one of the most important that could be brought before the House, especially as it was increasing yearly. According to an official report, the produce of this department of the postal service was only £400,000, so that the public were taxed to the amount of £600,000 in order to maintain it. He deemed that system both impolitic and unjust. Other countries which shared in the advantages of our postal service ought to contribute to its maintenance, and in the case of those which would not, either the postal facilities should be reduced or the charges should be raised. The making of these contracts involved not a little corrupt patronage; and he urged the House to adopt the recommendation of one of its Committees, and not allow any such contract to be made without its sanction. He wished to know why the cost of the conveyance of the mails by steam-vessels between Holyhead and Kingstown had been raised from £25,000 last year to £75,750 this year? There was also an extravagant charge of £4,000 for the mails between Southampton and the Channel Islands. The West India mails cost £238,000, a sum which was not warranted by the amount of our trade with that part of the world, and the amount for the mails to the Cape was £32,000, and the conveyance between Point de Galle and Melbourne was £180,000, though he was glad to say that the Government at Melbourne had agreed to pay a large part of this sum. The cost of the mails between this country and America was £175,000, but why could not our Government imitate the example of the United States Government, by which they had recently saved a large sum in the conveyance of mails? He should certainly have divided the Committee on some of the Votes if they had not represented bond fide contracts.

MR. H. A. HERBERT remarked that the increase in the cost of the Holyhead and Kingstown service had been recommended by a Select Committee. It was now proposed to vote £75,000 as an increased subsidy for ten months. When, however, the agreement was made with the Railway Company and the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company for this increased service the companies were promised an excellent pier in Holyhead Harbour. The companies had carried out their part of the agreement by the construction of magnificent vessels and by building new engines; but the third party, the Government, had never laid one single stone of the new pier, and consequently the service for which the Vote was proposed could not be carried out in so efficient a manner as would otherwise have been the case. If the present pier, with the alterations proposed, could be made as efficient as a new one, he would not be the advocate of an unnecessary expenditure. He would fore agree to the Vote upon the Government giving an assurance that if end of a short time the proposed arrangement should not be found satisfactory the original proposal would be carried out.

Mr. W. Williams

MR. COGAN said, he understood the pier at Holyhead would not be completed for two years. During that time the company would be carrying on service without being subject to penalty on account of the failure on the part of the Government to make the stipulations at Holyhead. He regretted that while the amount for the Holyhead service was proposed to be voted, the Galway contract packet Vote of £60,000 was excluded, although that service had been commenced on the faith of the Government, and that shareholders had expended nearly £500,000 upon the building of large vessels to carry out the mails. However, he thought it would be dangerous to break the public faith upon a commercial undertaking he agreed that the contracts ought in future always to have the first sanction of Parliament.

MR. BRADY said, he thought the people of Ireland would not have done to them if the Galway contract had not been carried out.

MR. DUNLOP said, he was glad to see so general an expression of opinion in favour of laying these contracts before Parliament prior to their ratification by the Executive, and he should shortly propose a Resolution to the House in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee. The present contract expenditure amounted to between £600,000 and £700,000. It was not under the sanction of the House of Commons, and the Committee were satisfied that the service might be far more cheaply performed. In the instance of Belfast the mails were carried gratuitously, and he thought it possible in other cases to make similar arrangements, as many companies were willing to carry the mails for the honour of the service, vessels being called mail-steamers. Without entering into the merits of the contract, he would merely observe that the Report of the Committee which was required into that matter not having yet circulated, it was impossible for the Government to come to any decision. He hoped that soon they would be in a position to do so.

MR. CHILDERS said, he knew nothing of the recent disclosures as to the contract, but hoped that the question could not be prejudiced by the mere fact of the contract being excluded from this vote. It was a matter of great magnitude and importance, which he hoped could be seriously considered when the whole question of packet companies could be brought before the House. There was the recommendation of the Committee which he could not agree with. The Committee suggested that with respect to fresh contracts of this character the Government could accept some tender, but that the contract should not be binding until laid for a month before that House. He conceived that such an arrangement would be transferring from the Government to the House one of its most important functions. He thought it would be better, when the engagement was to extend over several years, that the Government should come to that House with a Resolution approving the service to be embodied in an Act of Parliament, and that the contract should be subsequently taken by the Treasury in the usual way. Such a course was adopted in other countries possessing representative institutions, and might well be adopted here. He wished for an explanation of one or two points from the hon. Secretary of the Treasury. He observed that in some instances where Estimates were framed of particular services there was a vote that provision was otherwise made for those services; but the contributions which could cover part of the expense of the service would not be received until after the close of the year, and therefore no deduction was made on account of those contributions. That was a very inconvenient and not a very rational course of proceeding. In other parts of the Estimates this principle was entirely overlooked, as indeed it was with respect to some of the services in this very Vote. But as to whether the deductions were large and not allowed for. In one instance, the deduction that should be made was £67,000, and in another instance £24,000, making a total of £91,000, which was a considerable sum out of £1,004,000. He also wished to know whether the Government had considered the expediency of taking steps to reduce the rates for the conveyance of mails to those of our possessions which were able to bear a portion of the cost. In some cases, such as Canada, India, Australia and Mauritius, those colonies did defray a portion of the cost, and he could not understand why the Cape and the West Indies could not do the same. He would also call attention to some of the arrangements for postal service between this country and our possessions beyond the Isthmus of Suez. Three or four years ago Lord Canning, then Postmaster General, made an excellent arrangement by which there was to be a fixed and uniform rate to all our Colonies, for letters of a certain weight, and another for newspapers. That arrangement worked well, and foreign countries and distant colonies adopted the plan; but lately there had been a change of policy at the Post Office, and a system had commenced under which in different ways impediments were placed in the way of the transmission of newspapers abroad. For instance, suddenly, and without notice, the rate of postage was doubled for newspapers across the Isthmus of Suez. When this was objected to, in justification of the course taken by the Post Office it was stated that since the completion of the railway, the charge on the public for crossing the Isthmus had been increased. He had moved for a return on this subject, from which it appeared that, instead of an increase there had been really a decrease in the charge to the extent of £20,000 a year; and he hoped that the conduct of the subordinates at the Post Office in putting forward this plea would be noticed by the Treasury; and that the additional tax would be taken off. It had been removed as to the Australian mails, on condition of the Colonies paying an equivalent; but even this, although unjust, had not been done for the India and China mails.

COLONEL SYKES said, he thought that by better arrangements a considerable reduction might be effected in the amount charged for the conveyance of mails between an English port and any foreign country with which an active and a permanent trade was carried on.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, it required a considerable number of men to man those packets, and it should be made a sine qua non that the whole of the men on board the packets should be reserved seamen, for they could always be found in the event of a war. A naval officer should be attached to the Post Office to see that these packets were properly manned. He did not think there would be any objection on the part of the contractors to consent to a plan for that purpose.

MR. JACKSON observed that the crews of those packet-ships would always be available for the country in case of any emergency; but he protested against any such interference on the part of the Government with the ships as the hon. and gallant Gentleman had suggested.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE asked whether the Treasury had made any arrangement as to the future mode of entering into these packet contracts. Much evidence had been laid before the Committee last Session of the irregular course pursued by the public departments on this point. One striking fact was that no contract after it had once been entered into had ever terminated; they all seemed to prove a perpetual monopoly in the hands of those who originally got the grant. Now, that was not a proper state of things. It might be true that the original contractors were, on the whole, able to perform the work most efficiently and economically. But he was confident that there were occasions when these contracts should be thrown open again to public competition; and he thought the House was fairly entitled to expect the Government to give an undertaking that some fresh arrangement would be made for the future. The question was one involving the expenditure of more than a million a year, and after the mismanagement and abuses which the Committee had exposed the House ought to insist on a change in the system.

MR. LAING said, he entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman as to the unsatisfactory mode in which these contracts had been entered into in many cases in past times. The system of subsidies had frequently been carried further than was right, and he admitted that when Colonies were in a position to contribute a share of the cost of conveying the mails, as Australia was now doing, they should be called upon for a contribution. In the appendix to the first Report of the Committee there was a Treasury Minute showing that the subjects of these contracts had been fully considered, but as to the mode in which formal effect would be given to the conclusion of the Committee, the best plan would be by the adoption of the formal Resolutions which the Chairman of the Committee (Mr. Dunlop) intended, he believed, to bring before the House. He hoped that such Resolutions, giving effect to the unanimous opinions of the Committee on this point, would be submitted, for they would be found the most efficient remedy for the abuses which had prevailed. Entire publicity should be given to these transactions before they were finally concluded by the Government. The general question of contracts should not at all be prejudiced by taking a Vote, and in the expectation that the whole subject would be brought before the House he thought it better not to pursue the general question further.

Mr. Jackson

With regard to the question of the Naval Reserve, there was no doubt that most of the contract packet companies were manned by a superior class of men, but in the case of some of them it was obviously impossible that the men could have time for training. With the large companies, where long voyages were made, the vessels remained some time in port, and in course the men would have more opportunities. He was glad to say that the insular and Oriental and the Royal Steampacket Companies had shown liberality, and had given every facility inducing their men to join the Reserve.

With regard to the postage of newspapers to the Colonies, he quite agreed that every facility should be given for the transmission at as low an expense as possible, to cover the prime cost of conveyance, beyond that he did not think it the duty of the Government to go. The complaint from Australia had instantly been met by a remission of the additional penny, as yet he had received no representation with regard to India and China. If representations were made, they would meet with the least and fairest consideration. No doubt the account would look better if the postage paid by the Colonies for the transmission of the mails appeared on the face of the bill, but, as all the payments had to be made within in the year in this country, it was necessary to take a Vote for the year, otherwise there would be no authority to make the requisite payment. The contributions of the Colonies were paid in by the Exchequer, and went to swell the account.

As to the Holyhead Pier, he could not say to the House that there was no intention on the part of the Government to depart from their obligation to construct such a pier, but experience might show to be requisite for the convenience of the Irish service. Delays had occurred in carrying out the original plan. A short time ago representations were made by the City of London and the Steampacket Company that the most convenient arrangement would be to alter the present pier, so as to make it a complete permanent structure, while the railway company were in favour of the original plan. Under these circumstances, it had been thought desirable to have a short experience of the actual working, and by next summer the Government would be in position to see how the money could be spent with the greatest advantage.

MR. MONSELL observed that the explanation of the hon. Gentleman was not satisfactory. An additional expense of some £50,000 was to be incurred for the improvement of the Irish service, and it was very doubtful whether all the advantages which the House contemplated in voting that sum would be gained. All the other parties had performed their parts of the contract, but the Government had neglected to carry out theirs. About half an hour would be lost of the hour and a half which the House had calculated on gaining when it consented to this additional expenditure.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he was not satisfied with what the hon. Gentleman had said about the Galway contract. The Irish Members were not content with the statement that that contract should not be prejudiced. What they wanted was to know accurately and definitely in what light the Government viewed the contract, for the hon. Gentleman had given no satisfactory information on the point. He should like to hear him say in so many words whether the contractors performed their part and the Government would consider themselves bound by the contract. A very large proportion of the postage to America came from Ireland. He did not see, when contracts were made for packet service with other countries, the justice of always exempting Ireland. He wished, therefore, to know whether the principle, fairly and honestly adopted by the late Government, of making contracts for Irish service, was to be carried out.

MR. LAING said, that the only answer which he could give to the question of the hon. and gallant Member on the subject of the Galway contract was a very simple and distinct one. A Select Committee had been appointed by the House to report on the contract. Its Report was not yet printed and distributed, so as to be in the hands of the Government and of Members of the House, and until it was it would be impossible for the Government to indicate what course they would take. If any hon. Gentleman persisted in construing that into an adverse opinion on the part of the Government with respect to the Galway contract, he (Mr. Laing) must only say that such hon. Member was, in his opinion, prejudicing his own case very much.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE observed that the large Vote now under consideration did not represent so much money out of pocket, for a deduction must be made for the postage received and the amount paid by the Colonies. With respect to the Galway vote, there could be no doubt that the contract was made by the late Government in a perfectly legitimate and proper manner. He believed that the service had actually commenced, and that the Company would now be entitled to their money. There was no absolute necessity, however, that the Vote for the money should be taken immediately, and it would be inconvenient to take the Vote now, as the Report of the Select Committee would be circulated in a few days. He entertained no apprehension that the circumstances brought out in the Report would prejudice the parties to that contract, or interfere with the subsidy, but it was proper that the subject should be discussed, and he wished to understand that an opportunity would be given as early as possible, after the Report was in the hands of Members, for a full discussion, which was due not only to the public interest, but to private interests also.

MR. BUTT said, he was entitled to ask the Government to say distinctly whether they were determined to ask for the £60,000, in accordance with the Vote in the Estimates, on the condition of the Galway contractors beginning to fulfil their contract not later than the month of June, 1860?

MR. LYGON said, he noticed an increase of £600 in the Vote for the Dover contract, which was said to be on account of a Sunday service, and he desired to know on whose recommendation that increase had been made.

MR. LAING said, that the increase of £600 in the Vote for Dover arose out of new trips for Sundays between Calais and Dover, which were rendered necessary in consequence of arrangements for considerably accelerating the mails between London and Paris. With regard to the Galway contract, he wished to explain that the Committee on Mail Contracts, who on a previous occasion declined to recommend the suspension of that contract, had been again called together by the Chairman. They went into a further investigation and made a Report, which was laid on the table, but was not yet printed and circulated. Under these circumstances it was impossible for him at present to give a pledge that the Galway Vote would be brought forward and supported as a Government measure. At that moment it was not possible for him to give any positive undertaking, but at the earliest moment after the Report had been printed and circulated which the state of public business would admit, the Government would consider the subject, and would make up their minds, and a full and fair opportunity would be given to the House of considering this question.

LORD JOHN BROWNE asked whether the first packet had actually sailed in fulfilment of the terms of the contract?

MR. LAING said, he was informed by a telegram received that day that she had done so.

LORD LOVAINE said, he would congratulate the Committee on the official recognition which had at last been given to the contract by a Member of the Government. The system of manning packet vessels by the naval reserves would not be very favourably received. The competition was quite sufficient to ensure a good supply of able seamen.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY complained of the unbusiness-like way in which these packet contracts were managed. He agreed with the right hon. Member for Kilmar-nock (Mr. Bouverie) that, instead of being renewed, the contracts should be allowed to come to an end, and that all of them should be put up to public competition. In that case he believed the charge would soon be reduced.

MR. BEAMISH said, he hoped the Committee, before it voted so large an amount, would receive from the hon. Secretary to the Treasury some more distinct and satisfactory assurance than had yet been given, that whatever might be the tenor of the Report of the Committee the Government would in no way interpose to prevent the fulfilment of the Galway contract, providing the parties were capable of carrying it into execution. The remarks of the hon. Gentleman rather conveyed the impression of a foregone conclusion; but he trusted the English Members would not be led into committing an act of injustice towards innocent parties who had become shareholders in the company on the faith of its receiving the subsidy from Government. Unless the pier at Holyhead were completed it would put out of the power of the public to force penalties against the steamship companies if they failed in their part of the undertaking.

Mr. Laing

MR. CLAY said, he thought that Gentlemen interested in the Galway contract were only manifesting their apprehensions by endeavouring to elicit a pledge from the House a pledge that would not be guided by, or even wait for, the Report of the Committee to whom the subject had been specially referred.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he was of opinion that upon every principle of justice the Galway contract ought to be made subject to public competition; but that that was not the time for discussing the question, as no satisfactory conclusion could be arrived at in the absence of the Report of the Committee. Putting contracts up to competition was not always the soundest manner of proceeding, for very often it happened that it resulted in one or two great companies getting the contract simply from the fact that there was no one to compete with them. He believed that where there were many competing elements, the putting of contracts to public competition was sound, and he looked forward to the time when the postal communication with America could be put up to public competition, but that was not the case with regard to the conveyance of mails between this country and other places, especially the East; and he might mention the fact that an attempt was made to throw the conveyance of mails between this country and the Red Sea open to public competition, but after numerous attempts it fell, and passed into the hands of the Peninsular and Oriental Company.

MR. BUTT said, he must again ask for a distinct assurance that, unless the circumstances which had occurred since the 11th of June were such as to justify the Government in retracting their previous proposal, the Galway contract would be brought forward in the Estimates with the full weight of Government influence.

MR. LAING repeated that the circumstances to which he alluded were the assembling of the Committee consequent upon the receipt of fresh information, and the furnishing of a fresh Report, which had been laid on the table of the House, which had not yet been printed.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE asked, whether any understanding had been come to with Mr. Churchward about the extra service

MR. LAING replied, that Mr. Churchward was entitled to payment by the piece for the extra services which he performed for the Post Office. It was found that this came as nearly as possible to £2,500 a year, and it had been thought more convenient, both for the Post Office and the contractor, that a fixed sum should be paid as long as the contract lasted. But it was distinctly understood on both sides that this in no way altered the period at which the contract was to expire, which, according to the view of the Treasury, was in the year 1863.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN asked when the new pier at Holyhead would be completed, and whether the plans had been submitted to the railway and steamboat companies?

MR. LAING said, the plan of the temporary pier had been first suggested by the Dublin Steampacket Company, and approved by the railway company.

MR. LIGON said, that so far from the sum of £2,500 being the amount at which the extra services would be charged if paid for by the job, the fact was that it would cost £3,400. There was a sum of about £900 estimated as the expense of a small steamer running to Calais, which was a matter of dispute between the Post Office and Mr. Churchward, and that was the way in which the sum of £3,400 was made up. Mr. Churchward had commuted the whole of the bond fide extra services for £2,500 a year, on the faith of the extension of the contract.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to understand whether the Treasury had, on the one hand, taken advantage of the arrangement made by the late Government with Mr. Churchward to give a certain commuted sum of £2,500 as for extraordinary services, and, on the other, did not allow Mr. Churchward the advantage of an extension of his contract. The late Government thought it desirable to settle Mr. Churchward's claim by a commuted sum, which he had agreed to take in consideration of the extension of his contract. That was the bargain. If both parts of it stood it was a right and good bargain, for the advantage of the country and Mr. Churchward also; but if the Government took one half and not the other, he did not know what to think of it.

LORD LOVAINE said, he could not allow such a statement as that of the hon. Under Secretary to pass uncontradicted. The whole matter was very carefully inquired into, legal opinions were taken, and it was found that Mr. Churchward was entitled to the full amount of £3,400; and that not a farthing could be deducted for the steamer alluded to. There was no stipulation whatever about such a steamer in the contract, and, in point of fact, it was, as had been stated, a commutation of a claim on the faith of the extension of the contract.

MR. LAING said, that the arrangement made by the Post Office with Mr. Churchward was the alternative one either to pay him by the job or at a commuted rate; and, without any pressure being brought to bear upon him, he elected to take the commuted rate. The employment of the small steamer had been dispensed with.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he was sorry to trouble the House again about the Holyhead pier, but as they were now in summer weather—he meant the period when summer might be expected—and in six months the winter would come, when it was most important that there should be good accommodation for the mail packets, he thought it was hardly fair that the Government should be so strict with the steam packet contractors while they neglected to complete the necessary arrangements for the landing and embark- ing of the mails.

MR. M'CANN said, it was absurd to call it a pier at Holyhead. It was impossible to run large vessels along side of it in any weather.

MR. CORRY said, he wished to know whether the pier arrangement at Holyhead was a temporary one; if so, it was a very good one, but if it was intended to be permanent it was a bad one. There must be a permanent stone pier.

MR. LAING said, the present structure was merely temporary, until it could be decided where it would be most advantageous to construct a permanent pier. He hoped it would be ready by the 1st of August.

LORD DUNKELLIN inquired when the Estimate for Galway would be brought forward.

MR. LAING said, he could not in the present state of public business name a night, but ample notice would be given on the subject.

Vote agreed to, as were also,

(2.) £855,200 Customs' Department.

(3.) £1,490,813 Inland Revenue Department.

COLONEL DUNNE asked for an explanation of the sum of £14,000 for the services of the Irish constabulary.

MR. LAING said, that that sum had been set down in the Estimate in consequence of the transfer to them of the duties of the late revenue police.

MR. STEUART said, that with reference to the reduction in the expenses of the Customs department promised by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his financial statement, he wished to ask why that reduction had not been carried into effect.

MR. LAING said, it was manifest it must take some time to carry the proposed reduction into effect. In the Customs' department the consolidation consequent upon the simplification of the tariff had as yet been put into operation only in the port of London, where a reduction in the establishment of 276 persons and a saving, consequent on the proposal of his right hon. Friend, of £48,471 a year might be expected. The Committee might rest assured that so far as the Government were concerned they would be prepared to give the country the benefit of any saving which might be accomplished in the working of the department.

MR. HANKEY said, that it was not wise to effect savings in the Custom-house at the expense of the merchants who had to do business there. He understood that the reductions already made had rendered necessary the employment of 300 or 400 additional clerks in Mincing-lane.

LORD LOVAINE said, he thought that the Committee ought to have some further explanation as to how this saving was to be effected.

Vote agreed to.

(4). £2,108,581, Post Office.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE asked whether it was intended to appoint any one to replace the Earl of Elgin as Postmaster General, or whether that noble Earl was to continue to draw the salary of that office?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that since the departure of the Earl of Elgin from this country the Duke of Argyll had held the office of Postmaster General and had received its salary. If the Earl of Elgin proceeded to China some other arrangement must be adopted, and a permanent successor to him must be appointed.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether the Duke of Argyll had vacated the office of Lord Privy Seal?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS replied that the noble Duke filled both offices, but received only the salary of the Postmaster General.

Colonel Dunne

Vote agreed to; as was also (5) £ Superannuations.

House resumed; Resolutions reported on Monday next; Committee again on Monday next.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, &c.

LAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1, 2, and 3, agreed to.

Clause 4, (Repeal of Provisions and 3 of first-recited Act with reference to Salaries of Registrar General and tary).

MR. DUNLOP said, he wished to strike out the word "hereafter" from the Bill.

MR. DALGLISH moved that the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question put, whether the Chairman do now report Progress.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 68.

Amendment made, Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 (Provision as to Registers).

Clause postponed.

Clauses 7 to 16 agreed to.

Clause 17 (As to Remuneration of Registrar).

SIR JAMES FERGUSON moved for the omission of the clause.

Motion made, and Question put, whether Clause 17, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 17.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill. Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed. Bill reported, as amended, to be considered on Thursday next, and printed. [Bill 216].

House adjourned at Two till Monday.

HOUSE OF LORDS

Monday, July 2, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Municipal Corporations (Ireland) Act Amendment.
2nd Inland Bonding; Criminal Lunatic Asylums.
3rd Councillors of Burghs and Burgesses (Scotland).

EDUCATION (INDIA).—EXCLUSION OF THE BIBLE FROM GOVERNMENT SCHOOLS.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, his noble Friend (the Duke of MARLBOROUGH) had placed upon the paper a Motion—

That the British Government in India, as the representative of a Christian Nation, is charged the Duty of promoting the Moral as well as Social Welfare of the People of that Country; and that, in order effectually to further such objects, it is the Opinion of this House that the authoritative Exclusion of the Word of God from the Course of Education afforded in the Government Colleges and Schools ought, under suitable arrangements, to be removed; and humbly to press Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to give Directions for carrying the above into effect—

He now rose to appeal to his noble Friend to postpone that Motion. He entirely concurred in the principle and in the details of the Resolution, and it was his private belief that it could be carried into effect in India with perfect safety and to great advantage. At the same time he was satisfied that the present was a most inexpedient moment for discussing it, and he said that upon the authority of persons who were perfectly acquainted with India, and were well-affected towards the effect of the Motion, and most sincerely anxious of carrying it into effect. He himself desired as ardently as the noble Duke himself to see it carried out, but owing to the peculiar circumstances of India at the present moment, and the unsettled state of men's minds in that country, a discussion of such a question would be most inexpedient, and fraught with no little hazard to our Indian Empire. He, therefore, requested his noble Friend, in the interests of Christianity, in the interests of India, and in the interests of the question itself, to postpone its consideration for the present.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH begged to add his opinion to that of the noble Earl who had just spoken as to the inconvenient and possibly the dangerous consequences of entering upon a discussion of this question at the present time, and urged upon the noble Duke, as he valued the peace of India, not to press his Resolution for discussion. From all he had heard, from all he had read of, and from all the consideration he had been able to give to the state of India at this moment, he felt himself warranted in saying that it was most critical, and that it would be most impolitic in every way, at such a time, to bring on a debate upon a subject which, perhaps, more than any other, touched our relations with the people of that country.

LORD HARRIS, speaking as one who had some experience of India and the state of public feeling in that country, begged to unite in the request which had been made to the noble Duke not to bring on the Question.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, he had to present 199 petitions from places in England, 206 from places in Scotland, 14 from places in Ireland, and 8 from different bodies in the Metropolis, all praying the House to give effect to the Motion of which he had given notice,

"That the authoritative exclusion of the Word of God from the course of education afforded in the Government colleges and schools ought, under suitable arrangements, to be removed."

He need scarcely say that after the appeals—the strong appeals—which had been made to him from three Members of their Lordships' House, two of them possessing local and practical experience of India, he felt deeply the responsibility attaching to him from the course which he nevertheless felt it to be necessary to pursue. He could truly say that it was not without deep and serious reflection that he took the course which he now felt called on to adopt.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the Order of the Day for the noble Duke's Motion had not yet been read. He thought that the noble Duke was only about to give an answer to the Question which had been put to him, and to present his petitions. He would now beg to add his assurances to the noble Duke that there were the best possible reasons for believing it most inexpedient that any discussion should take place at that moment on the subject of his Motion.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that perhaps he should have no more weight with the noble Duke than other Peers in the expression of an opinion on the expediency or propriety of bringing forward his Motion; but he could not help saying that he was satisfied that the subject was one which required the utmost delicacy of treatment, and that the discussion of it now was more likely to do injury to the cause which the noble Duke had sincerely and warmly at heart than to gain any advantage for it. He had pressed this view upon the noble Duke in private, and he was afraid that he should not be more successful in this appeal to him in public.

LORD BROUGHAM also joined in the appeal for postponement; and intimated that, if the noble Duke persisted in bringing forward the Motion, he should, without entering into any debate, meet it by the Previous Question.

The Order of the Day having been read:—

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH said, that a more painful or a more embarrassing position than that in which he was placed, could hardly be imagined. The notice of his Motion had been on the paper ever since Easter. If the discussion of the subject were so inexpedient, and likely to prove so dangerous, or to embroil matters in India, surely it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to have informed him of their opinion at an earlier period, when he should have had time to consider the suggestion, and to give their reasons their due weight and influence. But this they had not done. He had presented more than 400 petitions to-night; he believed that altogether 1,500 petitions had been presented on the subject; and the expectations of great numbers had been raised with regard to the Motion of which he had given notice. And now, at the last moment, he was asked to postpone it. He could only respectfully assure their Lordships that it gave him annoyance—great annoyance—not to be able to comply with the request which had been made to him from so many quarters. He had heard no reasons given why the Motion should not be brought forward. The noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) indeed said he thought the time was not expedient, and requested him to delay its consideration; and a letter from the noble Earl to that effect had been sent to him ten days ago; but beyond this he had received no intimation on the subject from either side of the House as to what views were entertained with regard to it, and what the considerations were on which the opinion was founded, that a discussion of his Motion would be prejudicial. He felt, therefore, reluctantly compelled to proceed. He would endeavour to deal with it in the most temperate manner; he would endeavour to avoid giving offence, even to the most scrupulous; and he could scarcely think that the removal of the restrictions on the use of the Word of God, could be otherwise than blessed by Him whose written will was thus recognized. One reason for a Motion, such as as he had put on paper, should be submitted to the House was, that the late mutiny had given to the consideration of that great empire a deeper interest to the people of this country. If there was one thing more than another to which the people of this country were devoted, it was the most perfect, ample toleration; but there was a principle to which they were equally attached, and that was a devotion to the God, and a determination that it should not remain a closed Book to those who were just become our fellow-subjects, an opportunity should be afforded of reading it. So far back as 1793 the British Parliament laid down the principle upon which the Government of India should be conducted. In 1793 the House of Commons laid down this principle:—

The Earl of Derby

“That it is the opinion of this House that it is the peculiar and bounden duty of the Legislature to promote, by all just and prudent measures, the interest and happiness of the inhabitants of the British dominions in the East; and that such measures ought to be adopted which gradually tend to their advancement in knowledge, and to their religious and moral improvement.”

That principle was confirmed by a Resolution of the House of Commons in 1813. Since then, however, we have gone backwards rather than forwards. I am prepared to show that the policy which we had professed of establishing religious toleration, and at the same time of promoting measures for the moral and religious improvement of the Natives, had not been carried out. He was aware that an error had been made in some quarters to the effect that the Natives were not really excluded from the Government schools of India; but he could prove that such was actually the case at this time. The despatch which chiefly bore on the subject was that which Sir Charles Wood wrote in 1854. The instructions which Sir Charles forwarded to the Government of India were as follows:—

“Those institutions were founded for the benefit of the whole population of India; and, in effect their object, it was, and is, undeviatingly that the education conveyed in them should be exclusively secular. The Bible is, we understand, placed in the libraries of the colleges and the pupils are able freely to consult it, as it should be; and, moreover, we have no desire to prevent or to discourage any exertions which the pupils may, of their own free on their masters upon the subject of the Christian religion; provided that such information be given out of school hours."

In 1858 Lord Stanley, the then Secretary of State for India, in his Despatch on education, pursued the same strain. In that paper, Lord Stanley expressed his conviction that the proposal to depart from the system which had been established, would be dangerous in a political point of view, and that the past policy ought to be adhered to. In order to illustrate the nature of what went by the name of the "past" policy, he must refer their Lordships to one Lord Tweeddale's Minutes in 1846. In that year a proposal was made to Lord Tweeddale by the Madras Council of Education, to promote the establishment of voluntary classes for giving Scripture instruction in the colleges and schools of that Presidency. Lord Tweeddale, in his reply, said:—

"To avoid all difficulties on this head, I would propose that there should be invariably two classes of English reading; the one with and the other without the Bible, the latter class to precede the former in their hour of instruction; and those intended should have the advantage of attending both classes, and in a very short time, I have no doubt, all would belong to the Bible class."

The Court of Directors at home refused to affirm that Minute when it was transmitted to them, and declared that they would not regard it as expedient or prudent to introduce any branches of study into the schools of India, which could in any way interfere with the religious feelings or opinions of the Native population. They further said that the past policy—whatever it was, and that was an example of it—must be adhered to. Now, it could not be gainsaid that under both the past and the present system, the Bible was excluded from the schools of India. That, then, was a sample of the "past policy" of the Government; and he contended that the exclusion of the Scriptures from the government schools was a real and substantial fact, and one which could not be, with any show of truth, denied. The education conveyed in the Government schools in India was essentially secular; and the teachers did not feel themselves at liberty to form classes for the religious instruction of the Natives. It was said, however, that they had professed "neutrality" as the basis of our Government, and that such a course was indispensable. He wished, however, to impress on their Lordships the impossibility of maintaining the neutrality in that sense on which that course of action was founded. The British colonists settled in India had been constantly increasing in numbers; they carried with them to India British habits and feelings, all which habits and feelings had relation to Christian doctrine and European sentiments. The very existence of a European and Christian Government such as ours in a country like India—of a Christian nation being brought into contact with an idolatrous nation—carried with it correlatives and consequences which rendered that neutrality impossible in practice, however desirable it might appear in theory. He asserted that it was impossible to maintain that neutrality, even in the case of a purely secular education. For many years back the system of education supported by the Government in India had been approaching nearer and nearer to the European model. Between 1813 and 1835 Oriental teaching had been the order of the day. The result of that system had been a marked failure. In spite of every effort of the Government, including the payment of stipends to the pupils who attended school, the Natives would not avail themselves of the education offered them; but in 1835 Lord William Bentinck published a Minute, declaring that education in schools was no longer to be of an Oriental character, but that English and an English system should thenceforward be substituted for it. That was a step in advance, the effect of which, as well as of subsequent measures, he would advert to later; but even before this, what had been the effect of the old system, bad as it had been? It was described by the managers of the Delhi College in 1829 in the following terms:—

"It having come to the knowledge of the managers that a belief prevails very generally that the students of the Hindoo College are liable to lose all religious principles whatever, it was resolved that Mr. D'Anselme be requested, in communication with the teachers, to check as far as possible all disquisitions tending to unsettle the belief of the boys in the great principles of national religion."

Proceeding onwards, in 1848 Mr. Thomason's plan for the promotion of vernacular education was adopted in eight districts of the North-Western Provinces with a large measure of success. The schools increased in these districts from 2,014 schools in 1850 to 3,459 in 1852-3, while the scholars increased from 17,159 to 36,864. In 1854 a still greater change took place in the Government system of education. In 1857 a Minute was issued by Sir Charles Wood, from which he would quote the following passage :—

" Before proceeding further we must emphatically declare that the education which we desire to see extended in India, is that which has for its object the diffusion of the improved arts, science, philosophy, and literature of Europe—in short, European knowledge. To attain this end it is necessary, for the reasons we have given above, that they (the Natives of India) should be made familiar with the works of European authors, and with the results of the thought and labour of Europeans on the subjects of every description upon which knowledge is to be imparted to them ; and to extend the means of imparting this knowledge must be the object of any general system of education."

It thus appeared that the system of education we were now endeavouring to apply to India was based essentially upon a European model, and was calculated to ensure that the Natives should become acquainted with every branch of European science, philosophy, and arts. But now, in order to judge of the effect of such a system, their Lordships must remember the nature of the religion which prevailed in India. Their Lordships must understand what were the systems of that religion, founded, not only on false doctrine, but also on false science, before they could appreciate the results of such a mode of education. If their Lordships would refer to the description of the Brahmin religion given in the recent able work of Sir Emerson Tennent, they would find that it was not only a false religion, but was so mixed up with errors in science that as soon as European knowledge, intellect, and true science were brought to bear upon it the foundation upon which it rested was utterly destroyed. Unless, therefore, the religion of the student educated in the secular schools, and thus constantly and systematically undermined, were replaced by something nobler and purer, he was left a man without a creed, and without a faith; it was true there might be left to him some abstract notion of a Divine Being, but for every purpose of religion he would not be a whit better than he had been before, a shallow, hollow Deist. And yet this system of education was adopted by the Government of the present day on the expressed basis of its neutrality. Now with regard to the effect produced under the present system, he would quote a few instances. In 1852 a Committee of their Lordships' House took a variety of evidence on this subject, much of which was deserving of attention. A Hindoo father

The Duke of Marlborough

writing to a newspaper expresses his views as follows :—

" I sent my son to the Hindoo College to learn English, and when he had risen to the fourth year I thought he had made some progress in English knowledge ; I therefore forbade his going to college, for I have heard that the students in the higher classes of the college become Nautika (debauched)."

An intelligent writer of The Calcutta Review, commenting upon the Government system of education, says :—

" The educated Native of the present day, with very few exceptions, vegetates without faith or object ; he is either a hypocrite or a latitudinarian, and has, for a time at least, subsided into a dull, tame, discouraging mediocrity. Nevertheless it remains a notorious and ominous fact that the majority of these young men, solidly and thoroughly educated in all secular knowledge, show no patriotism or public spirit, no hatred of idolatry, no anxiety to rescue their fellow-countrymen from its yoke, no lofty moral bearing, no great aims or aspirations, no seriousness of character, no earnest inquiry after religious truth, or thoughtful, earnest inquiry after religious truth. In the flush and ardour of youth, the great majority kill the conscience by outward conformity with the idolatry which they despise, or by neglecting themselves over deliberately to worldliness. There is nothing of healthy life connected with their intellectual activity. . . . The greater body, the more lute and worldly, are but too surely tending to a state morally lower than that from which education rescued them. The Hindoo idolator, under conviction, may have faith, zeal, and honesty ; he may be thoroughly conscientious and ready to lay down life and limb, and to sacrifice all that he holds most dear, from a fervent, though misguided, devotion. But the mongrel class, of whom I now write, too timid to break off from what they despise and disbelieve, will live the subtle, lifeless life of the Greek of the lower Empire, without courage or conscience, and hide—beneath a mask of piety—the heart of the Atheist under the mask of the idolator."

He would only trouble their Lordships with the testimony of one more witness, a Hindoo gentleman, himself then a master of the Delhi College, who thus described what was the effect of the Government secular system of education on himself and some of his companions had been. Speaking of the disbeliever in idolatry arising from their education, he says :—

" The result of this was, that many of our countrymen, the Hindoos, condemned us as infidels, but as we did not advocate Christianity, but only recommended a kind of deism, and never lost our caste publicly by eating and drinking, all our free discussions did not much offend our Hindoo friends. . . . When in public meetings our friends taunted us by saying, ' you will become Christians as such and such a person has become,' then we considered this as an insult and stated in reply that the person it referred to had not received an English education."

This gentleman, it would be seen, was that time converted to Christianity, though he abstained from the idolatrous practices of his country. This gentleman afterwards gave, in the preface to a work Mathematica published by the East India Company in recognition of the merits of its author, some passages in the history of his conversion to Christianity—and he begged their Lordships to remember that in this history they had the testimony of one who had gone through all the phases of mind which a convert from Hindooism might be expected to undergo. He said:—

"It was then my conscientious belief that educated Englishmen were too much enlightened to believe in any bookish religion, except that of reason and conscience, or Deism. After I had finished my mathematical work, and before I went on to Calcutta on leave, I had become a believer in the Gospel. Before this belief had taken possession of my heart, there were two erroneous notions in my head (and which I believe must ever be in the heads of nearly all Native youths educated in Government colleges and schools, as long as the system of instruction continues to be framed as it is till now). The first of these notions was, that the English themselves did not believe in Christianity, because they did not, as a Government, exert themselves to teach it. The second was that a person who believed in one God was in need of no other religion."

He had thus endeavoured to show to their Lordships from the best testimony that was producible that the Government system of education in India could not be carried on on the ground in which it was professedly conducted—that it did interfere with the religion of the Native population, and shake the foundations of what they had been taught; that it taught them to despise the religion of their fathers, and by a natural position to despise their fathers themselves; and that, while no other system of religion was communicated to them, they were left in a state of practical infidelity, and tossed up and down as it were on a tempestuous ocean of unbelief. It was, however, argued that we could adopt no other system than this, because to do so would be contrary to the pledges, promises, and proclamations, which we had at different times issued to the Native population of India. Now, if the Government had ever issued a proclamation or given a pledge to the effect that the reading of the Bible should not be allowed in the schools of India, such a proclamation or pledge would have been a disgrace to this country. But no such proclamation had ever been issued. What were the pledges and promises actually given to the Natives of India? He would, in the first place, remind their Lordships of the gracious Proclamation which proceeded from Her Majesty on assuming the sovereignty of India. The words of that Proclamation were such as every Native of India might safely rest upon as guaranteeing to him the free exercise of his religion. It said:—

"Sincerely relying ourselves on the truth of Christianity and acknowledging with gratitude the solace of religion, we disclaim alike the right and the desire to impose our convictions on any of our subjects; we declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure that none be in any wise favoured, none molested or disquieted by reason of their religious faith or observances, but that all shall alike enjoy the equal and impartial protection of the law, and we do strictly charge and enjoin all those who may be in authority under us that they abstain from all interference with the religious belief or worship of any of our subjects on pain of our highest displeasure."

And he said so too. And in this sense of the most extended toleration he endorsed every word of the Royal Proclamation. That Proclamation was alike based on justice as well as on the principles of toleration as understood in this country; and he believed that by passing the Resolution which he now proposed not one word of it would be infringed. In 1801, the people of the Carnatic were informed by a Proclamation of Lord Wellesley that the authority of the Government would be exerted to procure for all the enjoyment of their just civil rights and "the free exercise of the religious institutions and domestic usages of their ancestors." And another Proclamation had been issued to the same effect by Lord Dalhousie on the annexation of the Punjab. The Natives of India might well look back upon the past, and ask how we had carried out the terms of those Proclamations. He would show to their Lordships that we had not done so, and that it was impossible we could do so. Proclamations had been issued by successive Governor-Generals promising to the Native inhabitants the fullest toleration and the fullest and freest exercise of their religion; but while they had been deceived in this respect, and while it was impossible that a Christian State would grant in every particular that full and free exercise of their religious functions, even in another and in a far more reprehensible point of view, we had not been consistent with our professions of neutrality. Need he remind their Lordships of the disgraceful connection with the idolatrous rites of the people of India which had been exhibited by the British Government? Need he remind them how often British soldiers had been turned out to salute heathen deities, or that the Brahmin priests had been called upon to offer up prayers for a successful harvest? The British Government had deeply debased itself by following in some instances a servile conformity to the idolatrous practices of the Natives, and had thereby opened a source of future difficulties; in other instances an actual interference with their religious practices had taken place; we had interfered to prevent the burning of widows. Again, Government had interfered, and perhaps wisely, in respect to the law of inheritance, by saying that no person who became a Christian should therefore lose his right to any inheritance. It was true that all those interferences had been submitted to by the people of India, because they felt and knew that we had not legislated capriciously, but after calm deliberation with a view to promote the welfare of the Native population, but they were interferences nevertheless. And all this had been done by a Christian Government forming its legislation upon European principles—a system whose faith, laws, and usages, in contact with a heathen population must permeate their whole society. Although he did not at all agree with those who regarded these interferences with the customs of the people of India as among the causes which led to the late mutiny, yet Sir George Clerk had enumerated them as among those causes, and he could adduce no stronger evidence than this of the fact which he was endeavouring to prove. Sir George Clerk writes thus—

“It seems to be an absolute waste of time to seek for any other causes of the prevailing disaffection in India than any dispassionate observer may readily discover in various measures in which the sympathy of the Natives has of late years been abruptly renounced, their feelings outraged on very tender points affecting their religion and their veiled daughters, and the confidence they once felt, that no proprietor would be dispossessed without having offended, utterly destroyed.”

And he (the Duke of Marlborough) had brought forward those instances, in order to show that he was warranted in saying that the professed neutrality of the Government, upon which ground alone the Bible was excluded from Government schools in India, had been infringed repeatedly and systematically, in cases where the religious feelings of the people of India had been perhaps far more directly touched than they could be in the case which he was considering. It might, however, be objected to his proposition that if it created dissatisfaction and distrust among the people of India, it would induce them to refrain from sending their children to the Government schools; but how did previous present experience warrant us in attaching any weight to such an argument? In 1813 Mr. Warren Hastings expressed his opinion that it would be very dangerous to introduce a Church establishment into India. What danger, what ill-effects had resulted from that? From our efforts to propagate Christianity in India—although the mutiny at Madras had been attributed to the mission just as the recent outbreak had been attributed to some persons ascribed to their interference. Then, again, let the House consider how numerous were the missionary schools in India. The total number of those schools in India and Ceylon in the year 1853 was, for boys 1,566 schools, attended by 64,482 pupils; and for girls 449, attended by 14,300 pupils; and in these schools the Bible was openly and unreservedly taught, and would ask did that establish the fact that the children were deterred from attending at those schools. Mr. Stuart Reed, Government Inspector of Schools in the West Provinces, in his Report for 1854 says—

The Duke of Marlborough

“There can be no doubt that we find Government colleges and schools a higher class of boys than those who attend missionary schools. But transfer to the latter the more efficient staff and the rich scholarships, and the student of the missionary school will find the taint of lucrative Government employment, and the benches of the Government institutions deserted.”

But, then, it was still said that the introduction of the Bible into Government schools was opposed to the principles of neutrality upon which the Government was bound to act in India. He (the Duke of Marlborough) could not understand those principles; but, at least, if they were acted upon, the Government should be uniform and consistent. It was contrary to principle that the Government should mix itself up with religion; then let it be so understood. He was, however, that in Ceylon it was a recognized principle that the Scriptures should be taught in the Government schools, and they were so taught in the Central Academy at Colombo, while in India the Bible was strictly excluded. What could be the reason for that difference of practice? It was because the inhabitants of India were more numerous, and more to be feared than the people of Ceylon? He had no doubt that there was no indisposition on the Indian people to submit to Government interference when they could believe in sincerity, it was difficult for them to believe in that sincerity in the present instance, seeing the inconsistent course that was adopted in two different parts of the empire. We were the only conquerors of India who had interfered with the religious customs of the people; but whilst we interfered with many things that they held sacred we kept back our own religion from them; and consequently they were afraid to trust us, for they connected our motives with these proceedings. Owing to their ignorance of the religion of those who governed them. They imagined that a man was made a Christian by some ceremonial observance. But they were once made to see that the Christian religion was a thing of the heart, and that its profession depended on no outward ceremonies, there would be an end to the mistrust with which they often regarded the Government, and those idle rumours which frequently were put about as to their enforced conversion to Christianity. He would call the Lordships' attention to a very remarkable instance, in proof of what he now said. Mr. Tucker, for many years the commissioner at Benares, which was the sanctuary of the Brahmin religion, introduced a system which in itself was sufficient to scatter to the winds every assertion that the Natives were indisposed to receive religious instruction when that instruction was properly conveyed to them. Mr. Tucker did not allow himself to be guided by any of those idle theories of political expediency which seemed to weigh so much with the Government at home, but stood at once as a Christian gentleman determined to do. In the normal college established by him at Benares the whole of the young men regularly studied the Scriptures in the Hindi and Hindostani, and the thirty-four of them ventured to compete with the mission schools at a general examination. A voluntary Bible class had been formed, which at first a few Mahomedans objected to join; but it was that no one was compelled to attend and these soon followed the example of the other pupils, in the study of Scriptures; the examinations showed a high degree of attainment in Biblical knowledge; and the instruction being fully and honestly given was by them fully received. Did Mr. Tucker on account forfeit the confidence of the

Natives? Did they urge his removal, burn down the school-house, or rise in open rebellion against the Government of which he was the representative? On the contrary, when he left Benares it was shown that the God of all power was able to turn the hearts of those for whose benefit His truth had been promulgated. A large subscription, amounting to 6,000 rupees, was raised, with which his portrait was purchased, and hung up in one of the public buildings, while another portion was devoted to provide an annual prize for the best pupil in the Benares school, and a memorial was presented to him expressive of the admiration of the Natives at his advocacy of measures having for their object (as the memorial states) "the welfare here and hereafter of those committed to your charge." Sir John Lawrence had expressed the opinion that, "Christian things done in a Christian way, would never alienate the people," and his testimony, with that of Mr. Kerr, the author of a work on education, and of many others might be adduced, to show that with proper precautions, the introduction of the Scriptures into the Government schools was possible, without alienating the Natives and without working on their prejudices or their fears. Such evidence was better and more trustworthy than the evidence of those who said it was not possible to adopt the system, a system which they had never tried. He should be told perhaps, that this question had been submitted in direct and definite terms to the Governor General, and other authorities, who had declared that the system was impracticable. Now, it might be all very well to read such letters; but in what form was the question brought before these persons. He should like to ask those persons whether it would not be practicable to open a voluntary Bible class in the Government schools, on the express understanding that that class should only be attended as they or the parents might desire. He did not think it made much difference whether the Bible was read during or before school hours; but no prohibition ought to exist against it, and it ought to be read either before or during school hours, as might be found suitable or possible in each particular instance, and he should like to know whether the question as to the establishment of voluntary Bible classes in the Government schools had been put to those governors whose opinions were adverse to the course he was advocating. It should be remembered that when the system of grants in aid was first established in India it was as strongly opposed as the one which he was now anxious to see carried out. That system was established principally by the advice of Mr. Haliday, who had been desirous that the Mission Schools in India should in some degree partake in the assistance of the Government, and proposed to institute grants in aid. Mr. Grant, Mr. Rickets, and other authorities, both Native and European, objected to the proposal, on the ground that it would be an appropriation of the taxes raised from the people for the purpose of inducing them to change their religion; but did the Government at home listen to their objections? If opinions were of any value why were not these opinions followed at that time? and what reason was there to suppose that the opinions against the system which he proposed were of more value than the opinions against the system of grants in aid? The Government did not adopt the objections to grants in aid of missionary schools, and as to proselytism, the grants in aid were just as much open to that objection as Bible classes could be. Missionaries went out to India with the avowed purpose of establishing schools, and of converting the Natives, and the education given in those schools was compulsorily religious, for if Natives chose to attend those missionary schools they must read the Bible, and therefore in aiding that system, he did not say that the Government were not doing their duty, but at all events they could no longer shelter themselves behind the plea of neutrality in refusing to admit the introduction of the Bible. There was abundant evidence that the spread of Christianity in India would conduce to the safety and security of the Government, and the strongest evidence of that proposition was to be found in this, that those places where Christianity prevailed were spared from many of those terrible effects of the mutiny, which, during the rebellion, prevailed in other parts of India. He would, in conclusion, only recapitulate the arguments which he had used. He had shown that the education that might be given in Government schools would not be calculated to alarm the Natives, provided it was given openly and on the avowed principle of non-compulsion; that it was not so much from knowledge of the Christian religion as from ignorance of it that danger arose; and further, that the safety of the Government had been comparatively ensured in those of India where Christianity had been the ascendant, and that the new religion upon which the Government based their exclusion of the Bible might exist in India but was impossible in practice, and had been constantly and systematically excluded. He should deeply regret that the word which had fallen from him could not to the impression that he wished the Government to depart from the sacred duty of not to impose their religion on the Natives of India, all he wished was that the Natives should not be left to perish helplessly in the dark, while their erroneous notions of belief were taken from them, that they should not be abandoned to the unwillingness of the natives to receive the truths of Christianity, that they should have the opportunity afforded them of learning, if they wished, the truths which might make them more durably happy; that the Government of India, being Christian, should not hide their light under a bushel, but should be as a city set on a hill, or as a candle on a candlestick, that all who enter in might see the light. The system which he proposed to introduce was one of true love and wise government towards the Native population, was a subject in which the people of this country took a very deep interest. He had been sent up to Parliament from a part of the country, not in consequence of any organized agitation, but from the spontaneous sympathy of the people, and he ever might be the result of the present Motion, he felt convinced that the time was not far distant when public opinion would make itself heard, would repudiate the course now persisted in, in the education of the Natives of India, by a professed Christian Government, and compel the adoption of that course which he felt was the only one which would ultimately, by the blessing of God, secure the prosperity of India. The noble Duke concluded by moving to resolve,—

The Duke of Marlborough

"That the British Government in India, as the Representative of a Christian Nation, is clothed with the Duty of promoting the Moral as well as the Social Welfare of the People of that Country, and that, in order effectually to further such objects, it is the Opinion of this House that the authoritative Exclusion of the Word of God from the Course of Education afforded in the Government Colleges and Schools ought, under suitable Arrangements, to be removed; and humbly address Her Majesty that She will be graciously pleased to give Directions for carrying the said Object into effect."

LORD BROUGHAM: With the great respect for the noble Duke, fully admitting the ability of his statement, and with a deep conviction of the importance of the subject; but, with a clear opinion that a discussion of it would be utterly inexpedient and may possibly do harm, I beg to move the previous Question.

Motion objected to, and a Question stated hereupon, the previous Question was put, 'Whether the said Question shall be now put?' It was resolved in the negative.

House adjourned at a quarter-past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, July 2, 1860.

Minutes. PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Indemnity, 2° Poor Law Board Continuance; Militia; Game Certificates, &c.; European Forces (India). 3° Railway Cheap Trains, &c.; Labourers' Cottages (Scotland).

TAX BILL.—THE PAPER DUTY. PETITION.

Mr. BRIGHT presented a Petition from a numerous meeting held at Congleton. The petitioners declared that they had always understood that it was the undoubted privilege of that House to settle the taxation of the country, that any departure from the practice would be very prejudicial to the operations of trade, and they prayed the House to resist the recent aggression on the established usage of the constitution.

Mr. STEUART rose to order, and said that since the discussion which had taken place some days before in reference to a Petition of a similar character, he had consulted the work of Mr. May on The Law and Practice of Parliament, and found it distinctly laid down, that any language reflecting on the other estates of the Realm was a ground for refusing the Petition in which it was contained. As the words just read by the hon. Member were, he conceived, disrespectful to the House of Lords, he begged to ask Mr. Speaker whether the Petition ought to be received?

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. Member be good enough to specify the words?

Mr. BRIGHT: I will read the words to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER: The Member for Birmingham may state the substance of the Petition, but if it is to be read at length it must be read by the Clerk.

Mr. STEUART inquired, Whether the words "aggression on the established usage of the Constitution" and "Invasion of the privileges of the House of Commons," as applied to the other branch of the Legislature, were not objectionable.

Mr. SPEAKER: There can be no objection to receive the Petition. There is nothing in it which would render it informal.

EUROPEAN FORCE IN INDIA. QUESTION.

Mr. TORRENS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether, if there be any evidence from intercepted Letters that a well-drilled and well-armed European Force made communications inviting the Sikhs to join them in driving the Queen's Army out of India, Her Majesty's Government will cause Copies of those Letters to be laid upon the Table of the House; whether the authenticity of those Letters was formally inquired into, and, if so, whether it was ascertained who were the writers, and by whom and to what place the Letters were forwarded to the Sikhs; and whether, if their authorship has been brought home to any men of the European Force, punishment, and, if any, of what nature, has been awarded to the writers of them?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was in possession of no information on the subject.

ANNEXATION OF SAVOY.—QUESTION.

SIR ROBERT PEEL said, he wished to ask the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Whether, as a solution of the question which has arisen between Switzerland and France respecting the annexation to France of the neutralized provinces of Savoy, Her Majesty's Government have replied, in answer to the Despatch of M. Thouvenel on the subject, that they are prepared to accept the proposition contained in that Despatch for the assembling in conference of the great Powers of Europe?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it was true that Her Majesty's Government had, in reply to the despatch of M. Thouvenel, agreed to the proposal to hold a Conference of the Powers of Europe with respect to Savoy. He might also add that the Russian Government had assented to the proposal.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: When is the conference to assemble?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: That is a point not yet settled.

EUROPEAN FORCES (INDIA) BILL.

SECOND READING.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

SECOND NIGHT.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [28th June],

“ ‘That the Bill be now read a second time;’ and which Amendment was to leave out the word ‘now,’ and at the end of the Question to add the words ‘upon this day three months.’ ”

Question again proposed, ‘That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.

Debate resumed.

MR. RICH said, that in the short discussion that took place on Friday evening, the expediency of adjourning the original debate was fully admitted. He was glad to find from both sides of the House that this was in no degree to be a party question. The friends of the Government were thereby more free to express their opinions and to record their votes on this most important question. On the previous evening the hon. Gentlemen who addressed the House had taken “Indian views,” views derived from men of great ability and large Indian experience; but they had heard comparatively little of the bearing of the question on this country, whether considered in a financial, a political, or a military point of view. He wished to address a few words to the House on those bearings of the question. The point at issue, as he understood it, was this: should we continue that organization of the army in India, which had existed almost from the period of our possessing substantial power there, or should we, on the most abrupt notice, cashier that army, and replace it by another, of whose fitness to control India we had no experience whatever. It was proposed now to put an end to the local European force, and the whole of the Sepoy regular regiments—amounting to 180,000, out of an army of about 230,000 men—and to substitute in their place 80,000 of Her Majesty’s troops. A radical change like this, one would think, must be called for either by a great and overwhelming pressure of public necessity, or it must have been long and earnestly desired by those who were best acquainted with the condition of India. But was that the case? Diametrically the reverse. All the highest Indian authorities were against it, and its few ministerial supporters had till very recently been its opponents. The Governor General of India and his Supreme Council were unanimous in their opposition to the present proposition. Next to the Governor General came the Secretary of State for India. Now, Lord Ellenborough, who held the Indian office when the change of Government took place, was again for change. He was succeeded by the Lord, the Member for King’s Lynn (Stanley), and he, too, was again for change. The next Secretary of State was his right hon. Friend, who at present held the office; and six months ago he was judge by the tendency of the motion he then introduced, he also was for change. But that was not the case. When the Government of India was transferred to the Crown, Parliament was very jealous of entrusting autocratic power in the hands of the Indian Ministers; they surrounded him with an able and influential Council of Fifteen, every member of whom had either spent many years in India, or had been conversant all his life with Indian affairs. The whole weight of opinion of those constituted authorities was against the proposed measure. It was told on high authority that the Cabinet, who had studied the Report of the Commission on the organization of the Indian army, had unanimously put up their minds against amalgamation, though the gallant Officer, who was then Secretary for War, now tells us he had changed his opinion. So, also, the hon. Baronet, the present Secretary of State for India, when in August last he proposed that the European local force should be raised to 30,000 men, was against amalgamation. He gave a great credit to these right hon. Gentlemen for their sincerity in their change of views. Then, in proportion to this credit for sincerity must be the deduction from the weight of their authority. Thus, the whole weight of available authority was in favour of the present system of organization. Common sense and prudence therefore pointed to delay and further examination, to amending that which was amiss in the military organization by which we had won and maintained India instead of rashly and recklessly forcing on a radical change. How, too, would the work in a financial point of view? The right hon. Baronet said the change would cost the country only an extra £100,000 to £200,000 a year. The Secretary of the India Board, whose speech he had heard with great pleasure, as it reminded him of the ability and amiability of their best Chancellors of the Exchequer.

ough he wished that the mantle of that minister's economy had also fallen upon him, placed the extra charge much higher. The right hon. Secretary for War placed it higher still; and as the debate went on, it became clear that it would exceed half a million a year. Such a sum passed credibly enough from the tongue; but it must be remembered that it was to be taken from the Indian revenue, which was already staggering under the weight of taxation. Let us remember also that this is an additional burden cast by us on those who have no representative, nor defenders here. But let them consider how the question would bear on this country. The substitute for the present military organization of India proposed by this Bill was a force of 80,000 of Her Majesty's troops, to be constantly maintained there. The present limit was 30,000 men, therefore, was an addition of 50,000 men to our regular army; and he wanted to know how this great addition to our standing army would be viewed in quieter days. It might pass current now, but not very long ago a large standing army was looked upon with great jealousy, and he had believed and hoped that feeling might easily be revived. But more than this. If 50,000 additional men were to be supported in India, large depôts would be required in this country for the purpose of feeding them with recruits and reliefs. It had been mentioned in the course of the debate that the regiments serving in India were to be relieved every twelve years; and if that were so, then from three to five months in every year 6,000 men would be either at sea or at arrived, so that instead of 50,000 men 70,000 or 80,000 would have to be added by this Bill to the permanent establishment of the British Army. Now, against this wanton and enormous addition, no one would raise his voice and record his vote. There was another strong objection in the fact that by this plan three-fourths, also, of our whole army—excepting the Household Troops, who never left home save in the case of an European war—would be nailed to foreign stations. The effect of this would be to consign every officer of the regular army to Colonial service for eighteen years out of twenty-four—a fact to colonialize our army, to impair its efficiency in the field, and to weaken its connection with England. The system would press with still greater severity on the private soldiers, not one in ten of whom would return to their families and country.

He did not see how the Ten Years' Enlistment Act was to work under such circumstances. And, further, a long service as an army of occupation and control over an inferior and alien race would not tend to make our officers and soldiers good citizens. The Commander-in-Chief already complained of the difficulty he had in keeping up a high state of discipline in those regiments that had been long in India; and this would be still further enhanced by the details proposed. The difficulty of providing officers for the special requirements of the Indian service was admitted on all hands; but the Secretary of State for India proposed to remedy this difficulty by the creation of a Staff corps from the élite of the regiments. The young men who by intellectual and military studies should qualify for this Staff corps, would be drafted off to various appointments; hence the Imperial army would lose its young and best officers, while those who had interest and fortune, finding that there was more promotion to be obtained by a campaign at the Horse Guards than by remaining in India, would exchange and return home. The less enterprising and the older officers would not learn the native languages and the Staff corps duties, and would soon become a complaining residuum left at the listless head-quarters of each regiment. He put it to the House whether this was not the very same exhausting system which had been so much complained of, and by no one more than the present Government, by which the Indian regiments were deprived of their best officers. The effect of it would be that in less than ten years the efficiency and discipline of our European army in India would be to a great extent deteriorated. He, therefore, contended that under such a system it was in vain that they could hope to maintain so large a force as 80,000 of the Queen's army in India in so efficient a state as Her Majesty's troops ought to be maintained. The Duke of Wellington's opinion was that a Colonial corps had not the esprit de corps—that elan—which her Majesty's troops had:—he said that you could not colonialise regiments without deteriorating them. But that was precisely what the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do. He proposed to colonialize 80,000 of Her Majesty's troops;—in India alone—and yet he asked the House to believe that they would, under those circumstances, maintain the discipline and all the high qualities for which they were now so distinguished. The principal excuse for making this change was that the Indian army was in a state of indiscipline. No doubt it was; but there were able Commanders-in-Chief in India, who, if supported and aided by the authorities at home, could restore order and reinvigorate the system. It was also said that the existence of two separate bodies of European troops in that country was an anomaly. It might be so, but it was one which had been attended with great advantages. Independently of the benefits of emulation we must remember that but for the presence of the Queen's troops the local armies would, upon a recent occasion, have been masters of the situation; and it was possible that there might be occasions on which the presence of local troops might operate as a wholesome check on the Queen's forces; one single army far from home restraint had in all times been a difficult and dangerous machine. We had been told that we could have nothing to do with these men who had mutinied, and that the best course to pursue was to get rid of them at once. Yet how was it that many of those who left their standards and came home had been eagerly sought for and enlisted into the Queen's army; but these were the very men who had deserted their standards when their services were most wanted. These surely were the worst offenders, and not those who were loyally serving in India and in China. Would you then press your enlistment bounties on the worst, and brand only those who were less guilty, and had, indeed, remained faithful to the last? The Minister for India passed a Bill at the end of last Session for increasing the local army. If he had believed that the troops were so tainted with disloyalty and disaffection that it would be dangerous to continue them in the service of the State he assuredly would not have added to their numbers. But the right hon. Gentleman said that something had since occurred to alter his opinion. Why, in a despatch written by himself not many days after the passing of that Bill, he stated that the result of the inquiries held at the different stations of the army clearly established the prevalence of a conviction among the soldiers that they had a right to an option in regard to the transfer of their services from the Company to the Crown, and that he thought this conviction not ill-founded, for the defective character of the duplicate attestation given to the men, and the opinion entertained by their own officers, and by high authorities at home, were calculated to confirm. With that statement from the pen of the Secretary of State he had no hesitation in saying it was a mere subterfuge to tell the Houses that the feeling of disaffection in the Indian army could only be eradicated by cashiering the whole force. It was asked, however, how we were to reconstitute the local army. Sir James Outram gave a satisfactory answer to that question in one of his admirable despatches, where he showed how, by a different course of recruitment and enlistment, by instituting schools and a system of examination, and by advancing good men to certain minor Indian offices, we might raise the tone of the army, and induce men of good education to enter it. The hon. Gentleman concluded by stating that he hoped the debate would not be closed until all the papers relating to the subject had been placed before the House, and until the scheme which the Government had in hand had been shadowed forth in a vague speech, but on the table in the tangible form of a Bill.

[Second Night.]

Mr. Rich

Mr. TORRENS said, that the present scheme was one which was intended to effect a great and, he thought, a doubtful change. A local European army had existed almost from the time we put our foot in India, and they had well and bravely performed their duties to this country; and he was, therefore, averse to the change proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He thought, too, that those who were the best authorities on the subject were in favour of retaining a local army. The Report which had been lately published at the desire of the Secretary of State for India bore out the opinion that a local army was the most efficient for the Indian service, both as respected the sanitary condition of the troops, their efficiency, and the cost of their maintenance. The right hon. Gentleman, the other day, quoted the opinion of Sir Ronald Martin, on the same part of the question; but as far as he (Mr. Torrens) could see all that that Report proved was, that ensigns were more healthy than lieutenants, and lieutenants than captains, or, in other words, that the laws of nature operated in India as they did everywhere else, and that old men died where young men lived. The right hon. Gentleman stated his opinion that officers and soldiers, after a residence of ten or fifteen years in India, were not so active and energetic more recently arrived from Europe. At, he thought, they had instances enough before them of men who had served with distinction in India to show that the most valuable services might be expected from Europeans, however long resident in that country; and he would refer to the eminent services of such men as Sir Archdale Wilson, General Chamberlaine, General Nicholson, Major Hodgson, Major Probyn, Major Charles Gough, and Major Hugh Gough, the three latter having received the Victoria Cross, to show that the opinion held by the right hon. Gentleman was erroneous. As to the insubordination shown by a portion of the European force in India, it had been stated by the Secretary of State for War that some of the local European force had acted so disgracefully as to have written to the Sikhs, asking them to join them in driving the Queen's troops out of India. He had put a question to the Secretary of State for India on this subject, and judging from the very short answer he received, as well as from the evidence published on the subject, he concluded that the statement made was completely inaccurate. But, referring to the so-called mutiny of the European force in India, what, he would ask, was the conduct of the authorities at home, with regard to these misnamed mutineers. No sooner did the ships which conveyed them from England heave in sight than the recruiting sergeant went on board, or awaited their landing, to induce them to join regiments of the Line, so that these mutineers could thus be draughted into battalions serving in our Colonies, in Canada, or New South Wales, for instance, where much more danger would arise from a mutinous spirit among the men, than there would at isolated stations in India. He did not suppose that there would be much difficulty in reorganizing an efficient local force. He believed the amount of the local force at present was 15,000 men. If these were dispersed among the new regiments which he should propose to raise, there might very soon be in India regiments in a tolerable state of discipline and amounting in number to about 40,000 men. If to that force were added a Royal army of 30,000 men, there would then be strength enough in India to maintain the peace of the country, provided the Native army was sufficiently reduced. He regarded the present moment as not the proper time for carrying out this great change; and thought it would have been much better if the Government had confined itself to the preparation of measures for relieving that country from financial embarrassment, and had allowed the question of military organization to stand over till a more favourable time arrived for its consideration and settlement.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he must complain of the course that had been taken on this question by the Secretary of State for India, who, he thought, had not treated the House with the consideration it had a right to expect; and he was not sure that the House would have had any documents relating to the subject under discussion until the question had been disposed of, if it had not been for the clamour raised about them. The right hon. Gentleman declined to have any discussion with the Council of India, who might have been able to furnish him with important information and good advice, until their advice was no longer of any use; and the right hon. Gentleman seemed to propose that the House should legislate upon the subject without their having decisive information before them, and without his having formed any well-digested plan in his own mind. The question before the House was a most grave one, involving the interests of many thousand officers and closely affecting the honour of the country. When the Secretary for India brought forward the measure of last August, he (Sir De Lacy Evans) gave him every possible assistance; but, since then, the right hon. Gentleman had turned completely round, though he (Sir De Lacy Evans) was unable to follow him, but continued to hold the same opinions which he then professed. Such a proposition as that which had been intimated by the Government ought to be distinctly placed before the House. It was a mistake to suppose that the question was purely military. It was partly military, and partly a question of State. In the Cabinet which brought the present scheme forward, there was not one soldier nor one Member who had been in India. He was himself a soldier, and had served in the three Presidencies. He, therefore, thought that on military questions he was quite as competent to form an opinion as the Members of the Cabinet. The House had been led to believe that the principal military officers in India were greatly alarmed with regard to this local force; but great injustice had been done at least to three of them—Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield, and Sir Hope Grant; and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for India

[Second Night.]

he thought had occasion to blush for some of the harsh observations which had been made in ignorance of the real state of the case, as disclosed by these papers. A portion of them had now been received, and Heaven knew when they would obtain the rest; the right hon. Gentleman declared that he was not responsible as they were in the printer's hands; whereas it now turned out that he had the documents in his own office all the time. He did not know, until he read those documents, how completely Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield stood exonerated from any blame on the subject; and if their sound and rational advice had been taken in the early stage of the matter, they might have escaped the difficulty in which they found themselves. The gravity of the question had been monstrously exaggerated. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he was almost in darkness till after the 10th of August last; but it appeared that at a very early stage the heads of the army in India gave advice which, if adopted, might have prevented the necessity for the present measure. In a despatch from the Governor General to Lord Stanley, dated the 18th of November, 1858, Lord Canning thus expressed himself:—

"I beg your Lordship to believe that I do not underrate the grave responsibility which attaches to the choice in this matter of a course different from that which has recommended itself to the judgment of Lord Clyde, and which is emphatically urged by His Excellency, who is so pre-eminently well qualified to guide the Government in any question in which the feelings and treatment of British soldiers are concerned. But after very careful consideration, I have, to my regret, found myself unable, in this instance, to adopt the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, and I feel it to be my duty to require that the law shall be asserted and maintained."

What was the advice given by Lord Clyde, and who was to be held responsible for the movement? The noble Lord at the head of the Government had been repeatedly charged with having caused the expectations which gave rise to it, and had not shown his usual candour in dealing with that accusation. Sir William Mansfield, in a letter dated November, 1858, explained to the Governor General the views of Lord Clyde:—

"Lord Clyde would beg leave to call to the recollection of the Governor General, with the greatest deference to His Excellency, a fact unknown except to military men—namely, that in the old regiments of the Crown a man cannot be transferred from one to another without his free consent, he having enlisted to serve in a particular regiment. Thus it happens that, although the conditions of servitude are precisely the same in the various regiments of Her Majesty's service, whenever necessity requires that the complement of one regiment should be filled up at the expense of others, 'volunteers' are called for the purpose, who receive a bounty in consideration. Whatever may be the exigencies of the State, the rule has always been followed in the army, that the free consent of the individual must be obtained before he can be transferred from one part of the service to another. Perhaps there is no rule which the soldiers more clearly understand, or to the principle of which they cling with greater tenacity; it is understood before they enter the army, in consequence of the education in this respect which they receive from the recruiting sergeant, and in the Militia regiments. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, Lord Clyde would request the closest attention to the practical circumstances of a soldier's enlistment, and of the manner in which the soldier would view any attempt to deprive him of what he considers a right. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to make him understand any legal argument by which the very principle of his military existence might, in his opinion, be set aside. Lord Clyde would earnestly suggest that, in treating this very important matter, it should be so managed as not to alarm the men with regard to the point to which allusion has now been made. He would propose to the Governor General that it may be worthy of consideration whether the re-enlistment of the Company's European forces should not be proceeded with immediately, in order to prevent the possibility of a feeling of irritation arising in the army of a very inconvenient, and, perhaps, dangerous tendency."

Sir De Lacy Evans

Why, from the course they had adopted, it would appear that the authorities in England and Calcutta were bent on irritating the men. Such were the views of Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield. The officer next in point of distinction was Sir Hope Grant, who wrote similarly, and declared it to be "of the highest importance that this question should be speedily set at rest, otherwise most vexatious circumstances might ensue." At the very time these men were respectfully pressing their claims either to a discharge or a fresh bounty, other soldiers, who merely volunteered from one regiment to another, were obtaining bounties. Colonel M'Kenzie was sent to Burhampore, which was supposed to be the focus of this terrible revolutionary movement, and, the men having been paraded he found only thirty-nine who absolutely insisted on their demands being complied with. He made a statement to them, and, in a Report which he subsequently despatched, discipline was described as becoming gradually restored, and of the thirty-nine all except one evinced a disposition to return to the ranks. By the advice of Lord Clyde a Court of Inquiry established, and all the men had been invited to present themselves before it, and state their grievances. Among others who had so presented themselves was Private Campbell, who stated that he had been attested at Dundee in 1857; Private Casey, native of Belfast, and Private Costello, who had been attested the same year—all, it remembered, men of only one year's standing, and these men, in reply to the questions which had been put, said they had enlisted to serve the East India Company, and that the authority of the Company having been put an end to they thought they had a right to be re-attested, to obtain their discharge. Now, it was possible that when the whole of the papers had been delivered some much more flagrant cases of insubordination than those might be discovered; but, if there were no such cases, then he apprehended no sufficient reason for the proposed amalgamation, founded upon the mutinous spirit evinced by the local army, could be advanced. On these men being asked which they would prefer, their answers generally were that they preferred being again attested, and that they did not wish to give up the soldiering. Indeed one of them, of the name of Costello, from Dublin, added that he did not like to go home, but that if any recompense were given he should like to get a share of it. Well, those were the atrocious conspirators against the Indian Empire, as characterized by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Wood). Now, when that right hon. Gentleman brought on his India Bill, in the course of last Session, the opinions he expressed were totally at variance with what they were at present. The right hon. Gentleman in the former Session warmly defended the local army from the imputation of mutiny, and said that it would be grossly unjust to them and discreditable to the Government if those men, who had behaved so nobly during times of great peril and difficulty, were treated with any want of regard or consideration. The Secretary for War, a few nights before, in dealing with that part of the subject, made some remarks to which he had listened with the utmost pain and regret. The right hon. Gentleman upon that occasion endeavoured to impress upon the Members the necessity of assenting to the Government measure, inasmuch as if they did not do so an expense of £220,000 for pensions, of £300,000 for gratuities, and of £70,000 for something else would have to be incurred. He then went on to say—thus, proving by what enormous faith in the credulity of the House he must be animated—that for his part he thought it would be very improper to render ourselves liable to such an expense in order to re-construct a force which in the moment of our direst need had proved faithless and disloyal to their Sovereign. He for one deprecated the use of such language, and he would entreat the right hon. Gentleman, when he had to deal with the honour and feelings of a large body of men such as those under the control of the Department over which he presided, to give expression to his sentiments in words somewhat more gentle and considerate. The language which the right hon. Gentleman employed in speaking of the local army in India was, he (Sir De Lacy Evans) contended, in the highest degree unjust. Was it not a fact that in the moment of our direst need the troops of that army had performed their duty to their Sovereign in a manner the most faithful and heroic? No part of the Royal army had proved more faithful or had stood more heroically to their colours than the local troops. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman had ever read an account of the achievements by which that fidelity and that heroism were evinced. If not, he would inform him that two regiments of Bengal Fusileers were engaged at the memorable siege of Delhi, and that two other regiments of the same force served at Lucknow. The two principal regiments engaged at the siege of Delhi were the 1st and 2nd Bengal European Fusileers. Those men displayed the most heroic courage and determination in that memorable siege, lasting upwards of four months. Despatches had been received on frequent occasions referring to their gallant conduct during that perilous struggle. The troops before Lucknow had displayed equal bravery, and were likewise honoured by frequent references in the Government despatches. Were all those glorious deeds now to go for nothing? Was a miserable squabble arising out of a claim of £3 or £4 a man, eighteen months afterwards, sufficient to erase the merits of those troops from the records of Indian history, and to degrade them from the rank of British soldiers? For making this claim the local army had been taunted with language of a bitter and most painful character. And what was the nature of this claim? Why the Governor General, in reference to it, stated that the claim was one evidently made by honest men feeling that they were right. Lord Clyde said the soldiers were certainly impressed with the conviction that the justice of the case was on their side. And what were the results? Thirty-nine men only were declared guilty of an offence, and sentenced to one night's imprisonment. With the exception of one man, Lance-sergeant Best, they all submitted subsequently, and were restored to their companies. Now, the plea on which the House of Commons was asked to assent to the proposal of the Government was the uniformly bad behaviour of the troops in question; but if such had really been their behaviour it was desirable that the allegations against them should be founded on some better proof than any which had hitherto been furnished. How, he should like to know, if their acts had been such as they had been represented to be, had it come to pass that what they had originally asked for had been granted to them without any resort upon their part to force? The Civil Government had published a Proclamation, setting forth that all the men who pleased might take their discharge; but why, while thus far acknowledging the justice of their claim, had it resorted to the petty punishment of refusing to re-enlist them? It was only remarkable that of the whole 22,000 who might have accepted a free passage to England, and there re-enlisted, only 10,000 took the discharge, the others remaining in the country, and passing from the Company's service to that of the Queen, but without receiving any bounty. Rather ungenerous treatment, he thought, it was to give them no bounty. Now, they were told the whole force had destroyed itself, and this was, therefore, a most desirable opportunity for carrying out amalgamation, for why should they reconstruct the local force? Now, the fact was, that in consequence of 3,000 re-enlistments, and about 2,000 men who had joined from depôts, the force now numbered 17,000, or very nearly as many as existed previously. In his opinion, it was most injudicious to raise so large a body of men as had been proposed. He supported the proposition of the Secretary for India last year that it should be increased to 30,000; but the Commission, it appeared, had decided that we should have a European force in India of 80,000. That extraordinary Commission had not yet been described in its true colours. How was it formed? There were six officers of the Queen's army on the Commission, and four Company's officers, and Lord Stanley, a Member of the Government. It was as clear as the light that the six officers in the Royal army would vote according to the wishes of the Horse Guards and the Government. Were these six officers properly chosen? He thought not. Two of these officers, great chiefs of the Commission, never were in India, and had no experience of Indian affairs. One was the then Secretary of State for War (General Peel), and the Commander-in-Chief. It was quite impossible that either could know much of this matter. Yet their opinions being strongly expressed must have exercised great influence on all the others. Then there was the Adjutant General, besides the Commander-in-Chief. Whoever knew of an Adjutant General giving an opinion different from that of the Commander-in-Chief? There was no such thing in military affairs. Three, then, out of the six officers really knew little or nothing of India. On the other hand, there were on the Commission four local officers, and only one statesman unconnected with military affairs, namely, Lord Stanley, whose vote was decided for the continuance of the local force. The Report was a very curious one. He knew no precedent for such a state of things. All the names of the Members of the Commission except one were appended to the Report. The exception was that of General Hancock, who happened to know a great deal more of the matter than any other of the six, and he resolved to make a separate Report. This required a great deal of firmness, looking to the manner in which he had been treated. General Hancock's name was not appended to the Report; but the names of all the others, although they disagreed, were attached to it. How did they manage that? Most ingeniously. Undoubtedly, there was a good deal of difficulty about it; but, to induce all the Members to put their names to it, the earlier part of the Report professed to represent the opinion of the majority, and the latter part that of the minority. The majority recommended that there should be 80,000 European troops maintained in India—a most preposterous proposition, in his opinion—which would amount to very nearly 100,000 men; for a very large part of the force would be continually lost to the Indian army and that at home by being at sea. He must say those who made such a proposition had little considered the finances of India, what had taken place during the great Poy rebellion. Although Lord Clyde had completely succeeded in suppressing the rebellion and disarming the people, we still continued to send out troops to India. The continual pouring forth of British troops upon India after the mutiny had been completely subdued seemed as if it were intended to make the people of England believe that that country could not be held without a vast European army. A very moderate augmentation of our force would have been amply sufficient. He regretted to hear that the accounts from China were of so doubtful a character—that it was uncertain whether peace or war was to be the result—because it necessitated the keeping a larger force in India than would otherwise be requisite; and from the general uncertainty it was premature at present to judge of what amount of force would be required for service in China. The Secretary for War had rather overlooked the contingencies involved in the war with that empire. We were mixed up with our warlike neighbours—the French—in that part of the globe, and he could not venture to predict what the results might be. It was quite probable, however, that we should require to have a considerable European force in readiness for another year or two to see how the contest with China would terminate. Heaven knew, indeed, whether success in China might not lead to the same results as it had done in India, and whether our rulers in the East might not commence a career of conquest in China, as they had done in India. Statements had been made that the idea of eliminating troops was altogether nonsense, and that there was no advantage in having soldiers accustomed to a particular country. The Duke of Wellington certainly entertained a different opinion, for in many of the despatches which his Grace wrote home from the Peninsula he declared that a soldier who had got through one campaign was of more value than two or three who had just arrived from England. If that principle held good with regard to services in Spain and Portugal, it applied with still greater force to service in a country like India. His own experience in the Crimea, where several of the regiments composing the division he had the honour to command were for several years before on Mediterranean stations, was to the same effect as that of the high authority he had just quoted. It certainly required a long residence in the various Presidencies to enable both officers and soldiers to become acquainted with the habits and customs of the Natives; but when this was acquired, many difficulties were removed. Many persons seemed to consider our position in India very similar to that in our Colonies; but this was a mistaken notion. In many of our Colonies the Native population was either barbarous or scanty in numbers, and in some cases they had been almost wholly annihilated. India, on the other hand, had its 180,000,000 of inhabitants, whose extermination was impossible, and who could not be supplanted by a European race. It was consequently necessary to establish not only a military but a moral supremacy, and that could only be done by obtaining a thorough knowledge of the habits and institutions of the people. A letter from the Calcutta correspondent of The Times, published on the 6th of June, described “the consternation and dismay” produced among the officers of the local army by the news of the supposed intentions of the Home Government. The writer said:—

[Second Night.]

Sir De Lacy Evans

“Bound by every association, by a service extending over the best years of their lives to India, the majority of the officers feel that in being handed over to the Horse Guards, or even in being amalgamated with the Royal army, they will be virtually sacrificed. Eminently fitted for Indian warfare, the elder officers especially would feel themselves in a new and strange position in other parts of the world. There is a strong feeling of alarm also lest all the privileges guaranteed to them in 1858 should not be preserved intact after their amalgamation with a service which stands on a different footing. The feeling of apprehension is aggravated by the conviction pervading almost the entire Indian service, that amalgamation is utterly opposed to true policy. . . . It is impossible to deny that in general the Natives have an intense dread of newly-arrived regiments. In the local force the tendency of young officers to deride or exasperate our Native fellow-subjects is strongly repressed by the senior officers. On both grounds, therefore, public and private, the Indian officers look forward with anxiety on this subject.”

The Times was a great authority in this matter, and the letter which he had quoted had appeared in its columns, although its tendency was in direct opposition to the views now advocated in other portions of that newspaper. Another part of this subject was its constitutional bearings and its relation to the Horse Guards. In Sir John Malcolm's Life of Lord Clive there occurred this passage:—

“The reasons of expediency that led Clive to recommend that high public officers, civil and mil-

[Second Night.

litary, should be remunerated by shares of the profits of the salt trade are stated in numerous letters. He thought that open, direct, pecuniary allowances (adequate in amount) would not willingly be sanctioned by the Company out of any of the revenues that flowed into their Treasury, and still less from the profits of their trade; and that, besides, such large avowed allowances would invite an attack from the Crown upon their patronage; and that the grasping character of the administration in England would lead to a ruinous interference in the nomination of men to India who had no recommendation but their high birth and great interest."

No doubt there existed a general impression that the extraordinary changes which had come over the mind of Her Majesty's Government on this question might be attributed to a disposition on the part of the Ministry and the Crown to get hold of a large portion of the patronage of India. The Indian Council had been directly charged with endeavouring to keep the patronage arising from these appointments; but those who made that charge seemed quite unconscious that a similar accusation might be brought against the Government. The prophecy of Lord Clive appeared to be in course of fulfilment. What was the patronage connected with the army at present possessed by the Government? During the year 1858 about 800 first commissions were disposed of, 300 or 400 of which were without purchase. Their value was little short of £300,000. Returns also showed that within the last six or six-and-a-half years commissions had been given away to the value of a million and a quarter sterling. There was really no check or control over this patronage. It was frequently said that the Secretary of State for War was supreme; but, in point of fact, the disposition of this patronage rested entirely in the breast of the Commander-in-Chief. It was not desirable that so vast a patronage should rest without control in a single individual; yet by this measure it was proposed to add to it the appointments to the commissions of 5,000 officers. The patronage, which under this Bill would be possessed by the Commander-in-Chief, was without parallel. It would far exceed that enjoyed by the Ministers of War of either France or Russia. Had the right hon. Baronet given the House all the papers referring to this subject he should not have trespassed upon its attention. As he had not done so, he should move the adjournment of the debate, and in doing so he would repeat the question whether, before the Bill passed another stage, the right hon. Baronet would lay upon the table papers in continuation of those which they had received that morning, the protests and Minutes of the Council, and copies of certain letters which were said to have passed between the right hon. Gentleman and a distinguished member of the Council within the last twenty-four hours.

Sir De Lacy Evans

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the "Debate be now adjourned."

MR. MONCKTON MILNES, in seconding the Amendment, said that he was induced to do so mainly because he deeply regretted the mode in which his right hon. Friend had brought this question before the House. There were two modes of proceeding which he might have adopted with fairness to all parties, but, unfortunately, he had pursued a course different from either. He might have taken upon himself the whole responsibility of settling the question, when it would have been his duty to incorporate in a Bill, in a regular manner, what it was that the Government intended to abolish, and what to substitute, laying before the House all the requisite documents and information; or if he shirked that responsibility, and wished to ascertain the opinion of the House before the Government came to an absolute decision upon the subject, he might have moved the appointment of a Select Committee before which all the documents should have been laid, and which should have examined the distinguished gentlemen who composed the Indian Council. Upon the Report of that Committee the House would have been fully able to discuss and to legislate upon. In either case the House would have been placed in a position to understand what it was about; but at present it was unable to come to a decision even upon this very short Bill. The appointment of the Indian Council, and the provision that the opinions of its members should be recorded, implied that that record should be used for the information of the House; and, therefore, until those opinions were placed before them, he thought they should take no further proceedings in the matter. But the way in which his right hon. Friend and the Government were now dealing with the Minutes and protests of the Council amounted to an insinuation that they were not fit to be laid on the Table of the House, and naturally gave rise to an impression—which was perhaps erroneous—that they were anxious to degrade the Council and diminish its value, in order that they might obtain the support of public opinion to alor measures—such as the abolition of Council itself—which they were not quite ready to carry into effect. The question which the House now had to decide was not whether we should have a certain local force in India, but whether 1000 or 40,000 men should be added to Queen's army to be employed in protecting her Indian dominions, in addition to the forces now engaged in that service. The circumstances of India were so peculiar that it was probably impossible entirely to do without a local force. This force in his opinion stood in a position somewhat analogous to that of the Canadian militia, and was dependent upon considerations wholly distinct from those affecting the regular army. He trusted that, if peace continued, we should be able to maintain the security of our Indian Empire, by means less expensive and less violent than hitherto been the case. If we were to witness the struggle of the Sutlej or of the Andaman, or if a second mutiny were to break out among the people, then, of course, we must fall back upon a large Imperial force; but, as he hoped neither of these contingencies would occur, he believed the security of India might be maintained mainly by means of a local army. The question before the House had been made to depend too much upon the accidental revolt of a small body of European troops. It was impossible to read the book published that morning without feeling that the history of the revolt in question exhibited an amount of incapacity and a recklessness of public duty which were almost incomprehensible. Sure he was, however, that wherever the fault might lie, the great weight of it could not but be made to fall upon the local force. He was not prepared to go the length of saying that their conduct was justifiable, but he thought that a large part of the mischief was caused by the Central Government at Calcutta, who overrode the calm and statesmanlike judgment of Lord Clyde himself. At all events, he protested against founding upon an event so accidental and peculiar as the refusal of the European soldiers to continue their services in India an argument for discharging altogether the local army of that country. The question must rest upon far deeper grounds. It must rest chiefly upon the consideration whether it was absolutely necessary largely to increase the Imperial army for the purpose of maintaining the security of our Indian possessions. He believed such a measure was not necessary. All that was required could be fully accomplished by means of a well-organized local force. No one could read the admirable despatches of General Outram without feeling that there were in the higher orders of that force officers with sufficient grasp of mind to remedy any proved defect, and to place the local force, when reorganized, in as high a position as any portion of the British army. A very short experience in India had convinced Mr. Wilson that it would be dangerous to substitute for the local army a mere hostile garrison of strangers; and those who knew what weight should be attached to the opinion of Mr. Frere would not be inclined to disregard his assertion that but for the localized character of our Indian army it would have been impossible to maintain our footing there. The policy of the Romans with regard to Britain was, to leave here some of their best legions to become localized, and by their means to govern their distant dependency, and such he thought should be our policy with regard to India. He would implore the House not to be led away by that lust of centralization which seemed to have occupied the minds of English statesmen on Indian subjects for the last few years.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the questions of the amalgamation of the Indian with the Royal army, and of the amount of force to be maintained in India, were by no means to be decided by the present Bill, and the reasons for introducing it were so unfair towards the men who had often conducted themselves in an heroic manner that the House ought to hesitate before adopting it. Last year, when the so-called mutiny in the local force took place, he called the attention of the House to the subject, and mentioned almost every point stated in Lord Clyde's letter. Referring to the attestations, he maintained that no Act of Parliament could transfer the services of the men from the Company to the Crown. The service might be transferred, but the attempt to transfer the services of individuals was an act of tyranny. The men who objected to be transferred were not mutineers, and could not be punished as mutineers. In fact, the Government had not dared to punish them. If any man had been punished he could have recovered damages in England, and if death had in any case been inflicted the person who ordered the punishment would have been guilty of murder. A contract had been entered into, and what the men required was that the contract should be carried out. Nothing could have been more impolitic or more imbecile than the course which the Government had pursued—they simply granted from weakness that which they had refused to any sense of justice. Nothing was more clear than the law, though, unfortunately, Lord Canning and the authorities at home took a different view of the question. If the Secretary of India meant to propose the amalgamation of the Indian and Royal armies, he should clearly state upon what his proposition was founded. Would the right hon. Gentleman say what amount of force was to remain in India, how the Indian officers were to stand in the Queen's army, as regards rank, and what was to be done with the Clive fund? He trusted that, before further proceeding with the measure, details on these points would be supplied to the House. He certainly felt great difficulty in deciding whether the force in India should be local or Royal when he found so much difference of opinion prevailing among great authorities; but, at all events, this point could not be decided upon a Bill which really did not determine the matter.

[Second Night.]

Mr. AYRTON thought that the Secretary for India had hardly been treated with fairness, for last year the right hon. Gentleman did not commit himself by any formal expression of opinion as to what ultimately should be the position of the European force in India, but merely in an incidental manner stated what was at that time the impression on his mind. He then ventured to differ from the right hon. Gentleman, observing that the right hon. Gentleman had not had time to look into all the papers on the subject, and that when he had he would ultimately be driven to that conclusion at which he had now arrived. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman had very frankly admitted that the impression existing in his mind last year arose from a hasty view of the papers before him, and not upon the deliberate investigation of the more important documents. The right hon. Gentleman was charged with submitting this Bill to the House without having consulted the Members of the Indian Council. Having taken some part in the discussions respecting the formation of that Council, he thought it was understood, when the Council was instituted, that everything was not to be debated in a kind of little Parliament in Leadenhall Street, but that the Secretary of State was to divide the Council into committees, and to submit questions like the present to the investigation of an appropriate Committee; and having become acquainted with the opinions of the Committee of Council, it was then the duty of the Secretary for India and the Government to take their own decision on their own responsibility, and to propose to Parliament such measures as they had resolved to adopt. The papers which had been laid on the table showed that the Secretary of State had given the Council sufficient opportunity of placing on record their views on this subject, in order to enable him to form a judgment of his own. The right hon. Gentleman was, undoubtedly, bound to act on his own responsibility, and would not have been permitted to avoid that responsibility by interposing the Council between himself and Parliament. The Minute of the Committee which had been laid on the table, and which was based on a voluminous blue-book containing the opinions of the most experienced officers not only in the late Company's army but also in the service of the Crown, put the subject in the most concise and explicit form. With such a mass of information already before them, he saw no necessity for prolonging the investigation. The Secretary of State had been found fault with because he had not submitted to the House a scheme for the re-organization and management of the Indian army in all its details. But the fact was that the Indian army had been constructed entirely by the authority of the executive Government step by step, according to the circumstances of the times, and Parliament had had little or nothing to do with the matter. The right hon. Gentleman had pursued the proper course in asking Parliament to undo only what it had already done—namely, to repeal an Act which was passed last Session, and which was no longer applicable to the circumstances of the case. The right hon. Gentleman had displayed great prudence in not attempting a complete and detailed reconstruction of the Indian army, but in leaving the changes which might be required to be worked out gradually by the executive Government. The Secretary for India was going to reconstruct the Indian army in the same manner as it was constructed before—namely, by the action of the Executive Government extended over a long term of years. In accomplishing this there was no reason to believe that Her Majesty's Government would not pay same respect to the vested interests of officers as the Court of Directors of the East India Company would have done. The argument against the measure was based on the presumption that the Crown was bent on doing injustice to the Officers of the Indian army; but the changes proposed might, and doubt would, be effected without injury to the position of those officers. It was, however, a mistake to suppose that there was any guarantee given for maintaining things as they were by the Act of Parliament which put an end to the rule of the Company, because the Court of Directors themselves always retained in their hands the power of making any change respecting the officers of the army in India as well as the disposition of that army, and the Secretary of State in Council was invested with the same power. Without stating all the details of the proposed changes he thought it was sufficient to say that the Government gave a general guarantee not to put an end to the rights and privileges of the officers. Those who wished to remain in India would have the same benefits as if the old system had continued in force. It was much to be regretted that foreign topics had been introduced into the debate. No one wanted to weaken the Imperial army, or to decry either the Native or the local European army in India. It was only when one force was said to be the perfection of military organization that the question was obliged to be asked: Does it come that one part of a force is excellent has exploded in a most terrible mutiny, and another part has dissipated in what he must term a most serious disaffection? If any one studied the papers they would find that, instead of the men putting forth their views temperately, they proceeded in a manner that the Government was brought to the conclusion that the men had expressed their opinion, and that it had refused to take their own course though they were shown to be in the wrong. The soldiers of the European force, by the negligence of the officers of the Indian Government, were not given a copy of the oath which they had taken, and which would have made them aware that they owed equal allegiance to the Crown as they did to the East India Company. Notice taken, that Forty Members were present. House counted, and Forty Members being present—

Colonel Dunne

MR. AYRTON resumed:—When the local troops, on the transfer of the Government from the Company to the Queen, looked to the papers supplied to them, they could not find the solemn oath they had taken to serve the Queen, and they set up a claim that, in consequence of the change of Government, they were entitled to their discharge, and to receive a bounty upon re-enlistment. There was, however, a well known distinction in military law, that if a man enlisted to serve in a particular regiment or place, the condition of that service could not be changed without re-enlistment; but in the present case, whether the East India Company administered the affairs of India as trustees for the Crown, or whether the Crown itself administered the affairs of India in its own name, could not give the men a claim to re-enlistment after the oath they had taken, their conditions of service remaining unchanged. No one had desired to charge the local European army with discipline; but when exaggerated pretensions were set up, and its discipline was said to be equal, if not superior, to that of the Queen's army, it became necessary to state that the discipline of the Company's European force was not of the highest character. He held in his hand, for example, a report by one of the Company's officers upon the punishment and treatment of offenders in one of the local regiments. A private was charged with being asleep on duty. He was forgiven. Another man was charged with being three times drunk on duty within four months. Upon each occasion he was forgiven. These were serious military offences, and the punishment exhibited a lax state of discipline, which, when the local army was crossed and thwarted, manifested itself in acts of sedition, if not in absolute mutiny against the Government of India. The argument of the under Secretary of State with regard to the qualifications of officers of the Queen's army appeared to him to be greatly mistaken. It was an answer to the only argument of any weight against the change proposed, and was therefore deserving of attention. When they were removed at their own request from the Queen's army, they would be allowed to continue as local officers, and to discharge local duties as long as they remained on the Staff of the Indian army. The same conditions that now existed would therefore be in force, and would provide a body of British officers devoted to local objects. What reason could there be for maintaining that British officers would be more willing to quit posts of adequate remuneration under the new system than under the old? The only difference would be that the Government would have a larger area of selection, and the probability therefore was that they would have a better body of officers at their command. It would be safe to assume that the change would operate without injury to the public service in India, since there would be just as great an opportunity for officers to undertake a local duty, and obtain the same amount of remuneration and distinction as the Company's officers at present enjoyed. It was also said that there would be an insuperable desire on the part of officers of the Queen's army to return to this country, and this argument, which was to some extent adopted by Lord Canning, was, if well-founded, no doubt adverse to the change. The short answer to that was, that officers would remain or come back just as expectations were held out of advantage to themselves. When an officer had obtained for himself the reputation of having a knowledge of local affairs his own interest would keep him where he could gain distinction instead of coming to England to begin life again with new competitors. The Governor General said he had conversed with officers lately on this subject, and found among them a great indisposition to remain in India. But he had not sufficiently considered that the officers with whom he conversed were hurried out to India under the old system, to suppress the mutiny, and had no intention of remaining there. They were, no doubt, men much devoted to the Queen's service, and had no desire to change their condition by accepting permanent employment in India. But this state of mind was quite inapplicable to officers who had fitted themselves for civil employment in India. The noble Lord the Member for King's Lynn (Lord Stanley) said, the local officers of the Native army who quitted the army and remained attached to the Staff as civil officers would not be respected unless they were identified with a large body of local European officers; but if they were respected because of their connection with the local European officers, would they not be still more respected if they were connected with the still more numerous and more important body of officers who commanded the army of the Queen? In point of fact—setting aside the interest of senior officers and individuals—the proposed change would greatly conduce to raise the character and position of the officers who obtained local employment, while it would add to the respect in which they were held; and it was very much on that ground that he desired to see the present measure passed. Nothing would so much tend to divest the Secretary of State for India of all prejudices with regard to the class of officers appointed to serve in India, as the fact that all belonged to one grand army. He believed that the only opponents of this measure in India were those who had got a certain position under the present system; but he did not hesitate to say that if the question of comparative merit were raised, many of them would be found not entitled personally to the positions which they held. ["No, no!"] Perhaps the Gentlemen who cried "No, no!" thought that all the officers in India were selected according to merit; but he could tell them that there had been just as many influences at work in the administration of affairs in India as in this country. There were connections and classes who considered India as their freehold in regard to appointments, and persons were not always placed in positions of importance on account of merit alone. By a system of seniority on the one hand, officers were placed in command of regiments without reference to merit, and by a system of selection on the other, persons were placed in positions for which they were not qualified. The observations he had made with reference to officers generally applied equally to the remark that they would have no staff officers in India if this change were made. They would still have the same principle of selection, there would be not merely the same but a larger area from which to select, and, therefore, it might be presumed that the same or a better result would be arrived at. It had been said that the proposed change would give rise to collisions between the military and civil Governments in India; but how could collisions be incurred by placing the whole of the army under the control of the Governor General and the local Government? Under the new system the Commander-in-Chief would have no more power to interfere with the local army than at present, and the danger of collisions would be lessened by the circumstance that they would get quit of the present double staff, and

[Second Night.]

Mr. Ayrton

ve only one responsible staff. If the existing system would work well with regard to the Queen's troops in India, why should it work worse when twelve or fourteen regiments were added to the Royal army? The Horse Guards was always set up as a bear to frighten them on this subject; but he did not believe in the power of the Horse Guards to do all the mischief that had been ascribed to it. They knew that in this country the Horse Guards was very much under the command of the Secretary of War. The Horse Guards could not increase the expenses of the army one shilling without his previous assent. And, with regard to India, the power of the Horse Guards would rather be lessened than enhanced by the proposed change, because the Secretary of State for India would be cognizant of all that took place in India with regard to the European troops, and thus the Commander-in-Chief would be placed under a double supervision, that of the Secretary of War and that also of the Secretary of State for India. Then, as to the transfer of patronage from the Indian Council to the Horse Guards, he maintained that such transfer was not the necessary result of passing this measure. At that point might be determined by proper orders being given by the military authorities, and if any question should arise would necessarily come under the consideration of that House, which could then express its opinion on the course to be adopted. Those were the main objections to the Bill; but the able speech of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) did not convince him that those objections could not be removed by adopting proper precautions. If that were so, the House must consider what would be the practical advantages of the change. Some hon. Members appeared to regard this as purely an Indian question; but that, he conceived, was an imperfect and unsatisfactory view to take. They must regard the measure as it would affect England. The pretence that India was a self-sustaining Government had long since vanished. It was not the local force that had defended our Indian empire from the attacks of other Powers; it was the British navy which protected the coasts of India, whilst our internal power had to be sustained by the military resources of this country. He contended, then, that England should be entitled in the event of any emergency at home to withdraw troops from India for the protection of England. That was the main object of the amalgamation which was now proposed. What would be thought of France if she were to raise an army to serve in Algeria, and never to be recalled to France, whatever the danger at home might be? The case was the same with India, although it was further from the mother country. It had been suggested that we might safely rely upon the loyalty of the local force, who would not hesitate to volunteer for service at home if any great danger should threaten us; but he would ask whether it would be wise to enact that those men should serve only in India, and then rely upon the chance of their being willing to break through that arrangement in case they were required at home? Then, again, it was said that to bring home troops would be unjust towards India; but he could not see why it would be so. We might require trained veteran troops at home to cope with European armies, but younger and less experienced men would be fit for India; and again, it was not intended to take away troops from India in such a manner as to weaken our hold upon that country. If they assumed that the Government would act with common sense, as upon other matters, there was no force in that objection. He had suggested that the difficulty, if any existed, would be met by keeping a home battalion for each regiment serving in India, and for a time transferring the younger soldiers to India and bringing home the older and more experienced men. There was one last consideration that ought not to be overlooked in dealing with this question. He believed the maintenance of a local force did not conduce to the cultivation of a spirit of loyalty to the Imperial Government and the Crown. It created local feelings, prejudices, and views, which might become paramount. He thought it was necessary that every man in India should feel that he was a soldier in the service of the Queen of England. Although this change might cause some expense, yet that expense would only be commensurate with the advantages it would confer on the soldier by affording him greater facilities for exchanging the unhealthy climate of India for that of their native country. All the objections that had been raised seemed to him to be of a slight and untenable character, and therefore he hoped there would be no further obstruction to the passing of this measure, which would both increase the efficiency of the army in India and the military resources of the empire.

Mr. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he was glad that the Bill had found a supporter, and one who had stated the case with great ability. For the first time in the history of this nation disloyalty had been imputed to our countrymen, at whatever distance they were from England, and it had been declared that they were not to be trusted in India. The authority of the Duke of Wellington had been most erroneously quoted as having anticipated disaffection in India, and the Secretary for War seemed to think that he contemplated such a danger as was now spoken of. But the fact was that, though in the extract read the Duke of Wellington believed it possible that officers living far away from their country might, under circumstances, be led away from their duty, he expressly declared his opinion that the British soldier, whether belonging to the Company's service or in the Queen's army, would remain firm. It was by the trust that we thus reposed in our countrymen, of whatever rank and in whatever part of the world they might be, that the Emperor Napoleon was so much astonished, and he was the only person who had ever yet imagined that it was possible that England might, by the arms of her own children, be deprived of her Eastern empire. What proofs were there that the local troops had ever indicated the slightest desire to league with the Sikhs to drive the Queen's troops from India? He challenged the right hon. Gentleman to show that the slightest ground existed for the suspicion that Englishmen serving the Indian Government would prove disloyal. As to the proposed measure, the onus probandi lay upon those who proposed the change, and not upon those who supported the existing local army. The fact was that our Indian army was an exceptional army, because India was an exceptional empire. The two things had grown up together, and, if one were abolished, who could say how long the other would remain? In truth, as we had given up localizing the Government of India our tenure of that country had become more and more precarious. The Secretary for India had no right to ask the House now to come to a vote on this question. In the first place, he could not refute the charge of producing garbled extracts from the papers. That had been done in Colonel Durand's case; a paper was printed and a letter of Colonel Durand, who found that two paragraphs had been extracted from it, and he was informed that that officer had sent to The Times the whole of his correspondence with the right hon. Gentleman on the subject. How could they tell the other papers had not been mutilated in the same way? Then, again, was it the practice for Colonel Baker, the Military Secretary, to keep papers in his office for two months when they were forwarded to him for examination? Of all the Indian papers presented this year none had been kept back so long. Another point for consideration was the mode in which the Indian Council had been treated. He understood that the right hon. Gentleman announced one day to the Council that the Cabinet had come to the determination of abolishing the local army, promising that the week afterwards the subject should be brought before the Council in the shape of an order to stop the enlisting of troops for the Company's service; but the right hon. Gentleman up to that time had never brought the subject before the Council; and so he now told the House that he could not produce the minutes of the Council upon the subject, because the Council had never discussed it. He contended that it was contrary to the letter and the spirit of the Act of 1858 that the question had never been submitted to the Council. It was intended by the Act of 1858 that the Council should transact the general business of India, and the Act even provided that in the case of a difference between the Secretary of State and the Council, if the Secretary of State did not defer to the opinion of the majority he should record his reasons for differing from them; and that the Council, on the other hand, should record their protests against his decision. It was never contemplated in 1858 that great questions of policy should be disposed of by the Secretary for India alone, and that fifteen gentlemen with salaries of £1,200 a year each should be kept to deal with ordinary business which might be transacted by a staff of clerks. The clear object, then, in view was that these gentlemen, being of great experience in Indian affairs, should be consulted by the Secretary of State on matters of importance, and that their opinions should have due weight with him. The members of the Council were prevented by the Act from sitting in Parliament, or otherwise many would be there. The House of Commons had not the advantage of their presence. They had been taken away expressly to assist the right hon. Gentleman, who now, however, would not assisted by them. Instead of sending them one or two at a time into his room, the Secretary of State should have had the whole thing openly discussed in the Council Chamber, where all the arguments pro and con, might have been heard and met, and why had he done this? Because he knew that every one of them was against his scheme. As it was he thought the Bill ought to be adjourned until a full investigation had taken place. The right hon. Gentleman said that in 1858 a person must have possessed a supernatural foresight who could anticipate that the differences which had arisen with the men would result seriously. But the letters which the Government had received from Lord Clyde and others had apprized them of the difficulties to be encountered, and should have warned them not to treat the matter so lightly. General Mansfield also had written to the same effect. As regarded the cause of the complaints, the officers had done not a little to encourage them, by representing that the demands of the troops would certainly be complied with by the Home Government; and the speech of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was itself sufficient to mislead uneducated men. When the opinion of the law officers was first taken on the subject, he believed they declared that the attestation of the East India Company's troops did not render them liable to the service of the Queen. The men, therefore, felt themselves oppressed, and mutiny was the result. What had taken place with regard to the Chinese troops, was not a parallel case. Their claim was referred home and was acceded to, and no thought of mutiny entered their minds; but did anybody believe that if the reply had been unfavourable, they would have gone contentedly to China? This bill, by which the military government of India was transferred from Calcutta to the Horse Guards, was diametrically opposed to the maxims of the greatest authorities, who always held that India should be governed as much as possible in the country itself. Lord Dalhousie, Lord Ellenborough, and Lord Canning, all men eminently qualified to judge of Indian matters, were all opposed to its principle. That the object of the Horse Guards was to get additional power, was shown by the course of the examination before the Commission. At present the Commander-in-Chief in India had no communication whatever with the Commander-in-Chief in England; but under the terms of this Bill he would correspond officially with the Horse Guards, not alone in relation to British troops, but to the whole Native army, which was to be commanded by British officers. It became important to know on what subjects he was to correspond, and how it would be possible for the Commander-in-Chief in England to regulate the internal economy of 300,000 men abroad, and at the same time not to receive any accession of influence. The effect, he believed, would be—though perhaps contrary to the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman—to transfer the control of the whole Native army from Calcutta to London. Whether or not this was the intention of the right hon. Gentleman this would be the result, since the Native army would be officered by British officers belonging to the army under the Commander-in-Chief at the Horse Guards. Still less was he able to understand the reasoning of the Government with respect to the Staff corps. An officer appointed to the Staff was struck off the strength of his regiment; but one of the advantages of his new position was that he was able to serve in any part of the world. In the case of a war in Europe a man would naturally long to be on the spot where fighting was going on, and though he were well acquainted with the habits and language of the people, and might be on the way to become an Outram or a Lawrence, there would be nothing to localize his services, and these, in all probability, would be lost to India; he would, as the Duke of Wellington once did, insist upon joining his brethren in arms in the field. Again, if the war happened to be with Russia, and intrigues were taking place in the East, there would often be struggles between the home and the Indian Governments for an officer of remarkable ability, who was peculiarly fitted to cope with Asiatic duplicity. There would be a divided allegiance between Calcutta and the Horse Guards, and who could doubt which would prove the strongest? At home, again, the power would be severed into two departments, that of the Commander-in-Chief and that of the Secretary of State for War. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood) had stated that the present Bill would not trench upon the power of the Governor General in India; but it had been well said that in Eastern nations the power of the sword was immense, and those who had filled the office of Governor General seemed to be of opinion that by the Bill that means of upholding authority would be destroyed. It was also contended that under the existing system the discipline of the local army was at a low level; but, if the test of discipline was to be supplied by the conduct of troops in the field, he could not understand how that argument could with justice be urged in favour of effecting a military revolution in India. What constituted discipline? The conduct of the men in face of the enemy; and the army which was now said to be so undisciplined that its individuality must be destroyed was the same that had been victorious at Delhi and Lucknow. Three years ago the discipline of the local army was sufficient to save an empire, but it nevertheless did not appear to have reached a standard which could satisfy the Horse Guards. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India endeavoured to justify the change which he proposed on the ground of the discontent which had prevailed in that army; but the letters which he had received in the May and June of last year were quite as strong on that subject as any which seemed to have reached him since he had declared himself in favour of the maintenance of the local army in the following August. Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman had not at all condescended to tell the House what the circumstances really were which had led him within the space of ten months to be the advocate of two lines of policy in themselves perfectly inconsistent. As to the question of expense, it was at present left quite in the dark, whether the army in India when amalgamated with the Royal army would be dearer or cheaper than the local army; but there was one point of importance on which they had the means of forming an opinion—all the evidence proved that the standard of health in the local army was higher than that of the Queen's troops serving in India and the rate of mortality lower. He considered Lord Ellenborough's maxim a wise one, "to disturb as little as possible." India was not like England and could not with safety be constantly subjected to great changes. If, indeed, the right hon. Gentleman were to turn his attention to internal reforms in the affairs of India, and to seek to improve the administration of justice there, much good might be effected in that direction. But, instead of doing that, the most complete stagnation appeared to prevail in his Department until he had been roused into his present condition of unfortunate activity. He should, however, remind the House that, if they assented to the right hon. Gentleman's proposal, on them the responsibility of the mode in which it would operate would ultimately rest. We had guaranteed the rights of 6,000 officers, and one of the reasons he understood why Sir P. Grant acceded to the Government scheme as stated in a suppressed despatch was that he despaired of having justice done to a local army from head-quarters; that as might, however, it was surely fair that the House of Commons should endeavour to reconcile the proposed change with the fulfilment of the guarantee which he alluded to. Besides, they gave to the Queen's army the posts which were the subject of guarantee given to the officers. If the right hon. Gentleman severed with his Bill, of course he would be successful in the division; but he was bound to explain how far the authority of the Governor General was to extend to the interior discipline and management of the army in India. If that was satisfactorily explained it would take away part of the objectionable character of the plan. There was another point on which the Duke of Wellington had laid stress—how were they to keep the officers of the three Presidencies separate if they officered them all from one army? They could not long keep up the difference between these local armies after they had obliterated it in the officers in command. It was said this question should be looked at not for India, but for England. He looked at it in an Indian point of view, and not because he wished to see the course of the war which would redound most to the benefit of both countries. In a case of emergency it would not be practicable to transport troops from India to this country so as to be speedily available, for there was no analogy between the instances of Egypt and India and France and Algeria. Algeria was only forty-eight hours sail from France. In a British point of view, it was thought it better to have a local army in India. If a reserve was wanted, it should be kept in England. For these reasons he was against the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman. It had not been proved that it would be more economical. It had not been proved that the health of the European troops would be better than that of the local army in India. It had not been proved that this scheme would not injuriously affect the power of the Governor General, and he very much feared it would be found to introduce the principle governing India in London instead of Calcutta. Mr. GREGSON said, that as the most eminent military authorities were divided on this subject, he took the liberty, as a Member, of offering a few remarks upon it. He had lived in India, where he acquired the highest estimate of the bravery and discipline of the officers of the local army. If we were now about to take the first step towards dispensing with the Native army and the local European force, he should state very much; but the work was done for us—the Native army had melted away with the mutiny, and the European army had virtually ceased to exist; and it seemed to him that the time had therefore come when we should cease to have a royal army and a local army in India. There should be but one united army in the country. He was glad to hear that the Horse Guards was not to interfere with the authority of the Governor General. Under the proposed amalgamation of the forces he trusted that every encouragement would be given to officers to reside in India, and acquire the Native languages. The greatest mischief had resulted from the want of a cordial understanding between the European officers and the Sepoys, from the inability of the former to speak the Native dialects. High prizes should, therefore, be held out to spirited young officers to learn to converse with the people of India in their own tongue. This might be done by continuing the allowances formerly granted, and by offering Staff appointments to those who qualified themselves to receive them. He believed that John Lawrence and other Indian officers had given honest opinions on this subject; they were necessarily prejudiced. Not only the officers of the Queen's service were not wholly free from bias on this question, but he thought the preponderance of prejudice rested on the side of the local Indian officers. We had abolished what was called "the double Government," but it was equally desirable to get rid of the double army. They would thereby put an end to the jealousies which now existed between the two services. We must retain a certain proportion of Native troops, as experience had proved the inexpediency of enlisting the high caste Natives. The army in India at present was out of all proportion to the necessities of the case. He believed that a force composed of half the number of men would be quite sufficient, and that by such a reduction £10,000,000 a year might be saved to the Indian finances.

Mr. Ayrton

Mr. Danby Seymour

SIR FREDERIC SMITH said, that he would not have troubled the House but for the reflection made upon the discipline of the Indian army by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets. He trusted that the additional papers that were now asked for would be produced as early as possible, for there might be in them matters which would induce hon. Members to modify or change their opinions. The change proposed by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for India was put forward on three grounds:—First, a saving of expense; secondly, increased efficiency; thirdly, better discipline. He believed with Sir Bartle Frere that financial considerations were the most important with which we had to deal in respect of India at the present moment; but he very much doubted that the plan of his right hon. Friend (Sir Charles Wood) would conduce to economy; the evidence, indeed, was quite the other way; the force we had now in India was quite beyond the requirements of the case; and, on the whole, he thought it clear that economy would be best secured by keeping things as they now were. Then as to efficiency, what had we to complain of on that head? The efficiency of an army consisted in its being well drilled, and its being able to turn out the greatest number of men per 100 into the field at any moment. Now, in this latter respect it was quite evident from the returns on the table of the House that the local European army stood better than the Line. With regard to discipline, the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had said that the Indian army was in a state of complete indiscipline. He did not think the hon. Member was well informed on the matter. They could not have better judges on such a subject than Sir William Mansfield and Sir Hugh Rose, both of whom had repeatedly eulogized the Indian force in their orders of the day. It had been said by his right hon. Friend the Secretary for War that the school in which the officers of the local European force were trained was a bad one. His right hon. Friend assumed that those officers were always in the first instance placed over Native troops; and then he argued that, because those troops were docile soldiers, the officers were not, on their appointment to local European regiments, able to acquire command over men who, to use his (Mr. S. Herbert's) words, "were not so easily led, and whom it was more difficult to drive."

[Second Night.

But the officers who exercised authority in the local European force were not taken from commands in the Native force. Cadets on their arrival in India reported themselves to the Adjutant General of the Presidency, and were then appointed either to the one force or the other; and in that force they passed the rest of their lives unless selected for Staff or Civil employments. He should be glad to know in what respect there was a want of discipline. But if it did exist, who were the cause of that state of things? Not the officers, not the men; but the Government, who persevered in that vicious system by which the best officers were taken from the regimental force and sent to Civil appointments or were placed on the Staff. That system had been strongly condemned by many able men, and, amongst others, by General Cotton. He (Sir Frederic Smith) gathered from his right hon. Friend the Secretary for India that under the new Bill officers would be taken from the Queen's service in the same manner. There could not be a greater evil or any course more likely to destroy the efficiency of the army than to give occasion for the feeling that the regimental duty could be escaped. If the system now proposed is to be carried out, he hoped that the most important point of all would never be neglected — namely, the efficiency of the regiments. In reference to the strength of the army in India, it did not appear to him that under a proper arrangement of the troops they would require 80,000 men with 200,000 Native police. The Sepoy mutiny in India was put down by only 42,000 European soldiers, though there was a large army arrayed against them. If steps were taken to produce a Native army, having a greater attachment to this country, he thought that the right hon. Gentleman would find a much smaller number than that which was proposed sufficient for all purposes in India. In his opinion, if the troops were skilfully disposed, and great care taken to have head-quarters at a suitable point, much less than 80,000 men would suffice. It should be recollected that India had a deficit of £7,000,000, and was, therefore, not in a condition to maintain a larger army than was absolutely necessary. He should wish to see the right hon. Gentleman place a map before the House, showing how he proposed to arrange these forces. If they were well arranged there was no doubt but that a smaller number of men would suffice. With regard to the jealousy of the two armies towards each other, he did not believe that such a feeling existed to any such extent as to prove injurious to the public service. He believed that the feeling existing was one rather of great mutual respect towards each other. He was anxious to know how the Native troops were to be officered, whether they were to be officered by the selection of the Crown or by the Secretary for India. He asked whether the officers to be appointed to the Native corps were to be continued with them throughout their term of service, or to be transferred at any time to the Line. He was afraid that if officers were to be permanently placed over the Native soldiers they would lose caste. He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman would obtain so many officers from the Line to fill Staff situations as he expected. He (Sir Frederic Smith) had seen officers belonging to the depôts of Chatham, Portsmouth, and other places, go out with great reluctance to India, except during the time of war. Being naturally anxious that the interests of the country should be well considered, he respectfully had made these observations; and he earnestly trusted that whatever course the right hon. Gentleman adopted it would be successful.

Sir Frederic Smith

COLONEL SYKES said, the opponents to this Bill had been charged with something very like factious conduct for endeavouring to delay its progress until full information was laid before the House, when, in fact, if anybody could be charged with factious conduct, it was the 200 Members who rushed in at the second division and voted without ever having heard a word of the debate. During the debate on that occasion the House varied from 23 to 38 Members, and to-night, when the attempt to count out was made, it had sunk as low as 17 Members; but at the sound of the bell a host of Members, who had not heard one word of the arguments on either side, rushed in and supported the Government. That was the tyranny of numbers, and the faction of the ignorant against the informed. The arguments he had heard urged in favour of the Government Bill might be arranged under the following heads:—first, the mutiny of the European troops; second, the indiscipline of the army of India; third, the deterioration of the local army by climate; fourth, the anomaly of two armies in India; fifth, the present narrow field for the selection of officers for Government employment; sixth, the Staff not taking the field, proving the want of mili-

order and discipline in the local army; ninth, the jealousy existing between the armies; eighth, the inability to raise a necessary number of European regiments in case this Bill should not pass, and finally the array of eminent men in favour of the proposition of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles Wood) stated that he had lost all confidence in the local army, and that their untrustworthiness was gone; and that was the reason for his change of opinions: but that were the facts. The so-called mutiny occurred three months before the right hon. Gentleman passed his Bill for increasing the local European troops in India from 10,000 to 30,000, and he was aware of what had occurred. He could not then have thought the troops untrustworthy, or would not have passed his Bill; why therefore the present change? Another argument was that the Government passed the Bill because the preceding Government raised the number of European troops beyond the legal number authorized by Parliament; but he found from a Return presented to the House that in August last there were 3,156 cavalry, which had been sent out to replace the ten Native regiments disbanded. Those were mere boys, it was the indiscipline of some of them that caused alarm. There were likewise 12 artillery and 9,846 infantry, making a total of 20,104 men. At the same time there were 2,000 men at the depôts; consequently, there were less by nearly 2,000 than the Act of Parliament authorized. Therefore that argument of the right hon. Gentleman that the Bill was passed to legalize an Act of the preceding Government was not supported by the fact. Then to the next head of objection, the indiscipline of the army. All he could say in regard to that charge was, that in every action they took part in, they had sufficient discipline to beat the enemy. Sir Henry Darnley, Commander-in-Chief of the Bombay army, Sir George Pollock, and any other eminent men in India, testified truly to their merits. The testimony of the celebrated Havelock, with reference to the discipline and valour of these European regiments, was conclusive. Speaking of the 60th Fusiliers, or "the blue caps," as they were called, which regiment had been 10 years in India, and which some people thought might have become deteriorated totally in courage and physique, he said— "Owe the blue caps thanks—they owe me nothing. If I may select and praise any regiments without being invidious, I should say that they and the Highlanders are the most gallant troops in my little force." But indiscipline, it would seem, was not confined to local regiments, for recent accounts from India went to show that courts-martial were proceeding in some regiments of the Line at a great rate, and that in one regiment alone there were 53 in one year. It was asserted that the physique as well as the morale of the regiments that had been long in India was deteriorated. The Secretary for War, however, had testified from Official Returns that the health of the local troops was superior to that of the regiments which had only been a short time in India. To show the frightful mortality which was experienced by European troops before they were acclimatized, he would give the House one single example. Out of 99 recruits received by an artillery regiment at Dum Dum, in Bengal, 21 died within three months after their arrival; 33 within the next three months; 7 within the next three months; 6 within the next three months; and in all 67 out of the 99 within the first twelve months. That was the consequence of pouring fresh European blood into India, instead of keeping on the men who had been acclimatized and had adapted themselves to the country. The usual loss was from 7 to 10 per cent the first year; about 7 per cent for the next three or four years; and then about 5 per cent for the succeeding six years. The House might, therefore, think what would be the consequence of relieving 8,000 men every year as was proposed. But that was not all. One of the great advantages arising out of the system that now existed, in connection with permanent residence, would be entirely done away with by the plan proposed—of having new regiments annually sent to India and exposed to all the dangers of climate. When they first landed in India, everything was new to these troops—the country, the black faces, the heat, and the habits of the people, and, following a European to-be-deprecated practice, they called the Natives "niggers," and treated them as such; but consequent upon permanent residence, their prejudices gradually wore away; they looked upon the Natives as comrades, and a fraternization sprang up between them. Here was the advantage of what he had alluded to. We could not keep India except through the goodwill of the people, and that was only to be won by kindness on the part of Europeans. The number of the Europeans was a mere handful to the millions of India, and would always be insufficient to maintain our authority with permanent hostility between the races. We could not safely legislate upon a class system, and it was because he thought this measure would be most disastrous in its ultimate results, and to our future security in India, that he opposed the Bill. The fourth anomaly alluded to was the having at one and the same time an army of the Queen and a local army in India. It was an anomaly, however, that had existed for three-quarters of a century, and without inconvenience. At first the local troops had always predominated, but gradually the troops of the Line increased, and of late years the proportions were about two-fifths of the local to three-fifths of the Line, and if the system has been found successful, why alter or disturb it? Did not the same anomaly exist in the army in England, where there was the Line and the Marines? The next argument was, that the local army offered a very narrow field for the selection of officers for staff and other employments in the public service; but the change now proposed could not make any alteration in that respect for officers of the Line at present were equally eligible for staff or other employment if qualified with those of the local army. The field of selection therefore would remain the same as before. Another argument in favour of the present Bill was founded upon the statement that the officers of the Indian army shirked their duty in the field, preferring to remain on staff appointments. This was a most unjustifiable assertion, and contrary to all experience. The fact was that the Government had laid down the rule that certain appointments could not be filled by acting officers, and therefore, if those who held them did not accompany their regiments into the field, the fault was to be attributed to those who framed the regulation in question. In his own regiment the officers brought an officer to trial because there was a semblance only of his shirking his duty in the field. Sir George Pollock had expressed his indignation at the accusation which had been made against the military ardour and soldierly zeal of the officers of the Indian army, and had stated that when he commanded in Afghanistan there were only two officers on the Staff absent out of his entire force. Sir Hugh Rose mentioned the case of an officer on the Staff who did not accompany his regiment, but it was found upon inquiry that it was owing to the interdiction of the Government; he was divisional paymaster, and not permitted to go; but there was no doubt that if the Commander-in-Chief had addressed the Government on the subject the Government would not have refused. There were certain rules laid down by the authorities for officers on detached employ taking the command of their regiments, and if they were enforced it was the fault of the Commander-in-Chief. Again, it was said that jealousy existed between the two services in India. Such might have been the case formerly when local officers had no rank west of the Cape of Good Hope; but the Queen's Order of 1855, obtained at the instance of the present Lord Lyveden by giving Indian officers rank with the Royal officers all over the world, removed all ground for jealousy, and it did not now exist. He did not agree with the Secretary for War in thinking that the continuance of a local army would injure the Queen's army by absorbing recruits. Why should it for the future more than it hitherto had done? He would undertake to supply the complement of 30,000 men without drawing from the Royal army. He considered 30,000 men a sufficient force of local troops; indeed, 20,000 would suffice. It was said that the local troops were not trustworthy, because they had mutinied. How was it, then, when a portion of the troops came back to England, the officers who were described as not being trustworthy, were actually enlisted by recruiting sergeants into the Queen's army. He conceived they had rights which they were justified in asserting, and the Government by the course they had taken had admitted the justice of their claims. With reference to the effect of amalgamation on the interests of the officers of the local forces, notwithstanding the guarantees, it must be prejudicial; an Act of Parliament guaranteed to the officers of the Indian army certain rights and privileges; it guaranteed their pay and pensions, seniority, promotion, and the orphans' and widows' funds. Supposing the armies to be amalgamated, and vacancies to occur in the Indian regiments, the officers who were in would not be entitled to the same privileges as the other officers, as they would be on the footing of the Line, and in the same regiment there would be different rights and privileges. Amalgamation, under these circumstances, seemed impracticable. He was amazed when he heard the Secretary for War state that all officers of the Indian army below the rank of captain were for amalgamation. He had had some experience of the Indian army, and he would venture to say that scarcely one officer in one hundred had expressed that desire which the right hon. Gentlemen described as being the desire of all under the rank of captain. He had received letters stating that the writers had read the observation with surprise, and one of them suggested that the assertion must have been founded on the expressions of boys who had gone out within the last few years, and who desired to get home again to their friends. Under the proposed arrangement he believed that a conflict of authority between the home and local Governments would be apt to arise—that is, between the Secretary for India and the Governor General on the one side, and the Secretary for War and the Home Commander-in-Chief on the other. There was no guarantee that former abuses in appointments to the Staff would not be multiplied, and the filling up the vacancies in the body of 4,982 officers of the local army, would throw a serious amount of patronage into the hands of the Horse Guards authorities. The only way in which that evil could be prevented would be to confer certain powers of appointment on the Governor General, and to define very clearly in the Bill the limits of the authority of the Secretary for War and the Horse Guards. The gallant General who sat on the Commission had remarked that, as a rule, all the officers of the Line were for, and all the officers of the Indian army against this Bill. That told very strongly against the measure. All who had experience of Indian service, who understood the European character in India and the habits and prejudices of the Natives, were averse to the amalgamation of the two forces, while the advocates of the change consisted of those who had been in India for but a very short time, or not at all. It was knowledge on the one hand against ignorance on the other. He would vote against the Bill, and hoped his right hon. Friend in the interests of India would not persevere with it.

[Second Night.]

Colonel Sykes

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER said, that he must be pardoned for saying that the right hon. Gentleman had fallen into great errors in his statements with regard to the Indian army. The right hon. Gentleman had urged it as an argument in favour of amalgamation that it would render the Indian forces more available than they had hitherto been for service in different parts of our dominions. Was it necessary for him to tell the right hon. Gentleman that from the earliest period of history the armies of India had rendered most important services to the Sovereign in other parts of the world besides India? Had the right hon. Gentleman never heard of its services in Java, or the Mauritius, or of the expedition up the Red Sea to Egypt to assist the expedition under General Abercrombie? He knew of no occasion when the Indian army did not display the utmost zeal and alacrity in coming forward in defence of British interests, no matter in what quarter of the world. The hon. Member for Aberdeen (Colonel Sykes) had spoken of himself as the only Sepoy officer in the House; but he begged to say that he himself had served for sixteen or seventeen years in the Native army of India. He had acted as adjutant and as interpreter; he was well acquainted with the feelings of the people of India, and he thought that the amount of troops necessary for that country had been much exaggerated. He believed that by mixing the various castes of Natives together in single regiments, together with a greater degree of care and vigilance on the part of the European officers, a Native force might be kept in such a state of discipline and efficiency as would render necessary a comparatively small number of European troops. The European force should not be dispersed and broken up in numerous and unhealthy positions; but should be kept massed together in well-chosen and salubrious localities. He wished further to say in support of the union of the two armies, that he had had the pleasure of meeting many distinguished Queen's officers. He might mention Colonel Gardner, who commanded a troop of local horse in Bengal; Colonel Fisher, who did the same, and unfortunately lost his life in the massacre of European officers. There was also M'Cann, of the Lancers, who was an excellent linguist. He had risen to offer these few remarks to the House, principally actuated by a desire to disclaim the statement made by the hon. Chairman of the late Board of Directors to the effect that there was not a Sepoy officer in the House but himself.

COLONEL NORTH wished to know how the statements which had been made as to the high discipline of the European portion of the Indian army could be reconciled with the remarks contained in the despatch of Lord Canning which had recently been laid on the table. The noble Lord wrote as follows :—

[Second Night.]

"I would, if necessary, sacrifice something even of perfection of discipline. The European troops of the East India Company's army were much below those of the Line in this respect, and probably it would not have been possible to keep them up to the mark of their brother soldiers trained in England; but neither officers nor men had fair play. It appears that these troops, forming as they did a very small fraction of the Indian army, had been until lately almost overlooked by their successive Commanders-in-chief. Upon no other supposition can I account for the fact that there did not exist for the Bengal European regiments any code of instructions or regulations teaching the officers the first elements of their duty."

The noble Lord went on to say,—

"I know of no mode of effectually or speedily training the local European troops to the required degree of efficiency which is more likely to be successful than that of obtaining for a time from the Line regiments, whether serving in India or elsewhere, the assistance of officers of experience. No doubt this measure will be, to a certain extent, distasteful to the officers of Her Majesty's Indian forces, and not without some unpleasantness to the officers of the Line selected for the purpose."

Anything more degrading than such a course would be considered by officers of the Royal army, if applied to them, he could not conceive, and he could not understand how the officers of the Indian force could submit to such a degradation. Lord Canning added,—

"I am aware that it is the opinion of many high authorities that the maintenance of perfect discipline will be difficult if two distinct English armies are preserved in India, and that the complete order and economy of regiments is greatly promoted by their return, from time to time, to home service. I do not contend that, if judged mainly with reference to soldierly efficiency, the question would be decided more satisfactorily by substituting one army for two."

Surely, however, soldierly efficiency was the great thing to be looked to in the constitution of an army. Suppose that in some garrison town there were stationed a local European force and a force of Queen's troops, and that something like mutiny had broken out. Would it be pretended that the Queen's soldier must be punished, but that the offence of the Company's soldier was not to be looked upon in the same light? He admitted that the conduct of these local troops came as near mutiny as was possible; but there had also been the greatest mismanagement. The mere fact that when the case was sent home for the opinion of the Home Government a lawyer's opinion was sent back was quite sufficient to cause a mutiny. He had no doubt that if the matter had been explained to the men on parade, as would have been done in the Queen's service, the mutiny would not have happened. The most painful thing in the matter was that there was not a single non-commissioned officer, from the serjeant-major to the lance-corporal, who acquainted his officer with the mutiny that was going on. There could be no doubt of the gallantry of the Indian army, but there was a great difference between gallantry and discipline. Not numbers or drill, but discipline, marked the soldier. The efficient soldier was the disciplined soldier on whom a thorough dependence could be placed.

Colonel North

SIR CHARLES WOOD: Sir, I presume that, although the adjournment of the debate has been moved, yet as every speaker has treated the question as if it were a continuation of the debate on the second reading, I may also be justified in so treating it, and that under these circumstances I hope I may be permitted to bring the debate to a termination. Sir, my hon. Friend the Member for Poole has said that there is one sufficient reason for not proceeding with the second reading of the Bill, and that is, that I have kept back some papers which a week ago I was accused of suppressing. [MR. HORSMAN: Hear!] Whether these papers were printed as soon as they should have been is another matter; and whether the delay occurred through the fault of the printer, or that of the Military Secretary to the Indian Department, is an affair with which I have nothing to do. Very high testimony has been borne to the character of that officer, which I can entirely and strongly confirm. I certainly heard that duplicates of these papers had been lying in the India office, and in the hands of some members of the Council, but I had not seen them, nor was I aware that the printing of them was not being proceeded with as fast as possible. Although, however, these papers have afforded some occasion for discussion, I do not think they would have advanced the case of those who have opposed this Bill; on the contrary, I think they would have confirmed the statements I made, in the speech I made on introducing this Bill to the House. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster has taunted me with having given a military opinion. Sir, I never gave a military opinion. I quoted the opinions of Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield, who were as well entitled to form a military opinion upon what was passing under their eyes as the hon. and gallant Member for Westminster. What do these papers prove? They prove exactly what I stated—namely, that Lord Clyde took a very different view of the mutiny of the European troops in the summer and autumn of last year from what he had originally entertained, and that he thought it a much graver question. These papers prove that in November he did not think very much of the matter, but that when later in the spring on the final announcement of the intention of the Home Government of India, the mutiny took place, and still more so as the proceedings went on he considered it decisive against the maintenance of a local army. It is clear also from the dates of many of the letters that much of the information upon which the Government came to their conclusion did not reach us until October, November, and December. An hon. Member, who says that the change in my opinions simply arose from the mutiny, misunderstood what I said. I stated several reasons why I had come to a different conclusion from that which I held in the summer of last year. One of those reasons did not occur until late—namely, the melting away of the local army. Mr. Hammack's Report was not made till November. I said, that in the first instance, I was unwilling to depart from the decision of the late Government. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets has charged me with having bound myself to that decision without sufficient consideration. If I am guilty of any charge, it is that to which I should be most disposed to plead guilty. Sir William Mansfield and Sir Patrick Grant are military officers of high character, and who were on the spot, and their opinions were changed by what occurred in the spring and summer, and the same change has been made in other men's minds too by this occurrence. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War stated the other night for himself that which I can state for myself, that it was only after great doubt and hesitation that I slowly and gradually came to think that the course which I now propose is the right and safe course to adopt. I never complained of the variety of opinions expressed by hon. Members who oppose this Bill. When I have hesitated so long myself, I have certainly no right to complain of those who have been still longer in coming to the same decision; I have, however, not heard anything during this debate to shake the opinion I have formed. I will very shortly recapitulate the circumstances that have occurred. The decision of the late Government was to maintain two-fifths of the minimum European force in India. This, however, did not satisfy the advocates for the maintenance of the local army. Lord Canning recommends 80,000 as the present force of India. The Political and Military Committee of the Council of India recommend 78,000 or 79,000. Several requisitions have been made by the different Presidencies during the last few months, the maximum being 95,000, and the minimum 79,000. The hon. Gentleman is not, therefore, entitled, I think, to throw discredit upon the calculation that 80,000 is about the number which, as recommended by the Commissioners on the Organization of the Indian Army, ought in future to be maintained in India. I join in the hope expressed by my hon. Friend, that this number may hereafter be reduced; but we have at present the high authority of the Governor General, the Military Committee of the Indian Council, and the Commander-in-Chief at every Presidency, that not less than 79,000 European troops ought to be maintained in India. The Bill I introduced last summer for covering what had been done during the late Government in increasing the local army beyond its legal limits has been quoted as a proof that I then intended to increase the Indian army. But in introducing that Bill I stated the reasons why I moved it, and I said that I was not thereby to be considered as pledged in respect to the re-organization of the Indian army. I stated distinctly that that Bill was not to be considered as in any way prejudging the question of the re-organization of the Indian army. I have a very few words to say with reference to the alleged garbling of papers. A number of letters were received in the autumn bearing on this question. I felt myself justified in having them printed confidentially, for the use of the Cabinet and the Indian Council, and memoranda founded on them were drawn up by three of the members of the Military Committee of the Council, also for the use of the Cabinet and the Council. Up to the time when the hon. Member for Aberdeen moved for the production of these papers I was not aware that they were known to any but those to whom I had directed them to be sent, and I still regarded them as confidential papers. I told my hon. Friend that they were so, and could not be produced to the House; but in conversation with some of my colleagues at the India House I found that there was a wish on their part for the production of the memoranda. It was obviously impossible to produce the memoranda without the documents, to which they were an answer, I wrote therefore to Lord Elphinstone, and letters were addressed to Lord Clyde and Sir William Mansfield to obtain their authority to give publicity to extracts from their letters, and as soon as I received an answer by telegraph, authorizing me to do so, I announced to my hon. Friend my intention to produce all the papers. The House will see that before this I had no authority to publish the letters on which the memoranda were grounded. I had then to look over the papers for publication. Amongst the letters printed confidentially for the use of the Cabinet and the Council of India (as the memoranda originally were), were some that I had no authority to publish, and I therefore omitted them from the papers given to Parliament. In Colonel Durand's memorandum there were two paragraphs, which were mainly in reference to one of these confidential letters, and contained an extract from it. I thought them also calculated to give offence, which I was anxious to avoid. I pointed out these two objections to Colonel Durand, and stated my opinion that the two paragraphs should be omitted. He expressed his unwillingness to withdraw anything which he had written, but added that the responsibility rested with me. I certainly understood him to state no other objection on his part; but I certainly could not place on the table a paragraph containing a quotation from a letter which I had no authority to publish. I should have been guilty of most improper conduct if I had published either the letters or paragraphs with an extract from them, without the authority of the writer. This, Sir, is the garbling of which I have been accused. These papers came late in the autumn, and they were carefully considered by the Cabinet, and led us gradually to the conclusion at which we have arrived. Considerable stress has been laid on the circumstance that I did not consult the Council, and that I have not produced the document in which they protested against this measure. It is true that I did not consult my Council collectively on the subject, but I communicated fully and freely with the members of it individually, and gladly heard the opinions they had to express.

{Second Night.

Sir Charles Wood

An hon. Gentleman had said that, according to the Act, I was bound to consult the Council, and that, when consulted, they had a right to enter a protest if they did not agree with me. I think, however, that on a close inspection of the Act it will be seen that there is no ground for this interpretation. This is an important point, on which Gentlemen may very fairly have very different opinions, for in practice there is nothing to guide us. The House must remember that the creation of a Secretary of State with a Council is a novelty in this country. The Secretary of State for India is put over a Council many of whom were members of the old Court of Directors, so that, with the best intentions on both sides, it might be expected that occasionally a difference of views would exist. The Secretary of State, however, is the supreme authority, and must decide for himself in all such cases. The matter was fairly and frankly discussed among us. I apprehend the state of the case is this, that what a Secretary of State for the Colonies may do by himself, the Secretary of State for India must do with the Council. No executive act can I do except after communication with the Council. I may overrule them, but I must consult them. This, however, I think only applies to duties of the Secretary of State as an executive or departmental officer. If the majority of the Council decide upon any point, the minority may dissent and record their dissent. The Secretary of State may overrule the whole of the Council, and the same power of recording dissent, or opinions would arise, but to enable them to record their dissent there must be a question proposed and decided by the Council. The 23rd Clause runs thus—

"In case of any difference of opinion on any question decided at any meeting, the Secretary of State may require that his opinion and the reasons for the same be entered in the Minutes of the proceedings, and any member of the Council who may have been present at the meeting may require that his opinions and any reasons for the same that he may have stated at the meeting be entered in like manner."

That is, I say that there must be a meeting of the Council, at which a question is proposed and decided, to enable the Secretary of State or any member to record their opinion. In this case the question had been decided by the Cabinet that we should introduce a Bill for the reorganization of the Indian army. It was not a question to be decided by the Council, nor was it one in which the Secretary of State could act himself. The late Government did not come to an opinion upon this question of the Indian army, and announced that they had done so. My noble Friend did not consult his Council, and I think he was not. In like manner I did not consult the Council in an official way, so as to enable them to record their dissent to the plan. They were not entitled to be consulted, for the question could be brought before the Council for their decision until the Government had determined what should be done. I was, however, anxious to afford them the best opportunity of recording their opinions, and the Cabinet having decided on the 17th of May that a Bill should be introduced for the purpose of putting an end to the Indian army, I on the 17th of May stated the fact to the Council, and said, "Many of you may wish to record your opinions upon this question, and, therefore, I propose to write a letter to the Horse Guards to stop recruiting, some of you may dissent, and though I may overrule your opinion, it will enable any member of the Council who likes it to record his dissent." That was the case within the 23rd Clause of the Act, and would give them the first and ultimate opportunity of recording their opinions. They did not avail themselves of my offer, and so matters remained till the last Council day, when some papers were placed on the table. The heading of one of them was reasons against the termination of Her Majesty's Government, &c. I did not conceive that the Council could record its opinion against a dissolution of the Queen's Government, and I did not formally receive the papers. When I was asked this evening to produce the protests I postponed my answer in order that I might have this opportunity of explanation. The members of the Council did not avail themselves of my offer on the 17th of May, many saying it was too late, and that they should have been consulted before; but, as they did not avail themselves of the opportunity I offered them, I did not think it necessary to force it upon them. About a week afterwards I heard that there was a desire that the same opportunity should be given, and I said I was willing to do so, but I have heard no more of it since then. On Thursday several papers were put into my hands—protests, resolutions, and memoranda, some referring to the scheme of the army, some against their not having been consulted. I said, I cannot say what I shall do with them, but I will take the opinion of my colleagues." I laid them before the Cabinet, and we all agreed, upon what we believed to be the construction of the Act, that these documents could not be received in their present shape; but if put into proper shape they may be received as protests against any act of mine as Secretary of State. I will give the Council the same opportunity as I before offered. These points have been urged so strongly, that in justice to myself I have felt bound to state fully the reasons why I do not think it would be right to produce these documents. The late Government did not consult the Council, neither have we. I have followed the course which the noble Lord who so ably preceded me in office pursued. Let it not be said, then, that there has been any attempt to suppress or conceal those papers. There is one other point I must notice. I have been taunted with bringing on a short Bill, but I am surprised at that charge. The commissions of Indian officers, and all questions of pay, purchase, and promotion, are settled not by an Act of Parliament but by the Indian Government, and all the details of any arrangements are not, and could not, be introduced into the Bill. But I thought it right and necessary to take the opinion of the House of Commons upon the subject—before taking any step whatever—to make them share the responsibility of this measure and become parties to the proceedings of the Government—and therefore I introduced this Bill. The same result, however, might, if the majority of my council had agreed with me, have been attained without coming to Parliament, and under those circumstances, the only object being to obtain the concurrence of Parliament, I thought the shorter the Bill to which that assent was obtained the better. It would have been impossible to introduce all the details of promotion and exchange into an Act of Parliament. The general principle of the alteration proposed by the Government is a simple one—namely, that there should be no local European army; that the European force in India should be part of the Queen's general army; that a Staff corps should be formed partly from the present Indian officers and partly from the Line officers, and that ultimately all the Native regiments should be officered from the Staff corps. That general scheme is the one to which we ask the assent of the House, and I think the bare statement of the plan answers the objection that under the new system there would be any difference of grades, and that one officer will be looked down upon by others. How that can be, when all the officers are taken from the same source, I do not know, and so far from there being any such difference, it seems to me that now for the first time there will be perfect equality of feeling between all classes of officers. With regard to the question of expense, what I stated was put in the shortest possible form. Assuming 80,000 for the number of European troops, Mr. Hammack states the additional expense of troops of the Line. Now, if for two-fifths of that force you substitute local troops, the saving will be two-fifths of that additional expense, in round numbers, £184,000. I stated, therefore, that the increased cost of substituting Queen's troops for a local force, to the extent of the two-fifths as proposed by the late Government, would be under £200,000, though I do not at all believe that any such cost will be incurred, I said that if the measure be a right one, and if the efficiency of the army will be greatly promoted by the change, a matter of £200,000 ought not to be allowed to stand in the way of such a change. With regard to the supply of officers, I believe there will be an adequate number from the Line, but there will be ample time and opportunity of trying the question. For some time the officers of the local Indian army must of necessity fill the greater part of the Staff appointments. So far there are more candidates from the Line than there are vacancies to be filled. But at present there are not in Bengal officers enough for the Staff appointments and the regular regiments. That deficiency may be supplied to some extent by the cadets, of whom there are upwards of 200 to go out; but the ultimate result of the system as to whether the Line officers come in or not can only be tested by experience. If those officers do not come in, of course other means must be taken. The hon. Member (Mr. H. Seymour) stated that the Duke of Wellington did not entertain the opinion attributed to him on this question; I will not again trouble the House by reading the words of the Duke of Wellington, but the extract which was read from his despatches, corroborated by the extract read by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Herbert), showed the Duke to be completely of opinion that the army in India should be a portion of the Queen's army. Lord Cornwallis, also, five years after he first went out to India, and with that full experience of India, prepared a detailed plan for the amalgamation of the two forces, but owing to the rejection of the scheme I believe, in the Court of Proprietors, was never carried into execution. Of the arguments which I have heard during the course of this debate have shaken my opinion on the merits of this question, I think it especially desirable that we should have no delay, at all events beyond what is absolutely necessary for the discussion of the subject. All the authorities have urged that it is important to lose as little time as possible in the settlement of the question. If the measure be carried by an overwhelming majority in this House, the effect will be generally satisfactory in India; but, at any rate, do not lose time in coming to some decision or other; do not hesitate to legislate merely for the sake of delay.

[Second Night.]

Sir Charles Wood

MR. A. MILLS (who rose amid cries for a division) said, his object in opposition he had given to the Bill was not to delay legislation, or to imperil the Indian Empire. The right hon. General had now promised that the protest of the Indian Council should be laid on the table, and, as his only object in the contest was to bring forward an opinion which existed on this subject, he thought it had been that the House should have the advantage of possessing the views of those Gentlemen, he could not give his support to a Motion which merely delayed.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: What was, that I would give the Council the opportunity which I offered them on the 10th of May of recording their dissent if they choose to avail themselves of it. I shall not have the slightest objection to the production of the documents. My Friend says I promised to produce the papers; that is quite another matter. I cannot say whether they will avail themselves of the opportunity. Do not be again accused of a breach of faith. I cannot produce the papers unless they put me in a position to do so.

MR. A. MILLS said, his object in opposition he had given to the Bill was not to delay legislation, or to imperil our Indian Empire. His opinion of the Bill remained unchanged; but as the right hon. General had now promised that the protest of the Indian Council should be laid on the table; and, as his only object in the contest had been that the House should have the advantage of possessing the taken by those Gentlemen, he could not give his support to a Motion which merely sought delay. He would therefore join in the suggestion that the Motion for the adjournment of the debate should be withdrawn.

SIR CHARLES WOOD: What I said was that I would give the Council the opportunity which I gave them on the 17th of February of recording their dissent, and if they chose to avail themselves of it then I had not the slightest objection to the production of the documents. My hon. Friend says I promised to produce the papers; that is quite another matter, for I cannot say whether they will avail themselves of the opportunity. Do not let me be again accused of a breach of faith. I cannot produce the papers unless they put me in a position to do so.

MR. HORSMAN hoped that his hon. Friend, after the explanation which had just been afforded, would not press his Motion for the Adjournment. He assumed, of course, that in case the Council availed themselves of the opportunity afforded them, and recorded their dissent, the right hon. Gentleman in laying that expression of opinion on the table of the House would allow time for it to be considered before proceeding with the next stage of the Bill. [Cries of "Withdraw."]

MR. SPEAKER: Unless the hon. Member for Westminster is present the Motion for Adjournment cannot be withdrawn.

Question put, and negatived.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 282; Noes 53; Majority 229.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^d, and committed for Thursday, 12th July.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolutions reported.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY called attention to the fact that the Estimates for the Revenue Departments, the Customs and Inland Revenue especially, were always placed higher than was necessary. For example, for some years past the House had been called upon to vote £220,000 a year more than was expended, showing that the Estimates were very loosely framed. He asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the discrepancy could be explained, and whether care would be taken in future to prevent it?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHE-

QUER, said, there were two questions involved in this subject;—one of a general character and the other of a character peculiar to the present year. The changes contemplated in the Revenue Departments under the financial measures of the Government at the commencement of the Session, were of a nature to bring about, in the course of the year, a considerable contraction of expense; but it was impossible to make any allowance for that in the Estimates, because they did not consist of a lump sum, but were made up of detailed and minute provisions for all the different officers of the establishments; and it was impossible to say with any security, beforehand, the precise nature of each reduction. Therefore, as far as those reductions were concerned, it was not possible to make any allowance for them. With regard to the general question, namely, the expenditure of the Revenue Departments, so far as he was informed, he believed the case to be this: The principal difference was not in the Customs or Inland Revenue Department, but in the Post-Office Department. This was of a nature that rendered it impossible to make a close estimate. In the first place, constant changes in arrangements in detail were made with regard to the minor offices, and in the next there were also changes with regard to the railway companies, the contracts for the carriage of mails, and the uncertainty of the rates they might have to pay made it impossible to give a very close estimate. Where it was not possible to give a close and accurate estimate, it was the duty of the Revenue Department to give such a one as would cover the outside expenditure. At the same time he admitted this was a question in which the House was entitled to insist upon a searching inquiry; and he would afford every facility to the hon. Baronet for that purpose.

Resolutions agreed to.

POOR LAW BOARD CONTINUANCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS moved the second reading of this Bill, on the understanding that an opportunity for discussing it should be afforded on the Motion for going into Committee.

MR. HADFIELD hoped that full time would be given for the discussion. There were many things connected with this Board which it was generally believed it would be as well to change.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be satisfied that the powers of the Board should be renewed until next Session—when the House might have a full opportunity for discussion. One of the Secretaryships, in his opinion, might be well dispensed with.

LORD FERMOY also begged to add his voice to that of the hon. Member who had last spoken, that the powers of the Board should be continued only for one year. If the right hon. Gentleman would not consent to that, would he give an assurance that the Committee on the Bill would be brought on, when there might be an opportunity for full and fair discussion?

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that the Bill consisted solely of one clause, which proposed the extension of the powers of the Board for five years, and he did not see why that need prejudice the question whether those powers should be restricted or not. It had often been suggested to take powers only for one year, in order that there might be an opportunity of discussion; but any one who had any experience of office must be aware how very much the action of a Department is paralysed when its powers are limited to one year. He should be disposed to vote for this Bill, and he thought five years better than one; but if any hon. Gentleman were to raise that question, he would suggest that it be done on going into Committee.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, that the extension of the powers of the Board for five years was a question of principle, and as the Bill consisted only of one clause, the discussion would be more properly taken on the second reading.

MR. MONSELL said, that the Secretary to the Poor Law Board had repeatedly stated that it was his intention to introduce a Bill this Session in order to get rid of the admitted hardship and cruelty which prevailed with regard to the removal of Irish paupers. He should not oppose the second reading of this Bill, provided his right hon. Friend would say that he was about to introduce another Bill this Session. Otherwise he should be disposed to oppose the Bill.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE thought it was a rather Irish mode of dealing with the grievance. How the opposing this measure could compel the bringing forward such a Bill as the hon. Gentleman desired he could not conceive. If the Poor-law Board had the strongest intention of dealing with the grievance (which he admitted was a great grievance), there would not be the slightest possibility of having a Bill introduced with a chance of passing in the present Session. He would urge his hon. Friend not to be led away by blandishments of hon. Members to limit the continuance of the Bill to one year.

Mr. Hadfield

MR. BEACH and Colonel DICKSON indicated the limitation of the Bill to one year.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that Gentlemen who were opposed to the construction of the Poor-law Board should not hesitate to express that opposition whether in Committee or on the second reading. There was a strong feeling in the country that this Board was not required; and when the Board was first established by Lord Althorp a distinct assurance was given that as soon as the system was regularly organized throughout the country its powers should cease. It might be necessary to give the Board time to wind up its affairs; but there was nothing in the constitution of the Board which an under-secretary might not perform, and that without the expensive machinery which they had at present.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, if the right hon. Gentleman would not give an assurance that there would be an opportunity for discussing the Bill, he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day month.

COLONEL GILPIN was of opinion that the Board was too large, and with the introduction of electric telegraphs the expense of the Commissioners might be dispensed with.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it would be impossible to fix an early date for the House should have an ample opportunity for discussing the provisions of the Bill on going into Committee.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Report.

House adjourned at a quarter of eight after Two.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, July 3, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1st Railway Trains, &c.; Labourers' Cottages (Scotland); Ionian Islands (Marriages).
2nd Masters and Operatives; New Zealand Commutation; Local Government Suppl. to the Poor Law; Tenison's Charity.
3rd Spirits (Ireland) Act Amendment.
ROYAL ASSENT.—Public Improvements; Ireland; Ecclesiastical Courts Jurisdiction; Petitions of Right; Bankrupt Law (Scotland) Amendment.

BERWICK-UPON-TWEED ELECTION.— HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD (the Earl of ST GERMAN) reported The QUEEN'S Answer to their Lordships' Address of the 14th of June last, as follows:—

"MY LORDS,

I have received the joint Address of the Two Houses of Parliament in reference to the Report made by the Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed to try a Petition complaining of an undue Election and Return for the Borough of Berwick-upon-Tweed; and I have given Directions accordingly for the Appointment of Commissioners for the Purpose of making the Inquiry prayed for by the Address."

SLAVE TRADE.—CONSULSHIP AT MO-ZAMBIQUE.—HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

THE LORD STEWARD (the Earl of ST GERMAN) reported The QUEEN'S Answer to their Lordships' Address of the 25th of June last, as follows:—

"MY LORDS,

I have received your Address, praying that I will appoint a Consul at Mozambique, with a view to promote the Interests of Commerce and the Execution of the Treaties between Great Britain and Portugal upon the Slave Trade.

And you may be assured that the Subject shall be carefully considered."

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES BILL.
COMMITTEE NEGATIVED.

Order of the Day for the House to be again in Committee read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that the only result of the delay which had taken place with regard to the Bill was the presentation of a Petition in its favour from a meeting of the United Cabmen, held in Milbank Street. He thought their Lordships ought not to promote petty legislation. The object of the Bill was to require every publican to use an instrument which was the subject of the patent.

LORD TEYNHAM said, the patent expired in June last.

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES].

LORD CHELMSFORD said, it was clear, then, that the noble Lord was not aware of the fact when he brought in the Bill, for he had actually introduced a clause to annul the letters patent. If the patent had expired, then, what was the object of the Bill? Probably the patent had not been very successful, and the object of the Bill would be to compel the publicans to purchase the machines which were in the hands of the patentee. He moved that their Lordships go into Committee on the Bill that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months").

LORD TEYNHAM said, the object of the Bill was to do justice between man and man where justice was not now done.

On Question, That ("now") stand Part of the Motion? Resolved in the Negative; and House to be again in Committee this Day Three Months.

MASTERS AND OPERATIVES BILL.
SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD ST. LEONARDS, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said it was not anticipated that it would directly operate against such a strike as had lately taken place in London. It was hardly possible for any Council of Conciliation to give effect to any proposal when a strike had actually taken place, and when each party, exasperated against the other, looked simply to its own means of carrying its own object. It is not a difference between a master and a workman, but between two classes. It becomes a trial of power simply. The men attack the masters in detail; the masters act together and stop their works. The men then declare it is a masters' lock-out. But should this Bill be passed, and Councils of Conciliation be established, it was hoped that the association of masters and operatives in these Councils upon minor disputes, which must arise from time to time, would produce such a good understanding between them as to prevent strikes taking place at all. When their Lordships reflected on the amount of misery and loss of capital that had resulted from strikes in this country, they might well desire to try whether they could not devise some means to prevent their occurrence in future. If they looked back through the last twenty years they would find that the pecuniary loss occasioned by strikes was not to be estimated by hundreds or thousands or tens of thousands of pounds, but by millions; while the amount of human suffering—of misery to the operatives and their families—could not be estimated by money. The funds of their benefit societies are misapplied, and the demands of sickness and accident left unprovided for. When a general strike took place it afflicted the working classes by a sort of moral paralysis, which rendered them powerless, so far as their working energies were concerned. Serious differences between masters and their workmen had hitherto in too many instances ended in strikes—how different might it not be if the masters and operatives could be brought together in order that they might come to a satisfactory settlement of the matters in dispute? If the relation between masters and operatives were fairly looked at, it would be seen that the operative was really a limited partner in the concern in which he was employed, but without risk in the capital expended. He drew his share of the money earned, and so partook of the profits, but without liability to make good the losses. It was obvious, therefore, that he had a direct interest in the continuance of the business, and that mutual confidence and regard between the employer and the employed were essential to the interests of both. The late strike arose out of the demand on the part of the men to receive ten hours' pay for nine hours' work, which was refused by the masters. Now, it was not pretended by the men that they could accomplish in nine hours the work that had hitherto been done in ten; but it was acknowledged that the object of the strike was to compel employers to engage a larger number of men to perform in nine hours the work which now occupied ten, the present rate of wages being maintained, and in that way it was supposed a number of men who had hitherto been unemployed would obtain employment and wages. Such a proceeding was a violation of all the laws of political economy, and if successful would remove the question of wages from the natural influences of supply and demand. It was not possible by any law to strike at strikes. It was perfectly lawful for the men to combine, and therefore to strike, but they must not conspire. Many attempts had been made to prevent the evils arising from disputes between masters and workmen, but in vain. In France the attempt had been made with greater success. Belgium has made a feeble effort. In 1806 Napoleon established councils for the adjustment of disputes between masters and their workmen. They were composed both of manufacturers and workmen, but the manufacturers greatly the preponderance of influence. This Conseil de Prudhommes the chairman, right, was filled by the manufacturers. There were five manufacturers to five overlookers. The chairman acted gratuitously, and his whole time was unpaid. The workmen were paid. In 1809 the Councils were somewhat differently constituted, the election to the Council was by the whole body of the manufacturers and overlookers in the town, and the president and vice-president were elected from their own body. In this country the overlookers were understood to be the mere agents of the master, but in France they were altogether regarded in that light. In the revolution of 1848 there was of course a cry for equality. A new law was passed placing the masters and workmen on the same footing of equality, and they together formed the Council of Conciliation. The constitution of these Councils established a singular system of cross voting. The workmen chose nine of their body, of whom the masters selected three, who then presented the workmen. The masters in turn had to choose nine of their body, of whom the workmen selected three, who then represented the masters. The workmen chose a president out of the masters, the masters a president out of the workmen, who presided for three months alternately. This scheme under which great numbers of workmen were admitted to work well, and the consequence was that in 1853 the law was passed upon which the Councils of Conciliation were now established in France. The workmen elected their own representatives in the Councils. No workman before he was entitled to be elected must be twenty-five years of age, must have worked five years at his trade, must have resided three years in the district for which he voted. A workman must be qualified to be elected a member of the Council must be thirty years of age, must be able to read and write, and be qualified as an elector. The masters were required to be patentés for which they were taxed. These restrictions excluded great numbers of workmen. The President and Vice-President were appointed for a term of three years by the Emperor, but he could not select from the Members of Council.

Lord St. Leonards

They were removable at pleasure. This power may suit France, but it would not be tolerated in England. In addition to the Councils a Bureau de Conciliation was established, before whom both masters and workmen were brought. It consisted of two persons only, one a master and one a workman, being Members of the Council, and they were required to sit every day from eleven to one o'clock. In every case the matter in dispute must be brought in the first instance before the Bureau. If the Bureau did not succeed in settling the disputes, the parties then went before the Council of Conciliation, which had judicial powers, without appeal, up to 200 francs, so that it could compel the parties to come to an understanding and to enforce its award. Imperfect as this tribunal was it worked a wonderful amount of good in France. A vast number of disputes had been amicably settled in the first instance before the Bureaux and which consequently never came before the Councils at all. These tribunals, however, only operated on past transactions, and never had taken cognizance of the question of wages. The French understood strikes, however, as well as we do. Sir Joseph Paxton had stated, before a Committee of the other House, that he had to construct a work thirty miles out of Paris. There were 200 French masons employed and a number of English masons. The English masons were more expert than the French, and the French, finding that they were not obtaining the same wages, became discontented, although they got the highest wages ever earned by masons in France. Some disagreement arose in consequence; but the question being one of wages, it was not a case for the Councils, and the men without notice left the works, and compelled their employer to agree to their terms. Having called their Lordships' attention to the French law, he would briefly state what was the present state of the English law, in relation to these matters. In our Potteries the masters and workmen have been in the habit of agreeing in meeting to refer disputes. In Macclesfield there was a Council of Conciliation, but it meddled with wages and was broken up. In the reign of George II. an Act was passed by which all disputes between masters and workmen in the cotton trade were referred to justices of the peace. In the reign of George III. an Act was passed, giving the masters and men the power of referring disputes to arbitration, or to a magistrate. This Act, however, was defective in many particulars and never came into practical operation. In 1824 a Committee was appointed to inquire into the whole subject. It sat for thirty-six or thirty-seven days, and examined 122 witnesses. They recommended in their Report the establishment of courts of arbitration extending to all trades. The result of that Report and recommendation was the alteration of the combination law, and the enactment of the 5 Geo. IV., c. 96, which was still the law. It embraced disputes between masters and workmen in any trade or manufacture in Great Britain or Ireland respecting the price to be paid for work done, or in the course of being done. But the justices were not to establish a rate of wages or price of labour or workmanship at which the workman should in future be paid unless with the consent of both master and workman: either party may compel an arbitration. If parties so agree, the magistrate is to decide. If they disagree, the justice is to propose not less than four nor more than six persons—half masters, half workmen—each party to choose one out of his own class to decide. If they fail to do so the magistrate is to decide. In either case the decision is final. By section 13 of that Act, masters and operatives might by agreement have recourse to any other mode of arbitration they might choose, and any award made in any arbitration under such agreement could be enforced as legal. This provision he thought was just and proper and he had adopted it in the present Bill. The law, then, as it stood gave masters and workmen the option of going before a magistrate to obtain a decision upon their differences, or they could select referees, or they could adopt any other mode of arbitration they pleased. The section to which he had referred had unfortunately become a dead letter, but the existing law gave all power to adopt by agreement any form of arbitration they chose. [A noble Lord:—Then where is the necessity for this Bill?] The necessity of the Bill was that under the section of the existing Act there must be a fresh nomination of referees to decide upon each particular case. What the masters as well as the operatives desired was a court to which they could have recourse in all cases of dispute, and which should have jurisdiction to decide all points in controversy. The Act was absolutely a dead letter, and even those persons who had been most active in "strikes" were ignorant of the existence of a law which permitted arbitration in cases of disputes. The present Bill had been recommended by high authorities. The Committee of 1824, which sat thirty-six days and examined 122 witnesses, reported that the practice of settling disputes by arbitration between masters and workmen had been attended with good effects, and that it was desirable that the laws which direct and regulate arbitration should be considered and made applicable to all trades. In 1856 a Committee, which sat sixteen days and examined twenty-eight witnesses, reported as follows:—

"From the evidence before them, your Committee cannot but arrive at the conclusion that the attention of the Legislature might with advantage be directed to the subject of this inquiry, and are of opinion that the formation of Courts of Conciliation in the country, more particularly in the large commercial and manufacturing and mining districts, would be beneficial. Your Committee would suggest that such a measure might be introduced as an Amendment in the present Arbitration Act, by a reconstruction of that Act in the 10th and 13th sections, by which means both masters and operatives would be enabled, each from their own class or calling, to appoint referees, an equal number by each party, having power to elect a chairman, unconnected with either side, having a casting vote. Such a tribunal to be appointed for a certain period, and not for any particular controversy."

They were further of opinion that it was desirable that the Secretary of State should have authority, on application being made to him, to license courts of this description, and that immediately on the establishment of such courts they should be invested with full powers to decide all questions of existing contracts which might be referred to them. Again, the Select Committee appointed in the present year, which sat eleven days and examined fourteen witnesses, came to—

"The unanimous opinion that the voluntary formation of equitable Councils of Conciliation would tend to promote a more friendly understanding between the employers and employed, to soften any irritation that might arise, and in most cases to prevent the growth of such a spirit of antagonism as too often leads to a strike."

And they added,—

"Your Committee have considered the Bill which has been referred to them by the House, and are unanimously of opinion that if the Bill passes into a law it will promote the welfare of and good understanding between masters and operatives, and be advantageous to the country."

These three Committees of the other House,
Lord St. Leonards

after much deliberation, and after hearing many witnesses, had all come to the same conclusion, and their opinions would, he hoped, have due weight with their Lordships. In taking charge of this measure he had considered it neither as a workman's nor a master's Bill. He was actuated by no class prejudices, but regarded this simply as a great social question, and only recommended the Bill because he believed it was calculated to create an amicable feeling between masters and workmen, and to prevent those strikes which were attended with such deplorable results. The Committee who recommended and reported this Bill in the other House included amongst its Members, Sir Joseph Lubbock, Sir Morton Peto, Mr. Cubitt, and other capitalists and employers of labour. Much fault had been found with the Bill in its present shape, but if their Lordships allowed it to go into Committee, he would endeavour to frame it so as to obviate all objection in point of form. The Bill would assume this form—the first step would be to go to the Crown for a licence; when the licence was obtained, the Court of Conciliation was to have the powers which now existed under the Act of George IV., with the important qualification that the Court was to have jurisdiction unless the question in dispute was submitted to it by both parties, so that the Bill would not give any power at all to the Court of Conciliation unless both parties went before it; but after both parties had chosen to submit any question to the Court there would be power to compel them to go on, although one or the other might wish to withdraw. But the power to enforce any award which would be made would remain with the magistrates. In imitation of the French law, he proposed that the Council should name a Committee of Conciliation before whom, in the first instance, all matters in dispute should be referred. He defied any one to show that there was any difference in principle between the law as it now stood and the Bill, in the shape in which he intended to present it to a Committee, and the House would bear in mind that it was not proposed to repeal the Act of George IV., so he, therefore, trusted their Lordships would allow it to be read a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, that great was the respect which he bore for the character, abilities, and great legal attainments of his noble and learned Friend the

it was with the greatest hesitation he proposed his Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day three months; but his noble and learned Friend had failed to remove the grave objections to which the Bill was open. He (Lord Ravensworth) thought their Lordships ought to interfere as little as possible between the masters and operatives. He could hardly think the existing law was so inoperative as the noble and learned Lord represented. The Bill came before their Lordships not recommended, so far as he was aware, by any expression of public opinion, or backed by the authority of acceptance by the other House: it rested simply on the authority of a Select Committee of the House of Commons. But, although the Report of a Select Committee of the House of Commons was, no doubt, entitled to respect, there might be substantial reasons why their Lordships should hesitate before they gave implicit confidence to the recommendations of such a body. It was quite possible that the Members of the Committee might have been influenced by prejudice, and might have conducted the examination of witnesses so as to support their own views. He was confirmed in these suspicions by the singular unanimity which prevailed in this Committee and among the witnesses, and by the fact that the evidence of the only witness who went counter to the views which they entertained was quickly cut short. Parliament ought to give more consideration to this important subject before any new legislation was attempted with regard to it. He held that the present law might be modified and amended so as to meet the requirements of the case, without bringing forward a measure like the present. The great difficulty was to find a fair and impartial tribunal, and in his opinion there were insurmountable objections to the machinery proposed in the Bill. The Councils would of course, include two antagonistic elements—the representatives of the workmen would uphold one view, those of the masters another. The question was how the Chairman was to be appointed. None of the witnesses examined before the Committee appeared able to solve the problem. One suggested that the President of the Council of Conciliation—which, in his belief, would prove only a council of wrangle—should be selected by lottery. Another proposed that the masters should appoint the Chairman one day and the workmen the next; but the result of that proceeding would be simply to reverse the votes on alternate days. The witnesses generally objected to the more rational proposition of arbitration by the justices. The witnesses objected that to go before the justices would have the appearance of a criminal proceeding; but was not this sad trifling? Was there anything criminal in the existing system under which masters and the servants employed in agricultural husbandry went before a bench of magistrates or the Petty Sessions, and a more impartial tribunal could not be found. He believed that a Court of Petty Sessions would be more likely to give a satisfactory judgment than a Council of Conciliation chosen as proposed by this Bill, and presided over by a Chairman about whose selection possibly great difficulties had arisen. There were much graver objections to the Bill, which the noble and learned Lord seemed to acknowledge when he stated that he should offer some Amendments in Committee. Let their Lordships reflect upon the number of Councils of Conciliation which would be necessary. It was stated that there were not less than 400 separate branches of trade in this country, employing no less than 2,695,000 workmen, to whom the provisions of the Bill might apply. It was clear that if Councils of Conciliation were established there must be one for every separate branch of trade. A Council of Conciliation for bricklayers, for example, could not adjudicate upon the disputes of smiths or carpenters. It was a remarkable fact that the Bill came out of the Select Committee to which it was referred with three grave faults that did not exist in the original Bill. Such a fact was not calculated to create confidence either in the measure itself or in the authority of those by whom it was recommended. By the sixth clause it was proposed that for the purposes of the Act each person, being twenty-one years of age, belonging to the trade having a licence for a Council, and being an inhabitant householder or part occupier of any house, who had resided and been a master or workman in such trade within the limits of the place in which a Council of Conciliation was formed, was entitled to be registered as a voter, and qualified to be elected a member of the Council. Thus the Legislature was asked to constitute a multitude of small Parliaments, elected by the universal suffrage of all those engaged in trade, who had only to show that their names were on the registry in order to have the right to vote. The expense of these proceedings would be considerable; and how were they to be borne? There must be a clerk of registration; and how was he to be paid? The Bill contained no provisions on this point; but the witnesses examined before the Select Committee admitted that the working of the Act must be attended with considerable expense. Something was said about defraying the expense out of the rates, or, if that were objected to, throwing them upon the Consolidated Fund. The latter proposal was not likely to obtain the consent of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; nor would the magistrates in Quarter Sessions feel disposed to meet the expenses out of the county rates. That some alteration and amendment might be made in the present law on this subject he did not deny. Those defects, however, would be in no degree remedied by such a measure as the present, and would be, in his opinion, rather aggravated than cured by Councils of Conciliation chosen under the machinery of the present Bill. For these reasons he trusted that their Lordships would not agree to the second reading of the Bill; and that, in the words of a series of carefully drawn objections to the Bill, they would not pass 'a hastily prepared and ill-digested measure, which would probably be attended by disastrous consequences.' The noble Lord concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time on that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months").

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he would not enter into a dissertation on the details of the Bill as proposed for a second reading by his noble and learned Friend, but wished to state the reasons for the vote he should be compelled to give. His noble Friend who had just sat down had stated various objections to the machinery and provisions of the Bill, but he had, at the same time, stated that, in his judgment, the existing law, though not so wholly inoperative as represented, at all events required and was capable of, amendment. In a matter of such importance as that of obviating the mischief that arose from misunderstandings between masters and employers he thought their Lordships might be induced to give a favourable consideration to a measure that professed to effect that object, and more especially supported as it was by the high authority of his noble and learned Friend who introduced the Bill; and more especially also when the subject had received long and serious consideration, and the measure had apparently resulted from the almost unanimous recommendations of a Committee of the other House. He did not pretend to say that there were not many points in the Bill which it was necessary should receive most careful consideration in Committee. His noble and learned Friend had pointed out several provisions to which he was prepared to amend in Committee some that had arisen per incuriam and others that had been injuriously introduced since it was introduced into the House. Considering that the Bill was one that had gone through the examination of more than one Select Committee, the Bill appeared with a singular infelicity of expression, and therefore if their Lordships consented to give it a second reading, he thought it should be referred to a Committee to amend its phraseology, and to examine its provisions with a view to rendering it more acceptable as a legislative Act. Considering the high authority that supported the principle of the measure, the confessed inadequacy of the existing law, and the strong feeling that the representatives both on the part of masters and workmen entertained on the subject of constructing some machinery should supply remedies and obviate defects in the existing law, he should regret to see their Lordships summarily reject the second reading of the Bill, thereby not postponing the measure for further and more careful consideration, but in point of fact, debar themselves altogether, and declare, moreover, that they would not deal with a matter which the House of Commons had declared was deserving of consideration, and which their Lordships did not deny. If there was a division he should be prepared to vote in favour of the second reading, but at the same time, he wished to add his voice to that, not only with regard to minor points, but others of greater magnitude, the Committee would require the gravest consideration, and he should certainly be sorry to see its present state to give it a third reading.

Lord Ravensworth

EARL GRANVILLE said, if the question were put for or against the Bill in its present shape, he should vote with the noble Baron opposite (Lord Ravensworth) because upon the admission of all parties there never was a Bill so imperfectly drawn as that which they were considering. In a Bill relating to such a delicate matter as the relations between m and workmen the utmost correctness and nicety of expression were particularly necessary, but this Bill was admitted to be so imperfect that it was clear the noble and learned Lord had not examined it very minutely before he introduced it. This was a subject on which the working classes took a deep interest, and he would be sorry that the House should appear to treat it lightly or in a summary manner. If he had been rightly informed, however, this Bill had been before the House in three successive Sessions, but had failed to pass until the present Session, when it was read a third time, the withdrawal of the Reform Bill having given an earlier opportunity than was expected. He did not believe that the Bill could be properly considered in Committee of the Whole House, and therefore he would submit to the noble and learned Lord whether it would not be well to refer it to a Select Committee, in order, if possible, to convert it into a practical measure that would be satisfactory to all parties.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Bill in its present shape should pass into law he should congratulate himself, but he was no longer Lord Chief Justice, and a great part of that functionary's time would be occupied in hearing applications for writs of mandamus, of prohibition, and certiorari arising out of this Bill. In fact, the Bill would not work at all, and would only make "confusion worse confounded;" but he agreed that it was not desirable to appear to treat the subject lightly, and, in assenting to the second reading, he would urge upon his noble and learned Friend the propriety of referring to a Select Committee.

LORD STANLEY OF ADDERLEY said, he would not oppose the second reading, or reference to a Select Committee, if it were at all likely to result in the production of an effective measure, and that it would not hold out false expectations that there was a chance of settling differences between men and masters. He did not think the measure was workable, and no provision was made to meet the large expenditure it would involve.

LORD RAVENSWORTH was willing to withdraw his Amendment, upon the understanding that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said he was willing to adopt that course.

Amendment, by leave, of the House, withdrawn. Then the original Motion agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly; and referred to a Select Committee. And on Thursday following the Lords following were named of the Committee:—

Ld. Chancellor	L. Overstone
Ld. President	L. Cranworth
E. Derby	L. St. Leonards
L. Ravensworth	L. Wensleydale
L. Brougham and Vaux	L. Belper
	L. Kingsdown

NEW ZEALAND BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE, in moving the second reading of the Bill for the better Government of the Native Inhabitants of New Zealand, and for facilitating the purchase of native lands, said, that the measure did not arise out of the unfortunate disturbances that had recently occurred in New Zealand, although it originated from a similar state of things as that which had led to those events. It was intended, and he hoped would have the effect of conciliating the Natives of the country, and creating a better feeling between them and the English settlers. Since the subject of New Zealand was last under the consideration of their Lordships, now some seven years ago, the greatest progress had been made by the colony. Of late years education had made great advances among the Natives, who now had accounts in the savings banks, were engaged in industrial pursuits, and were possessed of vessels in which they carried on a considerable portion of the coasting trade of the colony. He need only appeal to these facts to show the immense progress which they had made in civilization since the passing of the Constitution Act, seven or eight years ago. Concurrently with their progress the Natives manifested a strong opposition to any infraction of their rights, and for some time past they had been impressed by the fear that the settlers sought to extinguish their nationality: they dreaded a complete absorption among the colonists, and, fearing to lose the possessions which they regarded as their birth-right, they showed an increasing indisposition to part with their land, even upon fair and equitable terms. They were also dissatisfied with the laws which existed for their own regulation. Comparing them with the laws under which the English settlers lived, they thought that the two ought to be assimilated, and that they were not governed under such favourable conditions as they had a right to look for. This was the feeling of the Natives. On the other hand, the colonists also had a cause of dissatisfaction. They had increased greatly in number and in wealth, and there had consequently been a growing demand for land. They were conscious, of course, of their power as a superior race, and those who had recently arrived in the colony did not evince that tolerance for the habits and feelings of the Natives which generally characterized the older settlers. In this state of things his attention had been drawn several months ago to the state of the colony, and the question arose as to the remedy which should be applied. The question was, in whose hands the power to deal with the land should be placed. New Zealand, as their Lordships knew, like most of the colonies of Great Britain at present, possessed a responsible Government, and the natural and easy plan would have been to place in the hands of that Government such powers as might be thought desirable for the purpose of producing a better state of feeling between the Natives and the settlers. But there were certain questions concerning the Natives in which the Government of New Zealand could not be considered the best medium for communication with them. The present case was an exceptional one. It almost involved a question of good faith as regarded the Natives were they to place this power in the hands of the local Government; because it was not to the English inhabitants of New Zealand, it was to the Crown that these territories had been ceded by the Natives; the Natives had submitted themselves to the good Government of the Crown, and hitherto, though occasions had arisen when they had shown distrust towards the local Government, they had reposed confidence in the Imperial Government—should they succeed in proving to them that that confidence was well placed he hoped they would be able to revive in the Natives that spirit of loyalty which had not in late years distinguished them. There was another reason why the management of the Natives should not be left to the local Government; and that was because, if quarrels arose between them, as was now unfortunately the case, and if these resulted in an outbreak, it was upon the Imperial Government that the whole expense of quelling such an outbreak fell.

The Duke of Newcastle

We had therefore, a strong pecuniary interest in measures the result of which would be to remove the cause for any quarrels. Under these circumstances, after communicating with the Government of New Zealand, it was resolved to institute a local Council, upon whom should devolve the revision of the Native laws, and the arrangements respecting the sale and purchase of Native land. It would be recollected that in the New Zealand Government Bill the management of Native lands was reserved to the Crown. No machinery existed in the Act, however, to carry that provision properly into execution; and it therefore became a dead letter, and there was a constant tendency to allow these questions to be dealt with by the local Government. It might be thought difficult to form a Council for the purpose of carrying out these measures. But there were notoriously many Englishmen living in the colony who possessed jointly the confidence of the Natives and of their brother settlers, and if this Bill passed, he thought the Government would have no difficulty in recommending to the Crown a sufficient number of persons who were independent of the constant changes of Government which occurred under the existing system, who should constitute a permanent Council, and in whose hands, so long as it was necessary, those questions should be placed. In reference to these questions of land, it might be convenient that their Lordships should know that at present the whole of the southern islands was practically in possession of the English settlers. Of the northern, 7,000,000 acres had been purchased by the colonists, and 26,000,000 still remained in the hands of the Natives. Much of this land was, of course, utterly unavailable, and of no sort of value to its possessors; but there was much that the Natives would be glad to dispose of to settlers on terms of advantage to both parties. He proposed that the Council should consist of not less than three, or more than seven persons, to whom the Crown should transfer the powers which it possessed, but which it had never yet been able to exercise. This Council would only continue a certain number of years, as its duties might be expected eventually to die out. He did not know that any further explanation of the Bill was necessary. He repeated that it had not been brought forward in consequence of the disturbances in New Zealand, although he hoped that its effect, if passed into a law, would be to arrest their progress. The Bill was drawn before the news of any outbreak reached this country. It would maintain intact the rights of the settlers, while at the same time the feelings and prejudices of the Natives would be more respected than at present. He had no reason to apprehend the opposition of the colonists to the measure. On the contrary, he believed they would view with satisfaction the formation of an independent body to make such arrangements as they must feel that the local Government, from its constant changes, was not competent adequately to carry out. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

LORD LYTTLETON said, that, as some communication must have passed between the Government of New Zealand and the Home Government upon this subject, it was very desirable that the papers should be laid on the table, which would enable their Lordships to judge whether the measure was advisable or not. He was afraid that the effect of the Bill would be to create and keep up a constant feeling of irritation and jealousy between the local Government and the new body which it was proposed to establish—a body which would really form a separate and independent Administration in the colony, having no connection with the local Legislature, and formed by the Imperial Government without consultation with them. He believed some such legislation as that embodied in the present measure to be requisite; but he was not aware that there would be any inconvenience in delay at present, and it made some difference whether the purpose was effected by the local Assembly of New Zealand or by the Imperial authority. One of the main objects of the Bill was to enable the Natives to deal directly with the purchasers of land, and was probably deserving the attention of Parliament. There were several points of detail in the Bill which he would refer to on the Motion for going into Committee.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE explained that, according to the Constitution Act, nothing but Imperial legislation could carry out the objects of a measure like the present.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

House adjourned at a Quarter-past Eight o'clock, to Thursday next, Half-past Four o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, July 3, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Gunpowder, &c.; Church Temporalities (Ireland) Acts Amendment; Ecclesiastical Courts and Registries (Ireland).

MINES REGULATION AND INSPECTION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 10 to 18 agreed to.

Clause 19, (Notice of accidents in Mines to be given to Secretary of State).

MR. CROOK said, that an accident might be very serious, and yet might not result in death. In Kirkless colliery a sum of £500 a year was stopped out of the wages of the men to provide for accidents, and accidents had occurred there which, though not resulting in death in some cases, had yet entitled some of the men to receive nearly £7. Now he proposed to make it necessary for the inspector to report all accidents of a definite kind. He would, therefore, omit the word "serious," and make it necessary for the inspector to report, whenever a man received such an accident that he did not return to his work before nine o'clock on the following morning.

MR. JACKSON said, many accidents that were really of very trifling character might prevent a workman from returning to his work next morning. He saw no good in the clause.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought the effect of the Amendment would be that the most trifling casualties would be reported to the Secretary of State, and the object they all had in view would be defeated, for serious cases would be buried under the heap of unimportant accidents.

MR. AYRTON said, it was merely intended to transfer a clause to this Bill which already existed in the Factory Act. He was afraid there was a disposition to think lightly of any accident which did not terminate fatally, or nearly kill the party.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE said, it seemed to him a very absurd thing that every slight accident should be made the subject of a report to the Secretary of State.

Amendment negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as were also Clauses 20 and 21.

Clause 22 (Punishment of workmen violating the rules.)

MR. FREELAND proposed to leave out the following words :—

"Or to be proceeded against and punished according to the Provisions of the Act 4 Geo. IV., c. 34, intituled an Act to enlarge the power of justices in determining complaints between Masters and Servants."

He referred to the Petition of the wives and relations of seven colliers, in the Morning Star, of April 5, 1860, the colliers being at that time in Derby, six of whom were stated to have been convicted by one magistrate on the preceding 15th of March. They had refused to go down into a pit by a rope which, as they alleged, was unsound. A Petition was, as they all knew, an ex parte statement, and he would not therefore discuss the merits of the particular case. On inquiry he found that the law was in accordance with the statement contained in the Petition. He thought it a monstrous thing that, under the provisions of the Act of George the Fourth, which might be put in force under the clause as it stood in the Bill, one magistrate should have the power of issuing his warrant and of hearing the case, though he might be himself a mine-owner, and committing men to prison for three months. He thought that the Act of George the Fourth was an arbitrary Act, conferring powers which could not safely be entrusted to a single magistrate, and he trusted that the Committee would not confirm it by incorporating any part of its provisions in the present Bill. He hoped to see that Act repealed at no very distant day. He believed that no changes were so beneficial as those which produced among the working classes entire confidence in the impartiality with which justice was administered throughout the country.

After a short conversation the Amendment was agreed to.

MR. FREELAND then moved that the following Clause should be added as a Proviso :—

"No Justice of the Peace being himself the owner of Mines, or the father, son, brother, or agent of any owner of Mines shall, if objected to at the hearing of any complaint in charge, act as a Justice of the Peace for the purposes of conviction in adjudication in any cases of difference or dispute between persons engaged in working mines and their employers, in which Justices of the Peace have jurisdiction."

He quoted as Clauses having a similar object in view the 5 Geo. IV. c. 96, s. 12,—the Truck Act, 1 & 2 Will. IV. c. 37, s. 21,—the Proviso in the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 40, s. 25, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 15, s. 71.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had no objection to the exclusion of the owner of a mine where the dispute might have taken place, but he could not agree that every mine-owner should be excluded at the hearing of complaints. He thought they ought to follow the precedent set forth in the Factory Act, where the parties interested in a factory in which the offence occurred were not allowed to adjudicate on the matter. He should therefore propose to amend the proviso by the insertion of words which would assimilate it to the clause in the Factory Act.

MR. FREELAND said, his object was to prevent a person having a class interest from adjudicating when an objection was raised against his acting in the case.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the effect of the Amendment would be to shut out from the adjudication all the magistrates who understood the question, and to leave such disputes to be decided by persons who knew nothing of the trade. Instead of benefiting the men, he believed the suggestion would do them serious injury.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he was familiar with a district in which cases of dispute were constantly adjudicated on by coal-owners only—a magistrate acting in a case precisely analogous to one in which his own property might be concerned. He knew an instance of a number of men having refused to descend by a rope which they believed to be in a bad condition, being committed to prison for a long period by a magistrate, a mine-owner. It was afterwards discovered that if the men had descended it would have been at the risk of their lives. He thought that the Committee should accept the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he still thought that the restriction should apply only to the owner, or relatives of the owner, of such mine as the offence set forth might have occurred in.

MR. FREELAND said, that in accordance with what appeared to be the opinion of the Committee, he would reluctantly accept the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet.

Clause amended and agreed to.

Clauses 23 to 28 agreed to.

Clause 29 (Extent of Act).

MR. H. H. VIVIAN proposed the insertion of words to make the Act perpetual, instead of for five years, as proposed.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had no objection to the Amendment, which would not prevent the House reconsidering the whole subject at a future time if that was thought necessary.

MR. AYRTON said, he was in favour of continuing the temporary character of the Act, as it afforded an opportunity for renewing and amending the Act at stated periods.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

MR. FREELAND proposed the following clause:—

"The presence of two justices of the peace shall be required for the purposes of conviction or adjudication in all cases of difference or dispute between persons employed in working mines and their employers in which one justice is now by law empowered to convict or to adjudicate; provided always that any person, being a stipendiary magistrate, shall have and exercise all such powers as he would have had and exercised if this Act had not been passed."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the fault he found with this clause was that it did not refer to offences within the Act. It was merely a partial repeal of the provisions of another general Act, and had no special reference to the Bill.

MR. CLIVE suggested that the clause had better be brought up on the Report, as he believed the object was already effected in the 25th Clause.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN trusted the clause would be pressed to a division. It was of the greatest consequence to the miners that two justices should be required to preside.

MR. FREELAND said, he was willing to withdraw his Amendment, and to consider the propriety of bringing it up on the Report.

MR. AYRTON moved a clause providing that the payment of wages should in no case be made in or contiguous to public-houses, but at an office to be appointed for the purpose; and further, that every man should be paid the exact amount of his own earnings. In relation to this latter provision, he stated it was not uncommon to give a £5 or a £10 note to a number of men, who were obliged to go to the public-house to get change.

MR. CLIVE said, the 5th and 6th Vict. already provided that wages should not be paid within public-houses, and he could see no use in employing the words "contiguous to" any public-house, proposed by the hon. Member.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he thought the words "contiguous to" were most important, as the clause of the 5th and 6th

Victoria was most inefficient. The workmen sustained great loss and injury by the prevalence of the practice referred to by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, and it was a source of great disaffection and discontent.

MR. JACKSON said, he considered the Amendment necessary. It was essential to the well-being of the men that they should not be paid in or near to a public-house. On this point he could speak from personal experience.

Clause agreed to.

On the Preamble,

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN moved that the provisions of the Bill should apply to limestone pits and quarries.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the provisions of the Bill would not apply to limestone pits and quarries, and to insert these words in the Preamble would only make nonsense in the Bill.

Amendment negatived. Preamble agreed to.

House resumed; Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Thursday, and to be printed. [Bill 224.]

TENURE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 38 and 39 agreed to.

Clause 40 (Hearing of Case).

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, he thought they ought to give a larger compensation in the case of erecting houses than in the case of a common agricultural improvement. He should therefore propose the insertion of words which, in the case of the erection of houses, would establish a perpetual annuity at the rate of 4 per cent per annum for every £100 of expenditure for improvements.

MR. CARDWELL said, the Bill allowed an annuity of £7 2s. for twenty-five years for every £100 laid out, which would repay the tenant his whole capital, and give him 5 per cent in the meantime in the course of the twenty-five years. Any other arrangement would be productive of great inconvenience.

Amendment negatived. Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 41.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 225.]

CADETS AT SANDHURST.—QUESTION.

GENERAL BUCKLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether, at the recent examination of Cadets at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, forty having an examination fitting them for Commissions without Purchase, the Commander-in-Chief informed them only twenty could be provided with Commissions without Purchase, in consequence of the Secretary of State for War not putting more than that number at his disposal?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT: Sir, the facts of the case are these. A certain number of Commissions are set apart to be competed for at Sandhurst, but that number it is quite evident must very much depend upon the number of Commissions without purchase which may be vacant. On the particular occasion to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman's question relates, it was announced that none of those young men who had not succeeded in obtaining 3,000 marks would be entitled to receive Commissions, even though they should be among the number of competitors who, under other circumstances, would be so entitled. Twenty Commissions were fixed upon and announced to the Governor of Sandhurst as the number to be competed for, and His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge stated at the recent examination that only that number could be allotted. The young men at Sandhurst seemed, however, to be under the impression that as it had been announced that those among them who had not succeeded in securing 3,000 marks would not be entitled to receive a Commission, the converse held good, and that all those who had obtained 3,000 marks would be entitled. Now, that expectation could not be realized; but I may state that since the examination eleven vacancies have taken place, and instead of there being only twenty there are now thirty Commissions to be allotted to the Cadets at Sandhurst, which is rather in excess of the number usually set apart for them.

COMMISSIONS IN YEOMANRY, MILITIA, AND VOLUNTEER CORPS.—QUESTION.

MR. CAYLEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is allowable for Officers of Yeomanry Regiments to receive Commissions in Volunteer Corps?

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, he also wished to inquire, Whether it is allowable that Militia Officers should receive such Commissions?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, applications had been addressed to the subject, and that the War Office come to the decision—a decision which he believed, been acted upon by some Lieutenants of Counties—that as to the joining of Volunteer Corps in many cases depended upon the exercise of the influence of some particular individual, though some other person might even be placed in command of it when—
—that there would be no objection to low Officers of Militia and Yeomanry Regiments to accept Commissions in Volunteer Corps, upon the understanding that when their regiments were called to active service they should resign their Commissions in either the one force or the other.

ARMY (GENERAL OFFICERS) COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he moved—

“For a Select Committee to inquire and report upon the claims of seven majors to the pay of general officers, who are receiving only the half pay of brevet majors, accepted substantive rank upon half-pay, the terms and engagements contained in the House Guards Memorandum of the 25th March, 1826, and General Order of the 1st of April, 1826.”

He had a short time since called the attention of the House to the subject, and hoped that the Secretary for War would meet his proposal with respect to the way. Not, however, having obtained a satisfactory reply from the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion, he felt it a way of dealing with the question was for it to be the consideration of a Select Committee. Now, in order to give the House a just idea of the origin of the question, which he was the advocate, he might mention that, so far back as 1824, pay in the army had been described by Sir H. Taylor, and in a memorandum the House Guards as being at an extremely slack in consequence of the number of officers that were unemployed. Some majors, it was found, had spent twenty years in that rank, while pay in the lower ranks of officers had advanced at an extremely slow rate. The consequence had been that it had been necessary to allow the sale of Commissions, with the view of filling the several regiments of old officers, and an order had been issued by the House Guards with that object, acting upon a great number of officers had gone upon half-pay. After a year's experience of the operation of the order, however, it was not found to be beneficial to the service to the full extent desirable, inasmuch as there was a great number of brevet field officers serving in the rank of captain, whom it was expected to get rid of, but to whom no sufficient temptation to retire was held out. In April, 1856, an order issued from the Horse Guards, founded on a memorandum sanctioned by the Secretary at War and the Prime Minister, authorizing officers serving on full pay with brevet rank to go on half pay with substantive rank equal to that in which they were serving with brevet rank. The memorandum which established their position had been laid before the House; it stated that the whole question turned, first, on the convenience of the service, and, secondly, on the propriety of giving these officers some boon. It was, therefore, proposed that officers so circumstanced should have the option conferred without forfeiting their claims on the service, either as regards themselves or their families. This amounted to a pledge on the part of the Government that the officers who accepted half pay under the memorandum and general order would be entitled to put forward their claims under the regulations of the service. A rule was established in 1822 that six years' service as field officer should entitle to the pay of a general officer. But the memorandum was issued in the face of that order for the convenience of the service. There were only seven officers in the position he had described; three of them had been senior captains, and, he would ask, was it consistent with common sense to suppose that, being in the receipt of 13s. 7d. per day, they would have accepted half pay of 9s. 6d. a day except with the hope, under the conditions of this memorandum, of returning to full pay, when their promotion would have gone on? The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said that these officers were eating their cake and trying to keep it, and that when they accepted half pay they did so with all the conditions attached. But the conditions attached were those of the memorandum, and those conditions in their view of the question were, that they were to go back to full pay, if the Commander-in-Chief saw fit so to place them, and that, at all events, they were to be entitled at least to the minimum pay of the rank to which they advanced. The question was a financial one, namely—whether they should continue to receive 9s. 6d. a day or £400 a year, and he moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the claims of these officers; first, because he conceived them to be founded in justice, and in the next place, because two great authorities on the question differed. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Secretary of State for War under the late Government, when the facts of the case were represented to him, came to the conclusion that the claim of the officers was a just and sound one, and sent it to the Treasury. The Treasury, however, declined to accept their view of the question, and the answer which they gave was based upon the system of unattached pay in general. He was not particular as to the constitution of the Committee. The Secretary of State for War and he might nominate one Member alternately, and the Committee of Selection might name three more. Two days would suffice for the whole inquiry. He hoped the House would accede to the appointment of the Committee.

COLONEL NORTH seconded the Motion. The right hon. and gallant General the late Secretary for War had admitted that justice was on the side of the officers, and the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary for War had owned that there was a doubt upon the subject. Under these circumstances these officers ought to have the benefit of the doubt, or, at all events, their claims should be submitted to the judgment of a Select Committee of that House. A bargain had been made with them, and whether it was a good or a bad one, it ought to be honourably fulfilled. He had himself examined the case, and he thought that it was one of great hardship.

GENERAL BUCKLEY said, he thought the House ought to grant the Committee of Inquiry, as there appeared to be some doubt about the question. It seemed to him rather an unfair thing that these old officers, having taken their promotion at the time they did, should find themselves no better off when they arrived at the rank of general officers than they were as majors.

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT said, he fully agreed with what had been laid down by the hon. and gallant Gentleman that as far as this was a matter of bargain, the bargain ought to be adhered to, and if justice required that those officers should receive an increase of pay they ought to have it.

The claim was not one of very great magnitude, relating as it did to the case of seven officers only, receiving the difference between 9*s.* and 25*s.* a day; but, as he did not think it founded in justice, he could not give it his sanction. These officers went upon half pay at their own option, and whether the arrangement was for the benefit of the service or not was immaterial, as they must be taken to have accepted it for their own advantage. They obtained a step in rank, having been made substantive majors instead of brevet majors. [Colonel LINDSAY: It was not a step.] A similar example had occurred recently. Certain officers who received brevet rank for distinguished services in the Crimea accepted the substantive rank of major in lieu of brevet rank, regarding it as a great boon to themselves, and of course expecting to exchange back upon full pay again, and so realize the benefit. Well, that was what these officers in this case did; and, although the state of the list made it more difficult for them to get back upon full pay, they took that risk upon themselves. They had one advantage which the Crimean officers had not in respect to the provision for their widows; and, although it was said none of them were then married men, they were not so old but that they might have married afterwards. The rule then as now existed, by which no man could rise to the position of a general officer, with certain advantages as to pay, unless he had served six years as a field officer. That regulation was established to insure the efficiency of the service; and it was putting a forced and non-natural construction upon its terms to say that that condition was to be suspended in favour of officers who had never served since 1826. The demands to be admitted to half-pay had been pressing and numerous. It was regarded as a great favour. Some of these officers had succeeded in getting back again upon full-pay; and of course no complaint was heard from them. Others had not been so fortunate; but they were no worse off than many officers in the navy who were anxious to get upon full pay, and could not. It was now proposed however, that, having had the benefit of half-pay, a step in rank, and a prospective provision for their widows, they should be placed upon the higher pay of general officers, as if they had served six years as field officers. That reading could not be fairly put upon the regulation. If he had said that any doubt existed on the point, it was simply because the right hon. and gallant Member opposite took a different view of it. But in his own mind there existed no doubt whatever on the matter, and he had, therefore, felt bound, on the part of the Executive, to decline to accede to the request of these officers. He must frankly say, too, that he did not think a Committee of that House a proper tribunal to decide the question. As long as the right hon. and gallant General opposite was in office no such inquiry as that was moved for; but, when another Secretary of State succeeded him, taking a different view of the subject, then the Committee was asked for. He had given his opinion on the question for the third time. To that opinion he firmly adhered, and he trusted the House would not accede to the Motion.

Mr. Sidney Herbert

GENERAL PEEL said, he had no wish to set his opinion in opposition to that of his right hon. Friend. He only claimed to have acted as free from bias in this matter as the right hon. Gentleman. He never heard of the case of any one of these officers until it came before him officially, and he did not act upon his own judgment alone in regard to the subject, but upon the advice that was given to him. He had no doubt in his own mind that these officers were entitled to be placed in the same position as the other officers of a corresponding arm of the service who had been put upon half-pay. They could not have imagined, from the terms offered them, that they would suffer any detriment by accepting the arrangement. There was no question as to the claim of their families, if they had any, at their death. If it could be shown that any of these officers had refused to return to full pay, of course they would not have any claim; but such was not the case. If the case against them was so strong, why should the right hon. Baronet refuse them the satisfaction of a Committee? He himself, when in office, assented to the appointment of a Committee to consider the claims of the Land Transport Corps, although he entertained no doubt upon the matter. He believed that this was a bargain, and although it was a bad one for the country, it ought to be carried out.

COLONEL SYKES said, it appeared to him that Government had not kept faith with these officers. A good case required only a plain and complete statement, and the very elaborateness of the argument of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sidney Herbert) showed that his case was a bad

If the gallant Colonel pressed his Motion he should go into the lobby with him.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he was always willing to submit military questions to a Committee of the House of Commons; but the late and present Secretary of State and War were at issue upon the subject, and he could not obtain a military tribunal to decide between them, he should support the Motion of his hon. and gallant friend.

Motion made, and Question put,

That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into and report upon the claims of seven or Generals to the pay of General Officers, who are now receiving only the half pay of Brevet Officers, and who accepted substantive rank upon the terms and engagements contained in the Horse Guards Memorandum of the 1st day of March 1826 and General Order of the 25th day of April 1826."

The House divided:—Ayes 108; Noes 14. Majority 14.

CADETSHIPS (NAVY). COMMITTEE MOVED FOR.

CAPTAIN ESMONDE said, he rose pursuant to notice to move for the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the present system of nomination to cadetships in the Royal Navy. There was a general impression, that the navy was—especially as regarded the middle classes—a close service, and that there was not sufficient publicity or responsibility attached to the nominations to cadetships. It appeared from a Parliamentary return that during the five years ending in 1859 the total number of nominations was 1,019. Of these twelve were given to the Colonies, thirteen to the Royal Naval School, and 13 to flag-officers and captains. The remainder (745) were distributed, as stated in the return, by the "Board." He wanted to know what was the meaning of that word "Board," and how the "Board" acted, whether individually or collectively, in the distribution of cadetships. In asking those questions he by no means desired to insinuate or assert that abuses existed. He would be delighted to find the Report of the Committee he wished to see appointed negating the idea that any abuse existed. But he was entitled to make the remark that if there were no abuse existing, there would be no objection to inquiry, and if it turned out that there were, then the sooner it was remedied the better. He did not expect that the Government would offer any opposition to the appointment of the Committee, because he had a very good precedent for his Motion. The hon. Member for King's County (Mr. Hennessy) had moved for a Committee to inquire into the present mode of examining candidates for appointments in the civil service. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Treasury opposed the Motion, but said he did so only because the Government did not think the time had arrived when an inquiry of the kind could be fully acted upon. To that it was replied that the object of the Motion was simply to ascertain what the system was, and upon that, the Government withdrew all opposition. He therefore, placed his Motion on the same ground, and he wanted, by the appointment of the Committee, to ascertain the nature of the system under which the cadetships were distributed.

Lord CLARENCE PAGET said, he thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman should have told the House whether there existed, or he conceived there existed, any real ground of complaint as to the nomination to cadetships. He had heard none himself from any quarter. At the same time, he was aware that the introduction of a system of competitive examination had many things to recommend it; indeed, he had himself brought that question before the House, and he still entertained the belief that it would be advisable to establish a system of limited competition as regarded the entries to cadetships. But the subject was fraught with considerable difficulties. Boys of twelve years of age were eligible for cadetships, and every one knew that a competitive examination among boys of that age would be incomplete and unsatisfactory. It must necessarily be confined to the lower branches of educational subjects, and would afford no criterion of what the future abilities of the competitors might be. The Duke of Somerset had established a system of competitive examination with regard to the marine cadets, who entered the service at a more advanced age than the naval cadets, and if it succeeded the Board would doubtless consider the propriety of extending it to other departments of the service. In the engineering department he had himself introduced a purely competitive examination with respect to the factory boys, who, however, were not examined until they were close upon fourteen years of age. Under a system of competitive examination how would the hon. and gallant Gentleman propose to deal with the nominations to Naval Cadetships now given to the Colonies? Were half-a-dozen boys to be brought from North America or Australia for the purpose of being examined in this country? One or two might probably be successful, but the remainder would be sent back again disappointed. The House would see, as he had already said, that the subject was surrounded by difficulties. He was not aware that any fault could be found with the Board of Admiralty for the manner in which they distributed the nominations at their disposal. Naval officers were badly paid, and there were many who depended entirely upon the pittance they received in the shape of half-pay. The only boon held out to them was that of having their sons put into the navy. It would be an act, not only of great injustice, but of great impolicy to subject their sons to a competitive examination. At present a large majority of the whole number of nominations were given to service claims. Considerable intricacy was involved in the question, and he thought the House would do well not to refer it to a Select Committee, but rather to trust to the Board to make improvements when they saw that these could be judiciously introduced.

MR LINDSAY said, his noble and gallant Friend had refused to grant the Committee, but he had not told the House by what principle the Board were guided by their selections. He found from a Return which had been placed in his hand that out of 1,019 nominations between the years 1854-9, only twelve had been bestowed on young men from the Colonies. The argument of the noble Lord on that score did not therefore amount to much. He never made but one application to the Admiralty, and that was on behalf of the son of the late General Niel, who, having been abroad for twenty years fighting the battles of his country, wrote to him to see what he could do for one of his boys. He applied to the Admiralty for a cadetship, basing his request altogether on public grounds, as he believed that the favour would be readily granted to the son of so distinguished an officer, but the application was refused. Afterwards the wife of that distinguished officer came to London; she was a lone woman, living in a country place, knowing nobody. He (Mr. Lindsay) again made application to the Admiralty, and was again refused. That was the first favour he had ever asked of the Admiralty, and it should be the last. It seemed that there were 745 cadetships at the disposal of the Admiralty. How were they distributed?

Lord Clarence Paget

LORD CLARENCE PAGET had stated that three-fourths were service claims.

MR. LINDSAY said, that a portion of those were the 240 given to officers; the remainder disposed of by the Admiralty. He received a more satisfactory explanation as to how these nominations were distributed, and the principle which guided them. He should consider it his duty on those grounds to vote for the Motion.

MR. TAYLOR said, an instance had come to his knowledge, in which a ground of relationship to a distinguished officer was not recognized at the Admiralty as affording a claim to a cadetship. Fortunately the applicant possessed a private interest, by which he was enabled to obtain it.

MR. WHITBREAD said, he could not conceive what grounds existed for the Committee, unless it were that these cadetships had been taken away. Did the hon. Member believe boys were improperly admitted, and did he propose to rectify such a state of things? Would he introduce competition, and was it to be limited or unlimited? Was it proposed to take away all nominations from the Admiralty, and to vest them in another Board, the power of nominating cadetships? The hon. Member told the House the grounds on which his cadetship that he applied for had been refused. It might be that he had not pursued his application until in fairness it could not be complied with.

MR. JOHN LOCKE said, the names of the candidates for cadetships were put down on a very long list, and the present Motion was to discontinue the principle on which the Government selected their selection from that list. If the system was fair and above-board, there should be no objection on the part of the Board of Admiralty to the appointment of the Committee; if there were any objection, it was improper in the mode according to which these selections were made, the House arriving at the facts, would recommend some better mode of appointment, as a matter of grave importance.

MR. BEAMISH remarked that the hon. Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty in opposition brought forward the Motion inquiring into the administration of the Admiralty Department, with which a naval officer, must have been acquainted.

and the object of which, therefore, could only be to discover abuses if they existed. He could not understand on what ground the Government refused inquiry into the subject; and he should therefore feel it to be his duty to support the Motion of his hon. Friend if he went to a division.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, it would appear now-a-days as if everything were to be made the subject of inquiry. He must, however, confess he did not in the present instance think any good ground for inquiry had been made out, inasmuch as all the information which the supporters of the Motion seemed to require might be obtained by moving for Returns on the subject. Be that, however, as it might, he could from his own experience at the Admiralty undertake to say that officers had frequently, without any interest whatever and merely because of their own services, obtained nominations to cadetships for their sons. He might add that it was impossible to grant every application of the kind, and that he did not think it would be found sound policy to keep the whole of those appointments for the sons of naval and military officers, to the exclusion of civilians.

Motion made, and Question put, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present system of nomination to Cadetships in the Royal Navy."

The House divided:—Ayes 24; Noes 81; Majority 57.

Notice taken that forty Members were not present.—Committee counted, and forty Members not being present;

MR. SPEAKER resumed the Chair;—House counted, and forty Members not being present, House adjourned at a Quarter after Eight o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 4, 1860.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Donegal, in the room of Sir Edmund Samuel Hayes, bart., deceased.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Common Law Procedure (Ireland) Act (1858) Amendment; Manchester Cathedral Church; Larceny Laws Consolidation Act Amendment; Hackney Carriages (Metropolis) Act Amendment.

2^o Highways; Medical Act (1858) Amendment; Sale of Gas Act Amendment (No. 3).

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE.—NOTICE.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE said, he wished to give notice that he should move as an addition to the Resolutions of which the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton (Viscount Palmerston) had given notice for the next day:—

"That an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased not to prorogue the present Parliament until the Bill passed by this House for the abolition of the Excise duty on paper has been submitted to Her Majesty for the Royal Assent."

He also wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether it was the intention of the noble Lord to move the Resolutions of which he had given notice seriatim, and to take the sense of the House on each, or to propose them all together?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he apprehended that the question was one rather for Mr. Speaker to decide. He, himself, was of opinion that when Resolutions were put in the form in which these Resolutions were couched, it was the practice of the House that they should be proposed seriatim.

CHURCH-RATES LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HUBBARD said, he trusted that the House would not consider that he had been guilty of presumption in having introduced a Bill on the subject of church-rates. They all knew that in parishes where Dissenters were in a minority, they were compelled to pay church rates; and, that in parishes where dissenting influence was predominant, Churchmen were prevented from rating themselves for the maintenance of the fabrics and services of their churches, while in other parishes in which parties were nearly balanced, a perpetual warfare was carried on, most destructive to religion and social order. For that state of things the remedy proposed during successive Sessions had been the total abolition of church rates. The Bill introduced with that purpose was directed not merely to remedying the grievance under which they laboured, but with the ulterior object of effecting an entire severance between Church and State. The measure which he had introduced, on the contrary, was based on the double principle, that the House was bound to maintain the nationality of the Church of England, and that, as far as was compatible with the maintenance of a national Church, perfect civil and religious liberty should be secured to all men. It entirely relieved from liability to church rates Dissenters, who, upon their own showing, had no wish to avail themselves of the advantages offered by the Established Church. It affixed no stigma to them; and, on the other hand, it left Churchmen free to tax themselves in the way they found most convenient for their own purposes. Owing to the delay which had taken place in bringing the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Tavistock (Sir John Trelawny) before a Committee of the whole House, and to the neglect which that Bill had subsequently met with in the House of Lords, his measure had been unavoidably deferred to such a late period of the Session that unless it were cordially assented to by all sections of the House it would be impossible to pass it in the brief interval that yet remained. He should, therefore, move that the order for the second reading be discharged, and he hoped during the recess that the principle of the Bill would engage the attention of hon. Members, and that in the commencement of another Session, they might be able to pass some measure which would put an end for ever to this fertile source of contention.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he was quite unprepared for the withdrawal of the Bill, which he thought contained the elements of a measure that would have given satisfaction. The supporters of the total abolition scheme, by an ingenious system of party tactics, had diverted the attention of the country from the question really at issue; but he thought it unworthy of the House of Commons to imitate the conduct of schoolboys in a debating society, and to continue sending up Bills to the House of Lords which by overwhelming majorities they had intimated their intention never to accept. If the question were fairly put before the country, respectable Dissenters, he believed, would be willing to accept an intermediate measure, by which they would be exempted from all liability in respect of church rates. He knew, also, that many hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House regretted that they had pledged themselves to their constituents for the total abolition of the tax, but for which they would gladly support a moderate compromise. He thought the Church had hitherto been at a disadvantage in never having brought forward a distinct plan of their own. The best mode of so doing would be for the other House, if it were possible, to originate a Bill, and he did not believe this House would undertake the responsibility of rejecting it. But he understood that the forms of the Constitution, of which they were all so extremely jealous of late, prevented such a course. The next best course, then, would be to originate a moderate measure in this House. The first Bill introduced this Session had been constitutionally dealt with, and now, therefore, was the time to take away from the adversaries of the Church, if he might use that term without offence, the advantage of originating every measure, by offering a moderate proposition from the Conservative side. He thought the Bill of his hon. Friend did afford something like a distinct but moderate proposition, and, therefore, he deprecated its withdrawal. It was, he could not help thinking, a grievous mistake for hon. Gentlemen on his own side of the House to refuse their assent to any compromise by which the settlement of a long-vexed question would be effected, and those who took that course were, he believed, following out a line of policy which was more prejudicial to the interests of the Church than even the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Trelawny) and those by whom he was supported. And if there was to be no compromise—if the only alternative was to be between keeping things as they are, and the total abolition of church rates, he did not hesitate to say that of the two he would prefer to vote with the hon. Baronet opposite. But, as he had said, he thought this Bill offered something of a compromise, and therefore he was in favour of its going up to the Lords.

Mr. Hubbard

Order discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

HIGHWAYS BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS having moved the second reading of this Bill,

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. HODGKINSON said, when the Bill of last Session was before the House he took the opportunity of ascertaining, so far as he could, the opinion of the district in which he resided upon it, and he ventured to say it was scarcely possible a stronger objection could exist on any subject than be found to exist against that Bill, which was very nearly identical in its provisions with the present measure. Although under the law at present, parishes had power to associate themselves into districts for a similar purpose, that power had been made available only to the most limited extent—he believed only in five or six instances. The fact that it had been actually adopted at all, and had never become more general, showed that it had been a failure. That power had been in existence ever since the present Highways Act was passed, namely for a period of twenty-five years. There could therefore hardly be a stronger evidence of the disinclination of the country to be divided into districts, as proposed by the present Bill. The principal reason urged by the Government in favour of this measure would probably be, that in the present state of the law, many roads were not in a satisfactory state. He admitted the fact, but he denied that a remedy would be found in any legislation such as that proposed by the Bill. The process of road-making was not one which could be carried into effect better by large boards than by the individual exertions of the present surveyors of highways. Every day's experience showed that works of that kind were carried on more economically and better in such a manner than by the operations of public Boards. If some roads were not in the condition which some Gentlemen desired to see them in, might not that fact arise partly from a wise economy? Did not every Gentleman acquainted with agricultural districts know that many roads were used to a very limited extent, and that any large expenditure on them would be out of proportion to the public benefit derived from them? The present Bill contemplated such a state of things, because by the 49th clause power was given to discontinue the repair of certain roads altogether after the Highway Board had decided that they were not necessary for the public use. But he could scarcely conceive a greater injustice than such a clause might perpetrate. In numbers of places throughout the country, which were converted from an open to an enclosed state, the whole of the roads were directed to be repaired at the general expense of the highway rate. A great number of them were not of public utility, and were only used for the occupation of the land adjacent. But the extent of the allotments had in a great measure been arranged according to their contiguity to the roads, and there could therefore scarcely be a greater injustice than to discontinue the repairs of the roads altogether.

ther. He might add that no system of highway management would, in his opinion, be likely to prove less expensive than that which at present prevailed. Under its operation a surveyor was chosen by the ratepayers of a parish, himself very frequently a considerable ratepayer, and, as a consequence, having an interest in spending the money raised from the rates in an economical manner. It also happened that in almost every parish there were to be found aged and weakly men, not suited to the varied work of the agricultural labourer, but competent to undertake the slower labour required in the repair of roads, who were employed in that labour, a great saving to the ratepayers being thus effected. In addition to those advantages the present system enabled the surveyor to consult the convenience of the ratepayers, so as to enable them to provide the necessary materials for the repair of their roads at a time when their horses were not otherwise engaged. The repair was by that means conducted at a comparatively small expense; but if the Bill before the House were to pass into a law, paid surveyors, treasurers, and clerks would be called into existence, it being carefully provided that each of those offices should be held by three separate and distinct individuals. Each highway Board would also, he supposed, require a place to meet, and various other expenses would be incurred which now had no place, and no portion of which could, properly speaking, be regarded as an expenditure on the roads of the county. But that was not all, for if the principle were sanctioned of establishing in various districts highway Boards similar in their constitution to the Boards of guardians, it might be found expedient to establish next year a Government Board in London to control them, it being his opinion that a greater amount of jobbery would prevail under the operation of the present Bill than under the Poor Law. But not only would it necessitate the employment of an expensive Staff of officers; it would give rise to the additional disadvantage of rendering the employment of those aged and infirm persons to whom he had referred a matter in which the surveyors would have no interest, as they would naturally seek to effect not an indirect saving, but one which would figure in their accounts. He might further observe that the Bill was not asked for throughout the country, as was proved by the fact that 360 petitions, signed by 26,000 ratepayers, and representing a greater number as some of them came from Boards of guardians and were signed merely by the chairman, had been presented against it, while only five or six had been presented in its favour. It was very generally supposed that if a road happened to be out of repair it was necessary that law expenses to a considerable amount should be incurred before the taking of steps to put it in a proper state could be made compulsory; but the fact was that it was open to anybody to lay in such a case a complaint before the magistrates at petty sessions, who might either inspect the road themselves, or send a competent person to do so, and who, if it were found to be out of repair, might make an order that it should be repaired within a certain time, when if the order was not complied with, they might fine the surveyor, take the matter out of his hands, and direct the sum required to put the road in a proper state to be paid over to a third party. No mode of proceeding could be more simple, efficacious, and inexpensive than that, and if roads were allowed to remain unrepaired, it was not, he should maintain, so much the fault of the law as of its administrators. Under those circumstances, he failed to discover any good ground for bringing about that revolution of our parochial system which the Bill proposed to effect, while he thought its operation would be to interfere very much with the independence and impartiality of the magistrates by causing them to sit one day as way-wardens with the power of directing prosecutions to be instituted in cases on which they might be called upon the following day to sit as absolute Judges. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department had, however, in introducing the measure, stated that one of a similar character had worked well in South Wales, but from that opinion he begged leave to dissent, inasmuch as he learnt from a petition which had been presented from that very district in the course of the Session that complaint was made of the defective working of the Act which had been passed for its particular advantage. The case of turnpike roads had been referred to as a reason why paid surveyors should be appointed, but it should be borne in mind that those roads were a most expensive luxury, and that, notwithstanding the existence of tolls, a great many parishes had to provide for the maintenance of turnpike roads out of the highway-rate. In some instances, without allowing anything for interest, the mere repairs of turnpike roads averaged upwards of a mile, while some of the best high Lincolnshire cost little more for than £6 per mile. Having said this in favour of the existing system, quite prepared to admit that the establishment of a more efficient mode of it was expedient, while the auditing counts might be conducted by some process, although such a process would be secured by the Bill, which provided that they should be pitched on the table at a Board meeting, and by the Board. He might add that he appeared from Returns on the subject the present highway-rate throughout the country gave an average of only 5s. per pound, the limit fixed by the Highway Act being 2s. 6d. in the pound, so that before the House, so far from affording protection against increased expenditure, it admitted of the multiplication of the rate of payment by six. For reasons he had stated, he begged to move an Amendment of which he had given notice that the Bill be read a second time three months.

Mr. Hodgkinson

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the clause to add the words "upon the third day after the third month."

MR. KER SEYMER said, he thought they could not be too thankful to the Government for dealing with this question in that respect following the example of their predecessors. Such questions, not of a political character, making no appeal to Ministers, still vitally affecting the interest and welfare of the country, strongly did the late Sir Robert Peel show the importance of the subject that in his great speech of 1846, when proposing a new system of commercial policy, he should propose three measures for the special benefit of the agricultural interest—one of these being an alteration in the law of settlement, which had been partially carried out; another, to provide money for the draining of land—which had been almost entirely absorbed by the proprietors, who were more wide-spread than their English brethren; and the third was an alteration of the law relating to highways. The measure proposed by Robert Peel was so far similar in principle to this Bill that it contained the provision for highway districts and district surveyors. But the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment said that the present system was highly satisfactory; and the pro-gave of this was that, while parishes at present had the power to unite for the purpose of appointing district surveyors, very few had done so. That was perfectly true; but those who were acquainted with country matters knew that there was great difficulty to get farmers and ratepayers to unite and act in concert. This fact was therefore no proof of their objection to the system proposed by the Bill. It was also said that the present system was very little burdensome to the ratepayers; but he, on the other hand, contended that nothing was so burdensome to the agricultural body as bad roads, and these did arise from the present state of the law. The object of the way-wardens was to show a good book at the end of the year—that is, to show that what had been done was done cheaply, not that all had been done that should have been done or in the most effective manner. Very often this very cheapness turned out the most expensive way of making roads. No doubt the magistrates might interfere; but their feeling was that the way-wardens were not very competent to make roads; they were, therefore, dealt with leniently. There was a constant struggle going on between the magistrates and the way-wardens to get good roads, the result of which was that the way-wardens by a certain vis inertiae carried the day, and the roads were not repaired as they ought to be. The employment of quasi paupers on the roads had been adduced as a recommendation of the present practice; but he regarded it as quite the reverse. It would be much better to look what pauperism we had fairly in the face than attempt to work it with the highway-rate. Indeed, some parishes got a very unfair advantage by putting their paupers to work on the roads, who generally did no more in six weeks than able-bodied men would do in one week. The repairs on roads were now made by fits and starts, and under such a system it was impossible to get good roads all over the country; what was wanted, according to Sir Robert Peel, being a continuous line of communication. Some years ago he should have been rather afraid of the working of such a Bill as this. Everything depended on having a competent man as surveyor of roads; and formerly if a person was unfortunate in business, with a wife and family, especially if he were a hearty good fellow and sang a good song, he had no difficulty in getting the appointment. But that time had gone by.

The ratepayers had found out that they had suffered so much, he would not say from jobbery, but by being led away in these appointments by kind, neighbourly feeling, that they might now be safely trusted to look after their own interests and appoint competent persons. One objection to this Bill was that it was permissive; but if there were districts in the north of England where strong objection was felt to the Bill, probably from their roads being better managed, he did not see why the magistrates should not exercise the discretion that was left them, and not force its provisions on an unwilling county. He should certainly support the principle of the Bill, and also its leading provisions in Committee.

MR. FREELAND: Sir, the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has said, that the House and the country have waited long enough already for a Highways Act. If this be a specimen of the Bill most likely to pass into a law, I trust sincerely that the country and the House may find themselves condemned to wait still longer. Now what, Sir, are the sum and substance of this Bill? This Bill, Sir, is an attempt, very similar to attempts which have been often made, but which have hitherto always failed of success in this House, to transfer from parish ratepayers in vestry assembled to town councils and justices in quarter sessions, that discretionary power which the former at present enjoy of acting as single parishes, or of combining to form districts for the purposes of highway management. By this Bill town councils or county justices might group parishes into highway districts, without being legally bound to consult the ratepayers with reference to the proposed arrangements. The Bill, it is said, is only permissive. True, it is optional, but with whom? with the wrong parties. It is optional, not with the ratepayers but with town councils and county magistrates. And what, Sir, are the grounds on which the House is asked to pass a measure of this objectionable character? A few vague statements, true, no doubt, in certain districts, that our highways are not in the state in which they ought to be. I have seen also some two or three petitions from county magistrates favourable to the change proposed. But these, Sir, are not grounds which would justify the House of Commons in imposing a measure of this objectionable character, on a resisting and protesting country. There are no returns or figures, so far, at all events, as I can discover, which in any way justify this change. There are no returns showing the comparative cost and efficiency of the Irish, the South Wales District, the Scotch Statute Labour, the English Turnpike, and the English Parochial Highway system. Yet these, in the case of a change of vast importance,—a change affecting the whole country, would have been, as it appears to me, the natural and the legitimate grounds for Parliamentary action. If better roads have been made at no greater expense, or, equally good roads at a less expense than under our existing system, let this be shown, and Parliament no doubt will sanction, and the country gratefully accept a change. Not only are there no such comparative estimates or returns, but there are no proofs, so far as I can discover, of any general or gross mismanagement or of any wanton waste of public money, even under the present system. If there has been mismanagement, it has not been shown that it is not even at present easily remediable. So far as regards the district with which I am acquainted, there is little, if any, cause of complaint: I have, indeed, heard of a district in another county, in which the roads got into a bad state. But what happened? A very energetic gentleman, a friend of mine, got appointed surveyor, and very soon brought the roads into a good state. Well, but what does that show? Does it not show that, even under the present system, a little local effort and a little local energy may make good any defects that may exist? No doubt, in the case to which I refer there was a little grumbling as to expense. But what was the expense in that case compared with the burdens which this Bill would throw upon the local rates? A paid surveyor, a clerk and deputy-clerk, if required, are not in these days to be had for nothing, nor would they be likely to set about their work in a simple and inexpensive way. I want hon. Gentlemen to consider the expense which the staff of officials to be created by this Bill would throw upon the counties. My hon. Friend the Member for Newark has referred to the petition from Levenshulme. The petitioners state that their annual highway rates have not exceeded 4d. in the pound for the last eight years. Yet their roads have been kept in such a state of repair as to call forth votes of thanks to the surveyors at the annual meetings. But they say that the cost of appointing a paid surveyor, and of otherwise carrying out the provisions of this Bill would exceed their present total expenditure on their highways. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire once told the House that hon. Members had formed too low an estimate of the charge which a measure similar to this would throw upon the county rates. On another occasion he begged the House to consider that Turnpike Roads, in the management of which, as we all know, county magistrates take a leading part, cost the country £42 per mile, while the present highways cost about £16 per mile. My hon. Friend the Member for Newark quoted returns from certain Turnpike Roads giving an average cost of £60 per mile, and he referred, I think, to certain highways, near Lincoln, maintained at a cost of £6 per mile. Again, Sir, as regards expense, we are told that no accounts are so difficult to audit as those of a surveyor of Highways. Will you improve the means of checking or auditing such accounts when you have mixed up, as is proposed by the present Bill, contributions from separate parishes in order to form for certain purposes a district fund, while for other purposes the expenses are to be borne as separate charges by the respective parishes. Then, again, who is to audit these accounts? The Highway Board. But that is the Board which, under this Bill, is to authorize the outlay. The Board is to hold one meeting every year to audit accounts. But we all know how these arrangements work in counties. The expense and difficulty of attending these Board meetings would probably deter the elected waywardens from attending them, and the control of the proceedings of the Board would fall, in the case of counties, into the hands of a few of the nearest resident county magistrates. These, again, not knowing much, perhaps, of road management, and not being constant in their attendance, would probably very soon become mere puppets in the hands of the surveyor. Let us look now for a moment at the constitution of the Boards. In counties county magistrates are to be ex officio members of them. To this arrangement it is objected that county magistrates as ex officio waywardens might outnumber and outvote the waywardens elected by the parishes. It is urged that they might do this in matters in which as proprietors, having an interest in the formation, the improvement, alteration, or shutting up of roads, they might have an interest at variance with interests of the general body of the ratepayers. Again, where taxing powers are given to ex officio waywardens, you have to that extent, at least, taxation without representation. Then, again, as to repairs of turnpike roads in certain cases out of the highway rates. It is urged that magistrates, who as mortgagees are frequently interested in these roads, would not be a fair tribunal to decide upon such questions. I have spoken of the objections to the Bill on the grounds of expense and of the constitution of the Boards. Now what are the general feelings of the country? We find by the twenty-fifth Report of the Public Petitions Committee, that, against the Bill there have been presented 308 petitions, signed by 23,289 petitioners. These are not petitions emanating in one form from a Central Committee, but the spontaneous effusions of different localities. The petitions in favour of the Bill have been five, signed by 92 petitioners. Then, again, the Highway Act has been passed about five-and-twenty years. That Act enables parishes to unite, and form districts for the purposes of Highway management; but it is admitted that in that respect the Act has been practically almost a dead letter. Well, but that shows, at all events, that the parishes and ratepayers do not want this change. If parishes voluntarily formed districts, no doubt there, and I have heard of such a case, the plan might work well. And why? Because men commonly do well and efficiently that which they do of their own accord. But if they do not want this plan, will it work well when Town Councils or County Justices, by virtue of an order in Quarter Sessions, have imposed it on them? I will not dwell now on other questions of detail. These are matters for discussion in Committee which this Bill, perhaps, may not be destined to undergo. I hope for these reasons that the House will accede to the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Newark, and consent to read this most objectionable, unconstitutional, and uncalled-for Bill a second time on this day three months.

Mr. Freeland

MR. KNIGHT said, he really had not expected that this Bill would have been proposed for a second reading after the long time it had been allowed to lie over, having been introduced on the 27th of January, and no stage moved in it since till the 4th of July. He did not believe that the public highways of England were in a bad state at all. Though not all equally good, they were very good. They were the best in Europe—the best in the world. He had travelled a great deal, and the only other country in which the public roads were really excellent was Germany; but when you got out of the public road—almost any grand chemin—you were constantly interrupted, and were even obliged to get out of your carriage to have it dragged through. English roads were not only the best in the world, but they were rapidly and very greatly improving. In the north of Worcestershire a country gentleman in the days of his father could not go to the country town without four horses, not for the pomp or pride of the thing, but because four horses were absolutely necessary, the roads being either ankle deep in sand or clay; but now, a one-horse fly was equal to the task, proceeding in any direction, either by turnpike or cross roads. He could also speak to the great improvement which had taken place in North Devon. Within the memory of persons with whom he had conversed there were four parishes, where the only roads were a kind of watercourse formed by the rain, and everything was carried on pack-horses; but these old roads had been so much improved and new ones made that a one horse fly could take you into any corner of those parishes. He did not wish to see a system under which such improvements had been made superseded by an unconstitutional, centralizing authority, which would enable the Government to place their hand on the 16,000 parishes of England, and, with two or three paid clerks, to dictate to the whole of them. The constabulary had been referred to as a means of inspecting the highways; but he thought the police should be left to the detection of crime. That was their proper function, and to that they should be restricted. No doubt they would be ready to undertake the duty; indeed, they would undertake the whole government of England, and think they could do it better than it was now conducted. But in this way we should soon lose all the liberty we had, and he greatly preferred our present constitutional system. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would not persevere with this Bill, which would revolutionize the entire local government of this country.

MR. HENEAGE said, he should support the Bill, as its effect would be to procure the appointment of competent surveyors in place of the present inefficient officers selected.

MR. DEEDS said, he should cordially support the second reading of the Bill. An objection had been urged that it was permissive instead of compulsory; and certainly he was of opinion that when they were legislating on large and broad principles, it was better that the measure should be compulsory; because, prima facie, the mere fact that a Bill was permissive, showed that it could not, in all cases, be considered a good one. He very much regretted that the Bill had not been brought forward at an earlier period of the Session; because, had it been brought forward in February, there were at least three weeks in that month in which their time might have been profitably occupied in discussing it. He was surprised that any hon. Gentlemen could get up in that House and advocate the continuance of the existing system of repairing the roads. For his part, he considered that it was a most expensive one. In nine cases out of ten, the men at present employed on the roads only did half a day's work. They were employed simply on their application for such work; and he believed that the manner in which they performed it was as bad as it possibly could be. He was perfectly satisfied that, taking the whole country through, a great deal more money was spent in maintaining the roads in their present inefficient state, than would be spent if they were properly attended to. No doubt, it would require rather a large sum of money to put the roads into good repair in those parishes where they had been neglected; but when they were once made good, they could be maintained, under the proposed system, at a much cheaper rate than they were at present; while the country would at the same time have the advantage of a continuous line of good roads, which it did not possess now. He thought that the present system of employing men on the roads was most demoralising. Men who were unfit to do anything else, were considered perfectly competent to make roads, when they were, in point of fact, totally incompetent to perform that work. Independent of that, they came an hour later in the morning, or left an hour earlier in the evening, and as it was impossible in all cases to pay them by the piece, though they might do so in the case of stonebreakers, they were paid by the day; and from the absence of the surveyors, who had their own business to attend to, the work was executed in the most slovenly way. It had been said that there was a difficulty in making magistrates ex officio members of the highway boards, because they might afterwards be called to adjudicate on cases arising out of the Act. He thought, however, that as a magistrate acted conscientiously, he would be supported by public opinion in this country; and, therefore, that magistrates would not feel that this Act would cast any burden whatever upon them. Generally speaking, he believed that the Act would, if carried, produce the greatest possible benefits; and considering that it would give satisfaction, which the present system did not, he should support the Bill.

Mr. Deedes

Mr. THOMPSON said, he wished to call the attention of the House to one of those parish surveyors who were now upon their trial, to say a few words on this question. The hon. Member for Newark, who had moved the rejection of this Bill, argued that the existing law for the maintenance of highways were sufficient for their purpose, and that the roads were not properly maintained, not to be attributed, not to the want of laws, but to the inefficiency of those who administered them. His (Mr. Thompson's) experience was entirely opposed to that statement. As a magistrate and a landowner he had used his influence to get out the present law in his own district, but he had never been able, even in his own parish, to get the roads put in a proper state until he procured his appointment as surveyor, when he was enabled not only to place them in a better condition, but considerably to reduce the expense. Thus the cost of good roads was less than that of bad ones. The power in which a parish surveyor acted was too limited. He knew of one case where the road extended over only half a mile of road, and another where it did not exceed a quarter of a mile. These were extreme cases, but in the largest parishes the extent of road to be maintained was seldom sufficient to warrant the employment of a paid surveyor. The duty was therefore generally performed by a tenant farmer who knew nothing of road-making. It could not be expected that farmers should leave their own business, which their living depended on, to look after the roads for which they received nothing, especially when they were well aware that every shilling laid out would be made the subject of attack, and that the man who spent least money would be regarded as the best surveyor. It was a perfect farce for a half-mile or mile of road, to go through all the ceremony of keeping separate highway-books, holding separate highway-meetings, and making separate highway-r

At present the best roads were either turnpike roads, which are managed by paid surveyors, or those near some town, which were under the management of select vestries or local boards. The farmers who undertook the superintendence of a mile or two of road for a year had no opportunity of acquiring the experience required to enable them to understand the business. In his own particular district there were both good and bad roads, the difference between them being solely due to the fact that the bad roads were under the ordinary parish surveyors, while the good ones were in the hands of paid men competent to look after a considerable mileage, and who therefore gave satisfaction to all parties. Objection had been taken to magistrates having seats at the boards to be constituted under this Bill. Now, under the new Poor Law system magistrates were ex officio guardians; and though many complaints had been made against that system, none had been urged against magistrates acting in that capacity. On the contrary, so far as his experience went, the elected guardians of the poor were glad to have the assistance of those gentlemen. To illustrate the kind of management under which the highways were now placed, he might mention that he had compared the cost of maintenance per mile in a large number of townships in his own district, and found that it varied as much as 7 to 1. The present Bill would remedy many of the defects of the existing system, and should have his most hearty support.

MR. BARROW said, he was decidedly opposed to the principle of this measure, as being very centralizing and bureaucratic, and as intended to take away from parishes the last remnant of local self-government. It was surprising that anybody in a free country should argue against its being made optional with those whom the Bill professed to benefit either to adopt its provisions or not, as they thought best for their own interests. The first petition which had been presented from a country district against this measure declared that at present the highways were kept in repair by substantial householders chosen by the ratepayers, and who had a due regard to economy and efficiency; that their management was infinitely to be preferred to that of nominees of the Crown, often appointed from political and other considerations, and dependent for the tenure of their office more upon their obsequiousness than upon the honest and faithful discharge of their duties; and that this Bill, which was neither sought nor desired by the great body of the people, not only struck a heavy blow at the connection between taxation and representation, but altogether ignored the growing intelligence of the community. He could speak from a personal experience of seventy years as to the improvement that had taken place in the roads of his own district. On roads along which he could hardly get a horse to travel when he was a young man he could now drive a light four-wheel spring carriage, without the least possible inconvenience. The system that had produced such results—results which might be easily worked out in other parts of the country—would be ill-changed for one that would take from the ratepayers the control over the expenditure of their own money, and transfer it to men who were admirable conservators of the peace, but not necessarily good administrators of finance. It was said that at present orders for the repair of roads must be made by magistrates in open court, and subject to public opinion. That was a strange objection to hear raised in a free country. True, the Bill would allow the ratepayers to send an odd way-warden or two to the Board; but the representative Members were pretty sure to be out-voted by the Government nominees; and farmers would not be inclined to travel a considerable distance from their own parishes to attend the monthly meetings. As the Chairman of a large Board of Guardians, he could state that in his neighbourhood the labourers were not demoralized by working upon the roads, but were often saved from pauperism by having that employment. When the proposed Boards were constituted they would spend at their own pleasure the money of parishes for which no member was present, without the check of a public hearing, and without any public complaint having been previously made of the state of the roads. If the prudence of their acts was questioned, there would be no remedy, because they would audit their own accounts. If the legality of their proceedings was appealed against, the magistrates who had sat ex officio at the Board would be authorized, not only to earwig their brethren upon the Bench, but to give their individual votes at sessions in defence of the orders they had made. He trusted the House would decidedly reject the second reading of such a measure.

MR. WALTER said, he did not alto-ther share the objections taken to the Bill by his hon. Friend the Member for Dorsetshire (Mr. Ker Seymer) and the hon. Member for East Kent (Mr. Deedes) on the ground that it was permissive. In a question of this kind, where the change proposed was rather one of degree than of principle, and the measure itself was one of a somewhat tentative character, he thought there might be an advantage in introducing it by a permissive instead of by a compulsory process. He apprehended that the same result would occur in this instance as had been already witnessed in regard to the Rural Police Act, and that in a very short time there would be few counties in England which would not adopt this measure—so great, he believed were the benefits it would confer on the country. The main objection, as he understood it, which had been advanced against this Bill was comprised in the expression that had been applied to it by the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment—namely, that it would have the effect of “disparochializing” the management of our highways. Now, there were certainly some subjects with which local authorities were more competent to deal than Central Boards; but, on the other hand, there were others in respect to which Central Boards appeared to him to have the advantage. For example, in regard to the relief of the poor, which had already been alluded to, he had always been of opinion that the poor, being generally located in particular districts, and not travelling much about from one place to another, the management might be safely confided to the local authorities. But if there was any one matter ought not to be intrusted to the local authorities, it was the management of the highways. If a road running through a parish began and ended in that parish, undoubtedly he would be the last person to advocate the transfer of its supervision from a local to a central body; but a parish road was only a portion of a great system, the whole of which was affected by the mismanagement of any single part; and, remembering that the highways of England were but the veins and arteries through which the commerce and traffic of the country circulated, it would be just as reasonable to complain that each member of the human body had not a separate overseer as for each parish to complain that it had not a separate surveyor for its highways, which were merely portions of a great system ramify-ing throughout the entire kingdom. As far, then, as an extended area of management was concerned, he for one would have had no objection if the Bill had carried its principle further than it pretended to carry it, or even if, in fact, it had intrusted to the county authorities the supervision of all the highways within their respective counties. But when it was alleged that under the present law every facility was given for the good management of highways, he could only say that his experience led him to quite the contrary conclusion; for he could state from his own knowledge that the highways and parish roads in his own neighbourhood, so far from improving, had visibly deteriorated within the last twenty years, as the result of the gross negligence and abuse in the manner in which they were conducted. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment had described highways as answering a purpose that might never have occurred to any one. The hon. Member thought they were made to give employment to persons who were fit for nothing else, or to accommodate the horse and cart of the farmer. That was, no doubt, only a casual remark made by the hon. Gentleman; but it indicated the slovenly mode in which these matters were habitually dealt with. It could not be expected that road-making—an art of considerable difficulty and great importance—should be properly executed unless the persons engaged in it were paid for their services, and attended to that business and nothing else. Unfortunately he had great personal experience of the construction of highways, having had many of them to look after upon his own estate, and he knew of nothing in the world that was so dear as bad roads. There was nothing to which the maxim “Penny wise and pound foolish” was more strictly applicable. At the same time there were few improvements of the value of which farmers seemed so little sensible as good roads. He would be very sorry to back his own opinion against that of any farmer in his own county upon a purely agricultural question, but in regard to roads he thought himself as good a judge as any of them. He was convinced that the class of surveyors on whom the duty of making roads now devolved were ignorant of the first principles of their art, and were no more fit for the business than for the conduct of any department in the State. He would not trouble the House with any re-upon the details of the Bill, because it contained many points which would properly require discussion in Committee. He could only add that he believed the measure, as far as it went, would effect a considerable improvement in the present system, and he sincerely trusted that it would be introduced into law.

Mr. Walter

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, he did not altogether agree with his hon. friend who had just sat down, or with the hon. Member for Dorsetshire. Doubtless, the present system—under which the highways were not regarded by the inhabitants of different parishes and townships as parts of a great system, but only as an accommodation to themselves in their agricultural pursuits—was one requiring amendment. But he thought the necessary change could be accomplished in a better and less offensive manner than by this Bill. In his own county there was a strong feeling on this question, it being thought that if the principle of this measure were once admitted, it would eventually lead to the same results as had occurred in the case of the Poor Law Act. The representation made to the ratepayers by the Bill was indirect, and he would suggest to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State that the object which he had in view might be attained by a far simpler proposal. If the surveyor of highways were appointed by the county magistracy, with power to carry the existing law into effect, the ratepayers would still retain the control of their own affairs, and the roads might be kept in efficient repair. That plan was approved by the local bodies with whom he had been in communication, and he trusted that his right hon. Friend would consent to substitute it for the costly machinery to be created by this measure.

MRS. WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he believed that the principle of this Bill would be met with the approval of the House. He regretted, however, in the regret expressed by the hon. Member for East Kent, that no attempts had not been made to audit the accounts of the surveyors. He thought it was a question whether the Home Secretary might not yet introduce a clause to that effect into the present Bill. On the other hand the objections which had been raised to the Bill had caused him considerable surprise. It was said that magistrates would not enjoy the confidence of their neighbours in this respect as they did in others. This change, however, was analogous to that which was introduced by the Poor Law Amendment Act, and he believed that wherever magistrates had exerted themselves to carry out that law their services had been accepted with gratitude by the ratepayers. Nor did he think that this measure would increase the power of the magistracy. The magistrates were chosen chiefly from the squirearchy, and in many parishes the squires were perfectly absolute in the management of the roads. Unfortunately, that system did not produce good roads. The objections that this measure would perpetuate turnpikes and would destroy the parochial system were, in his opinion, equally unfounded. Such a Bill as this had been recommended by every inquiry which had been held upon the subject—many of them presided over by the late Speaker—and he therefore hoped that the House would assent to its principle.

MR. DILLWYN said, that the general features of this measure were similar to those of the system which was some years ago applied to South Wales. Although there were some defects in that system, which were corrected in the present Bill, it had worked exceedingly well, and had saved a great deal of money to the ratepayers. He should, therefore, vote for the second reading of this measure.

MR. CAYLEY said, he would admit that the highways were not managed as well or as economically as they might be, but he believed that the evils complained of might all be remedied under the existing law. Hon. Members of that House represented the carriage interest, which, of course, desired that the roads should be as good as turnpikes; but the question was what did the ratepayers wish. He believed that nine-tenths of his constituents were opposed to this Bill. By an Act which was now in force parishes might unite and appoint a joint surveyor, and he understood that in some counties—Warwickshire, for instance, among the number—that course had been adopted with great advantage. Farmers did not like to be subjected to the compulsion under which the Bill would sooner or later place them, and he should therefore feel it his duty to oppose the second reading. The 49th clause of the Bill referred to the abandonment of roads. He doubted the expediency of such a provision, but he was quite convinced of the necessity of providing means for obtaining access to arterial lines of communication which had been entirely altered by the introduction of railways. In some parishes there was a highway within two or three fields of a railway station ; but there was no power to open a communication between them. The starting point of this measure was the improvement which had been worked by the new Poor Law. It was, therefore, not surprising that hon. Members from the south of England regarded the question from a point of view different from that from which it was looked at by those who represented constituencies in the north. In the northern counties the Poor Law Amendment Act added a charge of 9d. in the pound for machinery to a rate of only 1s. 6d., while in the southern counties the rates were 5s., 10s., 15s., and in some cases 20s. in the pound. In the south the charge for machinery was a mere fleabite as compared with the relief obtained ; and therefore it was not surprising that in that part of the country less jealousy existed as to the expense which would be caused by the machinery of this Bill than was felt in the north. He thought that the suggestion of his hon. Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Wilson Patten) was a good one, and that the House might adopt some intermediate measure between the maintenance of the existing system and the acceptance of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the House had during a considerable portion of the Session been engaged in the discussion of political and constitutional changes, and he hoped that they would not think that the season was now too far advanced for the consideration of a useful social improvement, such as that which was the object of the Bill now before them. The introduction of railways had of late years greatly increased the importance of parish highways as compared with turnpikes ; and, having for some years devoted considerable attention to the subject, he could recommend this question to the House as one of great importance to our local internal interests. The Bill which was before the House merely authorized the magistrates at Quarter Sessions to introduce its provisions into a county if they thought fit. In a former year he proposed a measure according to which, the existing divisions of the Poor Law unions being taken as the basis of the scheme, the guardians were to be the way-wardens, and the introduction of the system was made compulsory. It was objected to that measure that it was not expedient to confound the administration of the Poor Law with that of the highways, and that the plan then proposed would lead to placing the high roads under the control of the Poor Law Commissioners. He would not say whether or not that objection was well-founded, but it led to the adoption of a different plan which was embodied in the Bill of last Session, with which the measure before them was substantially identical. He admitted that the circumstances of the country with regard to the repair of the highways differed so greatly in different districts that it might not be expedient to apply an inflexible system of legislation to all ; but if this Bill was passed no such inflexible rule would be applied. If the general feeling of the tenant-farmers and the ratepayers of any county was opposed to the system which was embodied in this Bill, the magistrates would, of course, be influenced a good deal by it, and the system would not be introduced into that county. According to his experience, magistrates in Quarter Sessions were not at all disposed to undue extravagance. On the contrary, he believed that they were quite as careful guardians of the county purse as that House was of the national one, and he therefore confidently expected that when in any county there was a general feeling that the introduction of this system would lead to a profuse expenditure of the highway rate the magistrates would be disinclined to introduce it. Being firmly convinced that the Bill would lead to the more economical expenditure of money, and would produce better roads, he should, were he a dictator, and could make laws by an ukase, be disposed to apply it compulsorily to the whole kingdom ; but as that was not the condition under which they made laws in that House, he trusted that he should not be accused of taking a weak or unworthy course in departing in that respect from the Bill of last Session. It had been objected to the Bill that it would annihilate the representative system which was embodied in the present law, and would introduce centralization. No such system of representation, however, existed. A surveyor of highways was chosen by the vestry, and after he was chosen he was their officer, but not in any sense their representative. It was quite an error to suppose that there was now any representative administration of highways. The theory was that the vestry elected a surveyor, but practically that body exercised very little selection in the matter. In some cases the retiring surveyor elected his successor, and in others, it being found difficult to get any one to accept an unpaid and troublesome office, it was by arrangement passed from one farmer to another, the magistrate confirming the appointment as a matter of course. To call the present system one of representation was almost as great a departure from the fact, and as large a draft upon the imagination, as could well be conceived. This Bill would introduce a real representative system, because it provided for the appointment of Boards of way-wardens, who were to be elected by the ratepayers. Some hon. Gentlemen thought that it was wrong that magistrates should ex officio have seats at those Boards. In that respect he had followed the Poor Law. That system worked well, and he was quite contented to accept it as a model; but the question must be considered in Committee. It was also objected to the Bill that it created a number of paid officers—surveyor, treasurer, and clerk—whose salaries would be a burden to the ratepayers. The Bill did not provide that the treasurer should be a paid officer, and he would probably in most cases be the neighbouring banker, who would be ready to keep the account of the highway district without receiving any salary. He believed that it was desirable that some person should be appointed at a small salary to act as clerk to the way-wardens at their periodical meetings; but if it was thought better that the surveyor should act as clerk he should not be disposed to object to such a change. The real essence of the system embodied in the Bill was that the districts for regulating the repair of the roads should be of considerable magnitude, and should not be accidentally determined or limited by the boundaries of parishes; that there should be a permanent officer to manage the roads of each district, and that he should be a paid officer. If hon. Members were not prepared to agree to that principle, let them reject the Bill upon the second reading. His hon. Friends the Members for Dorsetshire and Whitby had so fully stated the reasons which existed for the proposed change that he was quite satisfied that the case for the Bill should rest upon their speeches; but there was one point to which he desired to call the particular attention of the House. Since Sir Robert Peel made the sound observation that nothing tended more to the benefit of agriculture than the improvement of the minor means of communication, it had happened in many parts of the country that roads which were formerly the great arterial communications, and over which was conveyed the great traffic of the country, had, in consequence of the introduction of railways, sunk into minor importance, and that many of the parish highways, which were not included in the Turnpike Acts, had, in consequence of their communication with railway stations, become roads which were traversed by much traffic. How difficult was it for a parish to repair such a road under the existing system! There was the greatest necessity for providing more skilful means of repairing roads, and the plan now proposed was the only one by which they could be provided. It was said that the existing system was a cheap one; but no system could be a really economical one under which the greater part of whatever sum was raised was wasted and thrown away. Another objection to this Bill was that magistrates would act in a double capacity—that they would act as way-wardens, and would also adjudicate upon disputes concerning the roads. The same thing occurred under the Poor Law; and he had not heard that it had produced any inconvenience. It had also been stated that petitions had been presented from South Wales against a system similar to this, which had six years ago been introduced into that part of the country. As had been already intimated by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) however, those complaints were not against the system, but against some defects, which had been remedied in this Bill; and he had reason to believe that if this measure was extended to South Wales the petitioners would be quite satisfied. Therefore, so far as any argument could be drawn from that circumstance it was favourable, and not adverse, to the Bill. The 49th clause, to which there had been some opposition, was only an adaptation of a provision in the existing law; and, if it was found to be open to objection, it could be amended in Committee. It had been said that the audit proposed would be unsatisfactory. Let the House contrast it with that which now existed, and according to which the accounts of the surveyor were laid before a magistrate, who might have no special knowledge of the administration of roads. No doubt, some magistrates performed their duties most conscientiously, and carefully examined all the different items; but he did not feel sure that that was the invariable, or even the general practice. He inclined to think that the audit under the present system was very inefficient and unsatisfactory, and that the audit established by the Bill would be more efficient than that conducted by the magistrates under the present system. If it should not be thought efficient, the only alternative would be to appoint a separate paid officer for the purpose, and then, of course, objection would be taken to that plan. The arrangement in the Bill was the best under the circumstances. The system proposed by the present Bill was founded on a principle which must be a necessary condition for the improvement of the minor means of communication—the parish roads; and it was impossible, without adopting the principle of an area of considerable extent, so that it might be superintended by a permanent paid officer, that any skilful and systematic mode of repairing the roads could be adopted.

Mr. Cayley

Mr. HENLEY thought there could be no difference of opinion as to the importance of having good roads throughout the country; but the question for their consideration was, whether the present Bill was calculated to effect that improvement which was so much desired. But could not the roads be improved by the means now existing, or was it necessary to have large areas with skilful and paid officers? With regard to the Welsh roads, the utmost the right hon. Home Secretary could screw himself up to say was that the expenditure was not very profuse. That, then, was not a very consoling expression. [Sir GEORGE LEWIS: The expenditure is very moderate.] The right hon. Gentleman said that the circumstances of the north were different from the circumstances of the south, and those of the east from those of the west, and yet he said that though the case of different localities varied, people should have no measure to improve their roads but the present. Yet he added, that it would establish no inflexible rule throughout the kingdom, but would leave its introduction or non-introduction to the discretion of the magistrates. He (Mr. Henley) confessed he could not concur in that line of reasoning. Then how far were the Highway Boards, constituted under the Bill, likely to appoint skilful officers? Was it not the case in reference to the appointment of medical officers by Boards of Guardians that constant applications had been made to the central authority to increase the pay in order to obtain efficient officers? If that was so, why should it be expected that these Highway

Sir George Lewis

Boards would appoint efficient men to look after the roads, and how long would it be possible for such Boards to go on without the control of some central authority? He believed not three years, and that circumstance itself constituted a great objection. He ventured to say that the machinery established by the Bill would be very expensive. But they were told that a representative system was about to be introduced, and that at present nothing like a representative system existed. He was astonished to hear such a statement, for in some instances the inhabitants elected the vestry, in others all the ratepayers attended the vestry, and the vestry nominated the surveyors. He asked who called for the present measure? From year to year the country had been vexed by Bills of the sort, and yet none of them ever became law. In that respect they resembled the recent Reform Bill. The present Bill had been before them since February, and he could not avoid expressing his surprise, if it were calculated to effect such immense advantage as the right hon. Gentleman believed, that the Government had not endeavoured to press it forward before the present advanced period of the Session. He believed that the ratepayers generally were opposed to it, and that it would not establish a better system than they had at present. On the contrary, he was of opinion it would lead to much jobbery and corruption, and therefore he should offer it his opposition. The public much disliked the system of centralization which it would lead to. The petitioners in favour of the Bill amounted only, he believed, to ninety-three persons, whilst several thousands, including a great many boards of guardians, petitioned against it. Under those circumstances, he was decidedly opposed to the measure.

Question put, "That the word 'now,' stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 203; Noes 120; Majority 83.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

DEALERS IN MARINE STORES BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SPOONER moved, that the House resolve into Committee on this Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, he desired to have some explanation of the purpose of the Bill it would make it incumbent on all smiths, blacksmiths, silversmiths, ironworkers, and on all men dealing in metal, to take out a licence, keep their books in a certain way, and submit their premises to regular inspection by the police. This was a very serious matter, and he could not be thinking that the Bill went further than his hon. Friend intended.

MR. SPOONER said, that as originally drawn the licences would have been necessary; but he should in Committee introduce an Amendment which would rectify the objection. The provisions of the measure would attach only to those persons who, in the opinion of the magistrates, were carrying on the business of marine stores in an illegal manner. In the manufacturing towns there was great loss of property through the dishonesty of workmen in factories, who were enabled to dispose of the property they took away by selling it to those shops; and in Birmingham alone it was estimated that nearly £10,000 a year was lost in that way. In many of those stores a "hot pot" was kept ready, into which stolen plate was thrown and at once melted down, in order that identification might be impossible. The Bill provided that where there was prima facie evidence of such practices the owner of the shop should be compelled to take out a licence which would put him under the surveillance of the police.

MR. GEORGE LEWIS said, he would confess that his attention was not drawn to the Bill until after it had passed the second reading. Seeing the words "marine stores" on the back, he thought it was more a question for the Admiralty than for the Home Secretary. He had, however, carefully examined the subject, and although he had no doubt that the dealers in marine stores were to a considerable extent receivers of stolen goods, and that it would be desirable to place them under some supervision and control, a Bill with more arbitrary provisions than the present he had rarely seen. A very ample definition was given as to who was to be considered a dealer in marine stores, and, as had been intended, every blacksmith immediately became, under that definition, a dealer in marine stores, and must take out a licence. Now, it so happened that in an Act for consolidating the laws relating to wreck and salvage—9 & 10 Vict. c. 99, there was a statutory definition of a dealer in marine stores, which did not agree with the definition in the present Bill; so that if the present Bill passed, there would be two distinct statutory definitions of the same matter. The 9th and 10th Victoria defined as marine store-dealers "all persons who shall trade or deal in buying and selling anchors, cables, sails, or old junk, old iron, or marine stores of any kind or description." It was true that here old iron was mentioned, but the context showed that the iron of ships was meant. The definition in the Bill ought to be limited in accordance with that contained in the Act. But the hon. Gentleman proposed to empower all police inspectors and sergeants to enter marine stores, and that dealers, besides being subjected to these domiciliary visits, were to keep a book or books in which to register their dealings and enter the name, business, and place of abode of any customer. Now unless they imposed a penalty on the customer for refusing to give that information, it would be impossible for the unhappy dealer to comply with these requisitions. He had not had time to inquire whether any necessity existed for this arbitrary legislation; but if the House wished it, he should not oppose the going into Committee, though the provisions of the Bill were such as the House ought to be very cautious in adopting.

MR. NORRIS said, he thought that if the object of the Bill were to put down petty thefts by boys engaged in trades where metals were much used, the licence should be made renewable annually, and the price, instead of being 5s., should be something far more considerable. Then the small dealers—the receivers of stolen goods—would be put an end to.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, it might be advisable to relax some of the provisions of the Bill in Committee; but the evil which his hon. Friend wished to remedy was a crying one. These marine store-dealers, particularly in the large manufacturing towns, became, in many cases, the channels for disposing of stolen goods. This was especially so in Birmingham; and perhaps it would not be unwise, in the first instance, to limit the operation of the Bill to that town, where his hon. Friend's definition of a marine storedealer was perfectly understood.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, a marine storedealer might very often be defined as a person who was willing to receive, at any hour, without any inconvenient inquiries, any goods that might be offered to him. The trade was one which, perhaps, required more stringent regulations than any other; and he thought the House might fairly be asked to go into Committee to see whether the Bill could not be so framed as to meet the evil.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Definition of Terms).

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that was the time to consider whether the definition of marine stores given in the existing Act, to which he had alluded, should not be adopted in the Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, he thought that definition would not meet cases in which persons assumed the names of marine store-dealers with a view to receive stolen goods. He particularly wished to include silver and gold within the definition, so as to render the Bill applicable to the receivers of those articles when stolen. With regard to the suggestion of his hon. Friend (Mr. Newdegate) he was not unwilling to limit the application of the Bill to Birmingham; but he had received communications from a large number of towns asking him to proceed with the measure, and expressing an opinion that legislation on the subject was greatly needed.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it might be desirable to extend the definition of the existing Act; but was not his hon. Friend proposing to extend it too far? He proposed to bring within the grasp of the Bill all persons who bought old metal. Bankers bought bullion; and bullion was old metal. Would not bankers, therefore, come under the provisions of the Bill? At all events, it would include jewellers, watchmakers, dealers in copper, iron, and other metals.

MR. SPOONER said, that the only persons who would be brought under the provisions of the Bill were such dealers in old metal as the magistrates had reason to believe to be receivers of stolen property. There must, in the first place, be application made to the magistrate, and prima facie proof of an illegal trade offered to him before he could compel the dealer to take out a licence. Pawnbrokers were subjected to much the same restrictions; and he did not see why they should not be extended to dealers in marine stores.

MR. BRISCOE observed it would be very difficult to carry out the Bill, if it applied only to persons who were suspected of being receivers of stolen property, as there were grave objections to magistrates acting on suspicion merely. There were, however, strong grounds for requiring every person, who professed to deal in marine stores, to take out a licence.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS observed, that every dealer in marine stores might be called upon by a policeman to show cause why he should not take out a licence. That, combined with the definition given, would be a very arbitrary provision. If the hon. Member's object merely was to enable the police to deal more effectively with these cases, why not arm them with greater powers where a reasonable suspicion existed that persons were receivers of stolen goods?

MR. ROEBUCK said, the Bill applied to dealers in old iron and metal. But suppose a person dealt in old rags, and had in his cellar a crucible—he would not come under the operation of the Bill, and yet he would be just the person resorted to by those who wished to get rid of stolen property. The manufacturers of Sheffield suffered much from these petty thefts; but the Bill would not protect them, and would merely create an arbitrary power for no useful purpose.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, that if a man were only to take out a licence when suspected of being a receiver the words "dealer in marine stores" painted over his door would, in that case, be a notice to all the world that he was prepared to buy stolen goods. Now, it was certainly desirable that the trade of a receiver should be carried on without a public advertisement of this kind. If these dealers were carrying on an illicit trade, it should not be regulated, but put down. But it was contrary to the common right of the subject that a man without proof should be assumed to be dishonest, and should be visited with these arbitrary police regulations.

MR. HENLEY said, the explanation of his hon. Friend (Mr. Spooner) made the Bill ten thousand times more objectionable than before. The great iron manufacturers, who bought old stuff to work up, and ironmongers, whether great or small, were at the bidding of a police constable to go before a magistrate, who was to decide whether they were respectable or not; and if a man squinted, or there was anything else about him which the magistrate did not like, he would have to pay 5s., take out a licence, be subjected to police visits, and make all kinds of entries in his books. If boy, then, came into his shop to buy a nife, he must ask his business and place of abode. Why, a good many boys would have neither place of abode nor business. It would be very well if you could only define exactly who were thieves and who receivers, but as that was impossible, it was unjust to subject a whole class of men to such arbitrary restrictions. Policemen were always given to suspicion—it was their trade—they suspected everybody, and no one could tell whom they might include in the drag-net with which this Bill would furnish them.

Mr. Sotherton Estcourt

MR. HANKEY said, he believed it impossible that the discussion on such a Bill could have any satisfactory conclusion, and he should therefore move that the Chairman do leave the chair.

MR. CLIVE said, there was already an act compelling marine storedealers to keep books and to paint their names and business over their doors, and the hon. Gentleman's object would probably be attained if the definition in that Act were extended. There could be no doubt of the existence of the evil; but it was very doubtful whether it could be met by the remedy now proposed, and he therefore suggested that the Bill should be withdrawn, and that on another occasion the hon. Gentleman should try to amend the existing definition.

MR. SPOONER said, his hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) was very much like a ferret in a rabbit-warren, and when he got hold of a Bill there was generally an end of it. But his hon. Friend was inaccurate when he said that under the Bill the suspected dealer, on the mere authority of a policeman, must go before a magistrate. The policeman must first of all convince the magistrate that there were grounds of suspicion, and the magistrate alone could authorize any police visits.

MR. H. H. VIVIAN said, he thought that the hon. Member had done well in bringing the subject before the House. At Birmingham and elsewhere metal was stolen to a large extent. Whether the Bill would meet the evil he was not prepared to say, but now that public attention had been directed to the subject a remedy would doubtless be provided.

MR. RIDLEY suggested that the Home Secretary should obtain information on the subject from the stipendiary magistrates throughout the country, in which case he believed it would be found that there were every year a large number of cases of receiving which it was impossible to deal with adequately under the existing law.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he quite admitted the existence of the evil the Bill was intended to meet; but what he objected to was that they should attempt to meet the evil by a Bill so arbitrary and so likely to prove inefficient.

MR. SPOONER said, he would withdraw the Bill on the understanding that the Government would endeavour to amend the existing law, and to grapple with an admitted evil.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was quite prepared to admit that marine storedealers generally, especially in the large towns, were concerned either constantly or occasionally, in receiving stolen goods. He was also quite prepared to inquire whether any improvement could be made in the law affecting persons suspected of being receivers. He could not undertake to introduce a Bill, but so far he would pledge himself; and he thought the hon. Gentleman had shown proper deference to the feeling of the House by not proceeding with a measure which proposed such an interference with individual liberty.

House resumed. [No Report.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, July 5, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—2^d Tramways (Scotland); Ionian Islands (Marriages).
3^d Endowed Charities; Inland Bonding.

ITALY—GENERAL GARIBALDI.

QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he wished to ask his noble Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs a question of which he had given him notice. There had appeared in the official Gazette of Palermo the appointment of the Duc di San Giuseppe as the representative of Sicily in England. Now, it was obvious that the representative of Sicily at this moment could only be the representative of General Garibaldi. He could not conceive that our Government, being in amicable relations with that of the King of the Two Sicilies, could receive a diplomatic agent from a foreign adventurer who, by force of arms, and the aid of other adventurers, had taken possession of a portion of that Sovereign's dominions. Without entering on a discussion of the general question, he begged to ask his noble Friend, Whether Her Majesty's Government were informed of the appointment of the Envoy in question before it was announced in the official journal, and if so, whether they had intimated their willingness to receive him? His noble Friend must, of course, be aware that it was usual even for the most regular Government, before appointing a representative to any Court, to consult that Court as to whether the person they had in view would be acceptable.

LORD WODEHOUSE stated, that the Government had seen the announcement in the newspapers to which the noble Marquess referred, but had received no other intimation on the subject. He might take that opportunity of saying, in reference to a question which the noble Marquess had asked on a previous occasion, that there was no foundation for the report of Mr. Elliot's interference in regard to the vessels which were seized by the Neapolitan cruisers. Mr. Elliot did not interfere in any way whatever. His noble Friend would, however, not be astonished to learn that, without such interference, the vessels and men had been given up by the Neapolitan Government.

LORD BROUGHAM would draw no comparison of General Garibaldi with certain potentates, or say anything of adventurers who had gained their possessions by force of arms, as that might be thought invidious; but this he could not help saying, that he believed 999 out of every 1,000 persons in England heartily wished him success.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH apprehended that the last official communication from the Neapolitan Government must have been the despatch of General Lanza, announcing the complete defeat of Garibaldi. As to any person coming over here to represent Garibaldi, he could only say it would be difficult to find a more truly dignified or worthy person in Europe to represent.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he thought it would be worth the while of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) to read the reports which had appeared in the newspapers of Paris, Lyons, and Marseilles, of the transactions which had occurred in Sicily, since the evacuation by the Neapolitan army. The accusations therein made against General Garibaldi and his followers showed that there had been assassinations not by tens, but by hundreds. Not only had those who were supposed to be agents of the police been murdered, but women had also been assaulted and put to death. In one case it was said a woman had been burnt. Now, he gave much more credit to those statements than to the accusations against the Neapolitan Government. He believed, however, that both were very much exaggerated. His noble and learned Friend had formerly pronounced opinions on the side of order and against the revolutionary spirit then afloat, and as those opinions had been published they would remain more permanent than anything he might say in the course of this conversation.

The Marquess of Normanby

LORD BROUGHAM: I am very much obliged to my noble Friend for volunteering an advertisement, without any payment by Mr. Ridgway. On the part of Mr. Ridgway I thank my noble Friend, as probably he has saved Mr. Ridgway five shillings. But I do not value to the extent of that sum all the information to which my noble Friend refers, and which I have read in the foreign papers. I mean to put a still smaller value on it. I do not value it so much as I do my noble Friend's own private correspondence from Florence and Naples. With respect to my opinions on revolutions, whether delivered in this House or published elsewhere, I maintain every tittle of those opinions.

LORD WODEHOUSE deemed it only just to General Garibaldi to say that the official accounts received from officers of Her Majesty's navy and from our agents abroad stated that the General had behaved with the utmost generosity and humanity, and that he had taken every possible means to prevent such excesses as were too generally incidental to a state of revolution.

House adjourned at a quarter past Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, July 5, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Queen's Prison; Crown Debts and Judgments.
2^o Dominica Hurricane Loan; Postage (Army and Navy); Heritable Securities, &c.; Indemnity.

ISLAND OF ST. JUAN
QUESTION.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would beg to ask the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has lately received a Despatch respecting the Island of St. Juan, confirmatory of certain proceedings which are said to have taken place in that quarter, at the instigation of General Harney?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL, in reply, said that it was quite true that orders had been issued by General Harney with respect to the island of St. Juan, in complete contradiction to the arrangements which had been made by General Scott, who had directed that a small number of the troops of each nation should occupy the island, and that there should be no exclusive jurisdiction. General Harney, departing from that arrangement, had given instructions that the American jurisdiction was to prevail in St. Juan, on the ground that it belonged to the United States; but the moment intelligence had reached Washington that such orders had been issued, Lord Lyons had entered into communication on the subject with General Cass. By General Cass, the matter had been laid before the President, who directed that General Harney should be immediately recalled, and that the affairs of St. Juan should be placed on the footing arranged by General Scott. He would only add that the action of the President afforded an assurance that good faith in dealing with the question would be observed on the part of the Government of the United States.

ITALY—NAPLES AND SICILY.
QUESTION.

COLONEL STUART said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or are prepared to take, any steps in concert with the French Government to prevent the bombardment of Naples by the King's Troops, in the event of General Garibaldi suddenly occupying that City, as he did Palermo?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that after the intelligence of the bombardment of Palermo, and the great suffering which that bombardment had entailed upon its unfortunate citizens, had reached her Majesty's Government, they had taken into consideration the question of what steps they should adopt in order to prevent the occurrence of similar atrocities at Naples or Messina. Now, he should wish to observe that there were two points which must be borne in mind in dealing with that subject, the one involving the question of the admissibility of the interference of the English Government with the civil and internal discords of another country, while the second—supposing the objection upon the ground of principle to be got over—involved not only the difficulty but the impossibility of issuing such precise and definite orders to the commanders of Her Majesty's vessels of war as to enable them to distinguish between that which was legitimately defensive action on the part of the troops of the King of Naples against the attacks of a mob in insurrection, and that which was a wanton destruction of the city of Naples, and of the lives of its inhabitants. Such being the case, Her Majesty's Government had altogether refrained from issuing instructions which would enable our naval commanders to act by force against Naples or Messina. Her Majesty's Ministers had, however, strongly remonstrated with the Government of the King of Naples against the renewal at either of those ports of those dreadful scenes which had occurred at Palermo, and he was happy to be in a position to add that he had received accounts from our Minister at Naples, which stated that he hoped there would be no scenes of bloodshed whatever in that city, and which led him (Lord John Russell) to believe that there was no prospect at present of a bombardment taking place. He might further state that he had heard that morning that the Constitution of 1848 had been proclaimed at Naples, and that elections of representatives to a Legislative Assembly, which was to meet there in the month of September, were about to take place. It would therefore be seen that the Neapolitan people would have it in their power to dispose of their own affairs. He might mention that in this matter there had been rumours from time to time with respect to the conduct of Her Majesty's forces and of Her Majesty's Ministers abroad which were very erroneous. There was a report, the House would remember, some time ago, that the fort of Castellamare was occupied by the British Admiral during the evacuation of Palermo. That report gave great uneasiness in some quarters, and it was supposed that Her Majesty's forces were about to take possession of Castellamare. But there was no truth, no foundation whatever, in the Reports. There was another report, which occasioned inquiry in "another place," that Her Majesty's Minister at Naples had interfered to induce the Neapolitan Government to restore the two vessels captured off Palermo with passengers, and taken into Gaeta. He had received a despatch from the British Minister at Naples, stating that he had not interfered at all in the matter. At the same time he was happy to state that the Neapolitan Government had spontaneously given up the vessels, and that they were at liberty to return to Genoa.

TAX BILLS.—THE RESOLUTIONS.

QUESTION.

LORD FERMOY: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of asking a question of the hon. Member for Finsbury. It happens that I have good reason to know that it is the wish of a large number of hon. Members who agree with him and me on the subject of the aggression of the Lords, that he should not press his Motion of which he has given notice as an Amendment on the Resolutions of the noble Lord the Prime Minister; I have therefore now to ask the hon. Member for Finsbury whether he will be good enough not to press his Motion as an Amendment to the Resolutions, but to reserve to himself the right of submitting it as a substantive Resolution.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE: Sir, I am sorry to find that the notice which I have placed upon the paper is inconvenient to what is called the greater portion of the Liberal party in this House. I was in hopes that my Amendment would rescue the Liberal party from what I consider the impotency of the Resolutions of the noble Lord; but finding that not to be the case, and that the House would be unanimous on the subject I should be sorry that any interference on my part should interrupt that unanimity, and if I can obtain no support for my Motion from the Liberal party of course it will be of no use for me to put it. Therefore there is no alternative left but to withdraw it, thereby, I believe, disappointing the public at large.

TAX BILLS.—RESOLUTIONS. •

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON rose to move the first of three Resolutions of which he had given notice, and which are as follows:—

Lord John Russell

"1. That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, an essential part of their Constitution; and that the limitation of all such Grants, as to the manner, measure, and time, is only in the Commons."

"2. That, although the Lords have exercised power of rejecting Bills of several descriptions relating to Taxation by negating the whole, the exercise of that power by them has been frequent, and is justly regarded by this House with peculiar jealousy, as affecting the right of the Commons to grant the Supplies and provide the Ways and Means for the Service of the year."

"3. That, to guard for the future against the due exercise of that power by the Lords, and to secure to the Commons their rightful control over Taxation and Supply, this House has in its hands the power so to impose and remedy, and to frame Bills of Supply, that the right of the Commons as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, may be maintained inviolate."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said: I rise upon an occasion which undoubtedly will rank as one of the first important among those which have arisen in regard to our form of Parliamentary proceedings, and in which cause there can, in my opinion, be no more important to this House; there can be nothing, I think, of greater importance to the country than those questions which relate to the respective rights, principles, and practices of the Houses of Parliament. But, Sir, before I address myself to the subject, I wish to perform what I consider to be a duty—to call the attention of this House to that Report which has been presented to them by the Committee which they appointed to investigate and enquire into the Journals and authorities bearing upon the question—a document, I think, containing a summary of Parliamentary proceedings that will prove a lasting source of reference to the House in regard to the history of its proceedings. And, Sir, I fail to express what I am sure is the opinion of the Committee, of which I am a Member, if I did not state to the House how thankful they felt; how very much they were indebted to the right hon. Member for Cambridge University, who was then Chairman of that Committee, and to those officers of this House who gave us so willing and assiduous assistance in the performance of our labours; and how satisfied that the House will respond to the Committee in returning their sincere thanks and acknowledging their obligation to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, and to those officers of the House by whom they have been so ably aided.

Now, Sir, the question at issue is

considerations of the utmost constitutional importance. Our constitution consists of authorities separate from, and independent of, one another; each possessing rights and powers which it may exercise upon its own authority. In the earlier periods of our history that was not the case. If, indeed, we go back to very remote periods, we shall find that the Lords—that is the Barons—were powerful enough to overrule the Crown, and by their exertions, by their courage, by their perseverance, by their spirit, and by their patriotism, they obtained for us the great and fundamental charter of our liberties. Then came a conflict between the Crown and the Barons, which lasted for a great length of time; but the Crown in the end prevailed, and established an arbitrary power, which ground down and controlled the liberties of the nation until at last it became an intolerable burden to the people. The extreme exercise of an excessive power created resistance. The nation rose against the Crown, and in withstanding its arbitrary authority, it not only overthrew the Crown itself, but involved the other estates of the realm in its ruin. Well, Sir, the humour of the country did not long adapt itself to that state of things. The power of the Crown was restored, but it was restored only to be again abused. That abuse of authority again produced its natural result. The Crown was once more overthrown—that is to say, those who exercised the authority of the Crown were overthrown by the very excess of their power, and their unchecked and uncontrolled exercise of it. Then came about that state of things under which we have since so happily lived and flourished—under which, I may say, this nation has enjoyed a greater amount of civil, political, social, and religious liberty than, perhaps, ever fell to the lot of any other people in the world. But how has that result been accomplished? Not by vesting in either of the three estates—the Crown, the Lords, or the Commons—exclusive or overruling power over the others. It has been brought about by maintaining for each its own separate and independent authority; and also by those three powers combining together to bear and forbear, endeavouring by harmonious concert with each other to avoid those conflicts and clashings which must have arisen if independent authority, and independent action had been exerted by each or by all. The consequence of this has been that which we now so fortunately see around us.

Well, Sir, I say that each estate of the realm retains its power. Each of the three retains the power of originating laws, and each possesses the power, in common with the other two, of rejecting laws when proposed for their acceptance. It is generally supposed that the power of the Crown to reject laws has ceased to exist; but that is a fundamental error. That power survives as before, but it is exercised in a different manner. Instead of being exercised upon the laws proposed for the Royal Assent, it is exercised by anticipation in the debates and proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament. It is delegated to those who are the responsible advisers of the Crown; and it is therefore not possible that a law passed by the two Houses should be presented to the Crown, and should then by the Crown be refused. And why is this? Because it cannot be imagined that a law should have received the consent of both Houses of Parliament, in which the responsible Ministers of the Crown are sitting debating, acting, and voting, unless those who advise the Crown have agreed to that law, and are, therefore, prepared to counsel the Sovereign to assent to it. What would be the consequence if that course were not pursued? Why, Sir, if a law were passed by the two Houses against the will and opinion of the Ministers of the day, those Ministers must naturally resign their offices and be replaced by men in whose wisdom Parliament reposed more confidence and who agreed with the majorities in the two Houses. If that were not the case the two Houses would very soon intimate to the Crown their opinion in regard to those advisers, and would not leave any choice as to the hands in which the confidence of the Crown should be placed.

I say, then, Sir, that each branch of the Legislature retains its respective power of rejection. But the Commons House of Parliament have claimed from time immemorial particular privileges in regard to particular measures. They have claimed—and I think justly claimed, as is stated in these Resolutions—the exclusive right of determining matters connected with the taxation of the people. We (the Commons) have claimed to ourselves the right of originating such measures. We have denied to the Lords the right of originating such measures: we have, moreover, denied to them the right of altering or amending such measures. And both these assertions of right we have the power to enforce; because, in either case, Bills originating or amended in the Lords must come down to this House, and this House then has the opportunity either to confer with the Lords, thereby endeavouring to persuade them to give up their alterations, or to reject the Bill. In either alternative we have in our hands a clear, plain, straightforward, and direct method of giving effect to the claim or right which properly and legitimately belongs to us.

But, Sir, in those memorable Conferences which took place between both Houses of Parliament in the year 1671, it was admitted by the Attorney General, on behalf of the Commons—and for his conduct on the occasion of those Conferences he was thanked by this House on the ground that he had satisfactorily maintained its rights and privileges—it was admitted by the Attorney General that the Lords, although they could not originate and could not amend, had nevertheless the power to reject, money Bills. That admission, however, was no great concession, because, as I have stated, a Bill rejected in the other House at once disappears. It does not come back to this House again; and therefore no direct or immediate action is possible on the part of the Commons in regard to a measure so rejected in the Lords. Consequently, in admitting, as the House of Commons did at that time, and afterwards in the year 1678, that the House of Lords have the power of rejecting “in the whole” as was the expression used, this House only admitted that which it would be difficult to deny, and that with regard to which, if denied, there would be no direct manner of giving effect to the denial.

Thus, then, matters have stood since that period. A great number of cases, indeed, have arisen in which Bills connected with taxation and impositions upon the people, having been amended by the Lords and returned to us, have here been immediately rejected in some instances, as is recorded, with marks of contumely, or Conferences have taken place upon them, by means of which the Lords have been induced to depart from their decision. In other instances, again, where the Amendments of the Lords have been merely verbal and unimportant, or only such as were calculated to further the intentions of this House, those Amendments have been adopted in other Bills sent up to the House of Lords which have accordingly been passed by that Assembly.

But, Sir, the cases to which I am now adverting relate to Bills which have for their object the imposing of taxes. The present case is of a different nature. It is the case of a Bill repealing a tax; now, when you admitted the right of the Lords to reject Bills, if that concession were not accompanied—as it was not—by any limitation as to the kind of Bills to which the admission applies, you can only by argumentative and abstract reasoning establish a distinction between one set of Bills, and Bills of a different description. But in fact, although we contend—and I think, justly contend—for a right which is closely interwoven with the constitutional history of the country—although we contend for the right of originating measures for the grants of supply, or of shaping them according to our belief of what is for the public interest, yet, nevertheless it is well known that the Bill so prepared and framed by us cannot pass into law without the assent of the Lords; and it is clear that an authority whose assent is necessary to give a proposal the force of law must, by the very nature of things, be at liberty to dissent and refuse its sanction. To take from the Lords the power of dissenting to a Bill to which their assent is now required, you would need an Act of Parliament to which they must themselves be parties, or you must by a revolutionary proceeding subvert our existing Constitution.

But, Sir, if we look to that large number of precedents in which the Lords have returned to us with Amendments Money Bills which have been sent to them from this House, and in regard to which conferences took place by means of which the alterations thus made were either rejected or agreed to, we shall find, as I have said, that that long string of precedents relates almost entirely to Bills imposing taxes; and even in the great precedent of 1671, upon which the conference was held, and by which a mutual right of rejection was conceded, that conference originated in the Lords trying to diminish a tax which was proposed to them. It did not arise in a case similar to that which has recently occurred, in which the Lords refused their consent to the repeal of a tax. Then, Sir, I say that the great bulk of this series of precedents is somewhat besides the question which has given rise to the search of the Committee. There are, however, precedents which bear directly upon the point at issue; because we find that between the year 1714 and the present time there have been about thirty-six cases of Bills for repealing duties or imposts of some kind or other, which have been sent up to the Lords, and have been rejected by them, or at least have not come down to this House again. So far, therefore, as these precedents go, it may be contended that they are authorities upon which the House of Lords may ground itself to justify its recent proceeding. Nevertheless, Sir, if you look at them you will find that the Bills which were so rejected were Bills involving taxes either of small amount, or connected with questions of commercial protection, or of public policy of some kind; so that in fact it may be said that in these cases the rejection of the Bill arose not so much from the determination of the Lords to continue the imposts upon the country as imposts, but rather from their differing in opinion with the Commons as to some question of national policy with reference to which these taxes or imposts were to be continued or repealed. This also may be said with regard to those taxes, that none of them were at all to be compared in amount to the revenue which was involved in the Bill for the repeal of the duties on paper.

Well, then, Sir, admitting as I think we must do, that technically, in point of fact, we have never questioned the right of the Lords to reject Bills of that nature, yet the present case assumes a character somewhat different from that of any of the precedents, because we have maintained in word, and we have also maintained by action, that it rests with this House to frame the Supplies of the year, and to consider and determine with regard to the aids and Supplies of the year what taxes shall be imposed, and what shall be remitted, and also what shall be the proportion between imposition and remission, and what shall be the nature of the arrangements. It is our privilege to combine the whole into one scheme, and when that scheme is so framed, it certainly is not consistent with the exclusive functions of this House that any material portion of it should be rejected by the other House, so as to alter and entirely vary the bearing of all the financial arrangements.

The question is, was that done by the House of Lords upon the late occasion. One must admit, I think, that in principle it was so. It cannot be denied that the repeal of the paper duty did form one important element in the plan of finances which was sent up by this House to the Lords, and if everything had remained as it was when that plan was framed, the refusal of the Lords to pass that remission of duty, they having agreed to pass a Bill adding to another tax, would have deranged the combination of finance which, upon a balance of remission and imposition, had been thought by this House to be good for the interests of the country, and sufficient for the Supplies of the present year. At the same time, Sir, as we have admitted, that in those thirty-six cases of rejection to which I have alluded, a question of policy was allowed to enter as an element into the decision of the House of Lords in those cases, now it is not easy to affirm with certainty what were the grounds upon which the House of Lords may have acted in any one of those cases; but looking at the manner in which in those instances questions of taxation were combined with other questions of policy, it is fair to assume that in those cases the rejection of the Bill did not arise simply from the refusal of the Lords to relieve the people from a certain amount of burden, but was partly dictated by the belief that the arrangements with which the abolition of that burden was coupled was not for the public advantage, and therefore they rejected the Bill with which it was connected.

Well, Sir, can the same be alleged in the present instance? I wish to put that as fairly and as impartially as I can. This is a question in considering which I think that party feelings ought to be cast aside. It is one in which higher and larger interests than those of party are concerned, and in which the course that the House may now take will be a precedent to guide future Parliaments; and, therefore, Sir, I think that in considering this matter one ought, as far as possible, to place oneself in the position of an impartial spectator, and to state fairly and honestly that which may be said upon each side of the question.

I cannot here allude to anything that may have passed in debate in the House of Lords. That is not consistent with our Orders; that is not our function; but looking broadly at the matter I do not believe that if, under ordinary circumstances, this House had determined that a certain tax ought to be repealed, and had sent a Bill to the House of Lords for that purpose, that House would have rejected such a measure. If it had been shown that there was an excess of taxation which pressed heavily upon certain interests of the country, that the revenue raised by it was unnecessary, or that a better arrangement might be made by transferring the burden to some other interest that could bear it better, I do not believe, judging from what has happened on many former occasions, that the Lords would have taken the step which they recently took. We know, Sir, what an immense amount of taxation has been repealed by the two Houses of Parliament since the end of the war in 1815, and in no one instance, that I am aware of, did the Lords dissent from the decision of the Commons as to the relief of the country from burdens which were thought to be no longer necessary. Therefore I cannot bring myself to believe that the Lords, in the step which they have now taken, intended to enter on a course, their progress in which, if they did enter upon it, it would be the duty of this House to resist by every constitutional and legal means which are at our command. I mean that I do not believe the House of Lords intended to take the first step towards a partnership with this House in arranging the Budget of the year, in fixing the measure, the manner, the time, or the amount of aids and Supplies, which it belongs solely and exclusively to this House to determine. If we believed that such was their intention, and that this is only the first step in such a course, then, Sir, I say that it would become us to resolve in our own minds to take those measures which are in our power to defeat and frustrate it; but until we have some more decided proof that such an intention was entertained, I would adjure the House to content itself with the record of that declaration which is contained in the Resolutions, which I have had the honour to lay upon the table, and not, without being driven to it as a matter of necessity, to enter upon a formal conflict with the other House of Parliament.

But, Sir, I ask have the Lords received no encouragement from this House to take this particular step? The Bill for repealing the Excise Duties on Paper was brought into this House under circumstances which were materially and notoriously altered when its rejection in the House of Lords took place, and although its second reading was carried by a majority of 53, its third reading was passed by a majority of only 9.

Well, Sir, if it had gone to the Lords with an equally large majority upon the third reading as upon the second, I do not believe that they would have done otherwise than pass it; but they saw—although they may not have known it officially, it was a matter of public notoriety when our proceedings were laid upon their table—they saw that during the interval between the second and third reading the opinion of this House appeared to have undergone considerable alteration. The majority of 53 upon the second reading of the Bill was reduced to 9 upon the third reading. Were not the Lords, therefore, entitled to think that the opinion of this House upon this question was not so strong as it had been? Then, as far as they could judge by public opinion, they might legitimately infer that which the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury has since confirmed by the Estimates laid on the table of the House, that that which we had a right to expect would not take place with regard to the balance of income and expenditure had taken place; and might they not think that it would be wise to give this House time for reconsideration, with a view to see whether that amount of revenue, which was justly thought to be unnecessary when the financial arrangements for the year were made might not, by altered circumstances, the occurrence of which it was beyond our power to control, become a source of income which it was desirable to keep up for the year, rather than to make up for it by transferring to other interests the burden which had been long borne by that industry and that interest of paper manufacture which was affected by the duty.

Viscount Palmerston

Well, Sir, stating, as I trust, the case impartially upon both sides, while on the one hand I think the House would have been right to have resisted any attempt on the part of the Lords to enter into a partnership with us with a view to determine the financial arrangements of the year—while I think that by so doing they would be stepping out of their province and departing from the line of constitutional right which the history of the country has assigned them—yet on the other hand, if it can be believed, and I am led myself to think so, that they were not actuated on this occasion by any such intention, but by motives of policy dependent upon the circumstances of the moment, I think it would not be wise for this House to enter into a conflict with the House of Lords upon a ground which may not really exist, but to satisfy themselves with a declaration of what are their own constitutional powers and privileges, reserving to themselves the exercise of that power, which they have within their own means if any case should arise, if that opinion which I have expressed should not be confirmed; and if a deliberate course should be pursued of changing the whole system of constitutional proceedings in regard to taxation—I say, Sir, that if that should arise we will determine to use those means which I am convinced we possess and which are quite sufficient to restrain or to prevent any such inroads on the constitutional privileges of this House. Many may think that the last Resolution is too vague, and that it does not distinctly point out the method by which we might enforce our constitutional rights and privileges in the event of an attempt being made to invade them. But there are many ways in which, upon such a case arising, we should be able, first by argument, ultimately by the exercise of our own authority, to prevent such an encroachment upon the constitutional functions of this House. If, Sir, such a mad course were to be adopted by the Lords, it would not be by a Resolution entered upon our Journals; it would not be by commencing a scolding match with the other House; it would not be by impotent words laid on our table that our constitutional rights could be vindicated. No, Sir, it would be by action, which we should not be slow to discover the mode of taking; and I have not so mean an opinion of the powers of this House and of the weight of public sentiment—which would be declared emphatically in such a case—as to believe that we should be reduced to that condition in which the Commons of 1671 represented themselves to be when they said, that their right to originate and grant aid to the Crown was the only poor thing they had to proffer for the acceptance of their Sovereign. The House of Commons stands now in a very different position from that in which it has been at other periods of our history. The course of events, the extension of representation, the diffusion of knowledge, the power of the press, and the effect of public opinion have been such that this House is daily increasing in its power instead of diminishing in that respect; and therefore, Sir, so far from feeling any apprehension that the Lords may be able to usurp our legitimate functions, I am convinced that if we pursue a steady, dignified, and consistent course—if we abstain from anything that may savour of passion or aggression—if we stand upon and maintain our own rights, using, when necessary, the means belonging to us of making those rights respected, we shall be able, whenever our real functions are deliberately invaded, to protect them in the face of day, and with the full approval and sanction of the country.

I say, then, Sir, that these Resolutions are adequate to the present occasion. They declare in plain language what our constitutional functions are—rights and functions which I may say are interwoven with the whole course and history of this country, which no man can deny, which will not be denied, I venture to say by any single individual in the other House or in any part of the country. The Resolutions moreover point out that if our rights should be invaded we have within our own hands the means of resisting such invasion. I think, Sir, it would not have been becoming or even decent upon an occasion on which there was an appearance at all events of an intention to invade our functions—it would not have been right or decent for this House to have remained absolutely silent. Such a silence might have been construed into a yielding of rights and functions which we mean steadily to maintain in our own hands. On the other hand, Sir, I think we should not have raised ourselves in public estimation: I do not think we should have done anything towards maintaining effectively those rights and functions which belong to us if we had thrown into these Resolutions anything likely to prove the commencement of hostilities with the other branch of the Legislature. It is of the utmost importance in a Constitution like ours, where there are different branches independent of each other, each with powers of its own, and where cordial and harmonious action is necessary, that care should be taken to avoid the commencement of an unnecessary quarrel. The party which acted otherwise would, I consider, incur a very grave responsibility. I will not believe that it was the intention of the House of Lords to do so. Some may think that I entertain too favourable a view of the conduct of that House, but I say that if we have not proof sufficient to satisfy us that the rejection of the Paper Duty Bill was the first step in a new system of constitutional conduct, we had better, instead of involving ourselves in an unnecessary quarrel, pursue the policy which we now recommend for the adoption of the House. I think that course is a dignified one. I think, too, it will be efficacious. I am convinced in my own mind that these Resolutions, going forth from this House will be a sufficient warning to guard against any occurrence in future to which we might fairly take exception. We are not prepared to undo that which has been done. Perhaps in ordinary times, under ordinary circumstances, we might have advised this House to pass again the Bill which was rejected by the Lords, to return it toties quoties, if you will; to suspend all other business till it was passed, and by the exercise of those means which we have in our own hands, to render it necessary for the Lords to give way. But, Sir, the circumstances of the moment do not render that course of action desirable; and that being so, I say that unless we felt at liberty to return the Bill in some shape or other, and to insist in the present Session upon the repeal of the paper duty, we ought to take the course which it is my duty to recommend for adoption.

And, Sir, in conclusion, I would only urge upon the two houses the advice which a great authority in Parliamentary matters—Mr. Hatsell—has embodied in two passages of his well-known work. I would say to the Lords,

“The conclusion to be drawn from all these transactions is that it should be the endeavour of each House of Parliament to take care in their proceedings not to transgress those boundaries which the Constitution has wisely allotted to them, nor to interfere in those matters which by the rules and practice of Parliament in former ages are not within their jurisdiction, for the rights and privileges of Parliament are interwoven with the earliest establishment of government in this country.”

Sir, I would recommend that passage to the consideration of the House of Lords. To the House of Commons I would venture to suggest another passage from the same author. I would say to them,

“The sole and exclusive right of beginning all aids and charges upon the public, and not suffering any alteration to be made by the Lords, is sufficiently guarded by the claims as here expressed, and it does not seem to be either for their honour or advantage to push the matter further, and, by asserting privileges which may be subjects of doubt and discussion, thereby to weaken their claim to those clear and indubitable rights which are vested in them by the Constitution, and have been confirmed to them by the constant and uniform practice of Parliament.”

I think, Sir, that to refuse the Lords the right of rejecting Bills which go up to them for their assent, would bring us under the meaning of the passage I have just read. But I do not believe that they would be disposed to follow that. I am inclined to think that they value highly the existence of the money which it is essential should be between the two branches of the Legislature: and if at all times that ought to be the ruling feeling of the House, there is nothing in the present state of affairs out of the kingdom—there is nothing, I repeat, Sir, in the general state of affairs in Europe and in the world which should lead this House to neglect highly of the importance of a harmonious union, or to dispose them to exhibit a reign of anarchy, the lamentable and humiliating spectacle of a disunited Legislature divided people, and of internal conflict at a time when it is desirable for the honour, and interests of this country, we should manifest to all nations a harmonious unity of action among all the parts of the realm for the common welfare of the country. I now beg, Sir, to move the first Resolution:—

Viscount Palmerston

Motion made and Question proposed.

“That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, a vital part of their Constitution; and the expediency of all such Grants, as to the matter, manner, and time, is only in them.”

MR. COLLIER: Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the first Resolution has been proposed for our adoption by a noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government is sufficiently explicit and declares that which the House of Commons has many times declared before, and it appears to me that the declaration is a fitting occasion. But I cannot concur with the noble Lord on the perspicuity of the two following Resolutions. I am not sure whether, from these two Resolutions, it can be collected that the House of Commons has or has not a right to complain of the proceedings of the House of Lords with respect to the rejection of the Bill for the repeal of the paper duty.

Sir, I rather collect from these Resolutions that we have no right to complain, because if we have no right to complain of the proceedings of the House of Lords, I hardly know upon what principle it is declared that we are to prevent the recurrence of a similar proceeding on the part of the House of Lords.

Now, Sir, I have given notice of an Amendment which would have removed any ambiguity in these Resolutions.

Amendment was to this effect:—that the House of Lords, by rejecting the Paper Duty Repeal Bill, had committed a violation of constitutional usage. I used no hard words; I implied no strong expressions; but it appeared to me that they had done one of two things—either that the House of Lords had committed a breach of constitutional usage or that they had not. If they had not, I do not know what reason we have for a Resolution at all. If they had, I do not see why the House of Commons should shrink from expressing our views and declaring so.

Sir, it was my determination to have proposed a Resolution then containing a definite expression of the opinion of this House. As, however, I find that the opinions of many hon. Members around me are in favour of a unanimous vote, and that I should be running counter to the feelings of the House if I were to propose that Resolution, I feel that it would not be desirable that I should take any course which might prevent that unanimous decision to which the House wishes to come.

But, Sir, perhaps the House will permit me, having been a Member of the Select Committee, and having considered the subject and given it some attention, to state very briefly the views which I entertain upon the subject now under discussion. Not one word will I utter in this discussion, I promise the House, in the slightest degree disrespectful to the House of Lords upon this occasion.

Now, Sir, all who are moderately well acquainted with the history of this country are aware that we owe to the House of Lords no small portion of our freedom. They have privileges as valuable and as dear to them as our own; their privileges are as dear to them as are the privileges of the House of Commons to the House of Commons. But while we respect their privileges we are bound to assert our own, for we hold them, not only for ourselves, but we hold them in trust for the people of England.

Now, Sir, I will state at once to the House what it is I am prepared to maintain with respect to the recent vote of the House of Lords.

Sir, I do not mean to assert that the vote of the House of Lords was illegal, but I do assert that it was opposed to constitutional usage. I assert that it is a breach of that tacit understanding which regulates the functions of the two Houses of Parliament, without the maintenance of which the constitution cannot work. And, Sir, I may in one moment illustrate the difference between that which is legal and that which is constitutional.

Now, Sir, no man will dispute the legal right of the Crown to veto any Bill or any number of Bills; but will any man tell me that if the Crown vetoed every Bill which is passed by the two Houses during the Session, let me ask whether any man would say that such a course would be constitutional?

Sir, upon the subject of the difference between what is legal and what is constitutional, I will at once quote an authority which I am sure will be respected by hon. Gentlemen opposite if they will do me the favour to listen to me. It is the authority of Lord Lyndhurst on the occasion of the discussion in the House of Lords on the Life Peerages Bill. Lord Lyndhurst upon that occasion insisted as against the Crown that although there may have been a strict legal right, still the exercise of that right was unconstitutional; and I pray the House to hear what was said by Lord Lyndhurst upon that occasion, which explains more clearly to my view the difference between what is legal and what is constitutional. Lord Lyndhurst says,—

“I hear it repeated that this is part of the prerogative of the Crown, and that the Crown may legally appoint a Peer for life. Assuming that to be the case, it does not follow that every exercise of such a prerogative is consistent with the principles of the Constitution. The Sovereign may, if he thinks proper, by his prerogative create a hundred Peers with descendible qualities in the course of a day. That would be consistent with the prerogative, and strictly legal; but everybody must feel, and everybody must know, that such an exercise of the undoubted prerogative of the Crown would be a flagrant violation of the principles of the Constitution. In the same manner, the Sovereign might place the Great Seal in the hands of a layman wholly unacquainted with the laws of the country. Other cases might be adduced, but these already cited are sufficient to establish the principle which I maintain.”

And, Sir, Lord Lyndhurst concludes with these words, to which I pray the particular attention of the House.

“Every person who has studied the Constitution of this country, and who is at all conversant with the principles on which it is founded, must be aware that one of its principles is long continued usage.”

Sir, the same argument was used by another noble and learned Lord, who, as against the Crown, quoted this maxim, “Leges per consuetudinem abrogantur.”

Sir, I will now call the attention of the House to a Resolution of the House of Lords with respect to the conduct of this House, which directly illustrates the position which I now put before the House.

Sir, in 1702, in a Bill called the Land Tax and Irish Forfeiture Bill, we had inserted a provision creating an incapacity in the managers of the Excise from sitting in Parliament. Now we had a right to do that; there can be no doubt whatever that we possessed a legal right to do that, but the House of Lords passed this Resolution—

“That the annexing any clause or clauses to a Bill of Aid or Supply, the matter of which is foreign to and different from the said Bill of Aid or Supply is Unparliamentary, and tends to the destruction of the Constitution of the Government.”

Now, Sir, I say that if the House of Lords could assert as against the Crown the distinction between that which is legal and that which is constitutional, they cannot complain that the same distinction is asserted against them. The House of Lords were perfectly right—there was such a distinction. Our Constitution is not founded in any code, nor written in any book; happily, I say you do not describe the Constitution by defining the precise legal and technical rights of any one branch of the Legislature—for any one branch of the Legislature, by insisting on no more than its legal and technical rights, without transgressing any positive law of Parliament, may upset the whole balance of the Constitution. The three bodies politic, if I may use the expression, are not retained in their orbit by any force which it is possible with mathematical precision to define. Their harmonious action was secured by a tacit understanding which regulates the motion of each, which, though the least palpable, was one of the most essential elements of the Constitution, and when any one of them deviates from the course prescribed by that tacit understanding, the whole Parliamentary equilibrium was disturbed.

Now, Sir, having established the difference between that which is legal and that which is constitutional, forgive me for a moment reminding the House of the precise effect of that which the House of Lords have done.

Sir, the House of Commons have passed a Budget, one main feature of which was the repeal of the Paper Duty, and another main feature was the increase of the Income Tax. There were several divisions in this House upon the question as to whether the Paper Duty should be repealed and the Income Tax increased, and many hon. Members voted for the increase of the Income Tax, upon the express understanding, if I mistake not, that the Paper Duty would be repealed.

Mr. Collier

Now, Sir, the House of Lords have accepted so much of the Budget as increased the income tax, but they have refused so much of the Budget as repeals the paper duty; and I do assert that this is a course which they have never taken before. I say that there is no precedent for it; I say that it is an interference with the right of the Commons to regulate taxation which the House of Lords until the year 1860 never has attempted.

Now, Sir, let us see what the effect of this would be if the Paper Duty Repeal Bill had been intended to take effect at once. The duty would have been actually taken off, and the effect of the vote of the House of Lords would have been that a tax being taken off, it would have been reimposed, and that for the first time in the history of our Constitution.

Sir, the vote in the House of Lords has been defended, not upon the ground suggested by the noble Lord (alluding to the Earl of Derby who was sitting in the Peers' gallery,) but it has been defended upon the ground that the House of Commons did not take sufficient care to provide proper supplies for the exigencies of the State. It has been said that the House of Lords took a more comprehensive view than the House of Commons. [Cheers from the Opposition.] I quite understand hon. Gentlemen opposite maintaining that view of the question—that the House of Lords looking to a possible deficit this year, and a possible deficit in the next year, and the year to come—[Cheers from the Opposition.] I am glad that I am right in the view I take—that the House of Lords differing from the Crown and differing from the Commons, undertook to supply a million and a quarter more than the House of Commons thought necessary to supply.

Sir, I cannot accede to the doctrine broached by the noble Lord that the constitutional right of the House of Lords to deal with the Bill depends upon the amount of majority. I know of no constitutional maxim that if a Money Bill has been carried by a majority of 50, the House of Lords has no right to deal with it, but that if passed by a majority of ten they have a right to deal with it. That is entirely new to me.

Now, Sir, that then is the effect of the argument of the noble Lord. The course pursued by the House of Lords has unquestionably taken everybody by surprise.

Sir, I will now proceed to inquire whether this proceeding of the House of Lords is or is not consistent with constitutional usage, and before I come to the precedents to which I will invite the attention of the House very shortly, I wish to remind them of what is familiar to them, but which from its very familiarity may not present itself to their minds. It is hardly necessary to remind them that this House alone is addressed by the Crown on the question of Supplies. Whether or not at the conclusion of the present Session, Her Majesty will thank the House of Lords for not consenting to the remission of taxation, I do not know, but it seems to me to be a matter of courtesy that Her Majesty should do so.

Sir, Money Bills are sent back to this House instead of being presented by the House of Lords to the Crown, and above all (and to this I beg to draw the particular attention of the House), the Votes of the House of Commons with respect to Supplies have been treated for a great length of time as practically final and conclusive.

Now, Sir, if the House will allow me I will read a short extract from Blackstone (and there was no greater lawyer than Blackstone), written more than a hundred years ago, in which it appears that the confidence of the public in the Votes of this House was then old. Blackstone writes this:—

"The Resolutions of this Committee (Ways and Means) when approved of by a Vote of the House are generally esteemed to be as it were 'final' and 'conclusive.' For though the supply cannot be actually raised upon the subject till directed by an act of the whole Parliament yet no moneyed man will scruple to advance to the Government any quantity of ready cash on the credit of a bare Vote of the House of Commons, though no law be yet passed to establish it."

Now, Sir, I ask would Blackstone, the most accurate of writers, append this passage if the House of Lords had ever dealt with this? I quote the passage as a commentary upon the precedents, and I say that Blackstone would never have appended this passage if there had been a precedent at all in point on the recent proceedings of the House of Lords.

Now, Sir, having called the attention of the House to a passage from a great lawyer, perhaps I may be permitted to call the attention of the House to the opinion of the greatest of statesmen, Lord Chatham. It is an extract from his speech on the subject of the taxation of America. Lord Chatham says:

"Taxation is no part of the governing or legislative power. The taxes are a voluntary gift and grant of the Commons alone. And I pray the attention of the House to this distinction. In legislation the three estates of the realm are alike concerned; but the concurrence of the Peers and the Crown to a tax is only necessary to clothe it with the form of a law. The gift and grant is of the Commons alone. In ancient days the Crown, the barons, and the clergy possessed the lands. In those days the barons and the clergy gave and granted to the Crown. The property of the Lords, compared with that of the Commons, is as a drop of water in the ocean; and this House represents these Commons, the proprietors of the lands. And those proprietors virtually represent the rest of the inhabitants. When, therefore, in this House we give and grant, we give and grant what is our own. The distinction between legislation and taxation is essentially necessary to liberty. The Crown and the Peers are equally legislative powers with the Commons. If taxation be a part of simple legislation, the Crown and the Peers have rights in taxation as well as yourselves."

And I pray the attention of the House to the prophetic passage in conclusion. He says:

"Rights which they will claim, which they will exercise, whenever the principle can be supported by power."

Sir, to the last Lord Chatham maintained that, although we had a right to legislate for America with respect to all other questions, even with regard to the regulation of trade, although it might incidentally involve taxation, we had no right to deal with questions of pure taxation, on the principle that taxation and representation went together.

Now, Sir, this is the creed in which we have all been brought up. Sir, it is the faith in which the country have acted; and the House of Commons, acting on this faith, have in the present century voted a large quantity of revenue, which was formerly annual, but which they made perpetual, on the understanding and belief that the House of Lords would never interfere to prevent the grant. Sir, I am satisfied that we never should have voted the Sugar Duties and Malt Duties as permanent duties, if we had believed that we, the grantors, giving a voluntary grant, should not be permitted at any time to change our minds; and the House of Lords, who have repeatedly said that we, the House of Commons, were the sole judges of the matter, the manner, and the time, would interpose, and say you, are not the judges of these things, and we will interpose to prevent you exercising your own judgment as to the time for which these taxes will be taken.

Sir, I think I may instance the very appointment of this Committee, as a proof that every one was taken by surprise at this vote of the House of Lords. I hear it said occasionally, "Oh, the House of Lords have done no more than they have been accustomed to do; they have just as much right to reject this Bill as the Bill for the Abolition of Church Rates, or any other Bill." But if this proceeding was altogether analogous, why was not the Motion of the noble Lord for a Committee to search for precedents opposed; a precedent, be it remembered, which the House of Commons has never taken, except upon very grave occasions, when its liberties have been seriously endangered, either by the Lords or by the Crown?

Now, Sir, having made these observations, if the House will permit me, I will now refer to the precedents; and I promise them that if they will give me their patience a very short time, I will not abuse that patience; I will go through the precedents as briefly as possible; and I shall be able to classify them, and very shortly to deal with them; but it is absolutely necessary to do that. These precedents must be explained; these precedents, as they stand alone, would entirely mislead the House.

Now, the Committee, of which I was a Member, have not thought it necessary to go back before the year 1628. And probably the House will think that a wise step, for the greater number of the most important precedents have occurred since that time; and unquestionably it is most important to ascertain what has been the practice since the Revolution, when the Constitution may be said to have been finally settled. Let it always be borne in mind, that if the Revolution settled the Constitution, it settled it upon the old foundations. The Revolution introduced nothing new; it merely restored what was old. It is true that the foundations of our liberty had been undermined; but still the old and solid masonry remained, and is distinctly visible; and it is because the fabric of our Constitution has been erected upon these foundations that it now stands.

Sir, one of those main foundations was the exclusive right of the Commons to tax the commonalty of England; and it may be well to establish, if, indeed, there be a question of it, that this is not a comparatively new right set up by the House of Commons; it is not the consequence of usurpation, but it is as old as the existence of the very Commons themselves.

Mr. Collier

Now, Sir, without discussing the obscure points in the early history of this country, I will make this remark—that the Commons appear to have broken the egg fully fledged with all the powers of taxation. Their powers of taxation were coeval with their existence, and they were called into existence as instruments of taxation. I find in the 9th of Edward II., this extract in the Rolls of Parliament. I will not fatigue the House by reading any lengthened passages; but I think it necessary to read some passages. As early as the reign of the 9th of Edward II., I find this entry in the Rolls of Parliament:—

"Cives, burgenses et milites de comitatibus qui venerunt ad Parlamentum concesserunt domino Regi in auxilium expeditionis quere sui Scot quintam decimam, bonorum mobilium civium burgensium, et hominum de civitatibus, burgis et dominiis Domini Regis in regno suo."

Now, Sir, it is important that the very next entry to this is that of an Act in which both Houses concur, enabling the King to raise troops; but the grant of money was from the Commons alone. In this reign, in the next of Edward III., in the next of Richard II., and in the next of Henry IV., the Commons have asserted again and again their right to the exclusive taxation of the Commonalty. I know that in ancient times the House of Lords taxed themselves, and the clergy taxed themselves up to the reign of Charles I., in Convocation; but the exclusive right of the Commons to tax the people of England was coeval with their very existence. They soon became assured of those rights, and they insisted on conditions in the reign of Richard II., which is stated by Hallam in his Middle Ages:—

"The Commons refused to grant a Supply except upon the condition that the King would pardon the insurgents; and thereupon a controversy arose between the King and the Commons, and the King eventually gave way."

There a controversy had arisen between the King and the Commons, and the King eventually gave way. That was a case in which the House of Lords was in no way concerned.

Now, without going at length through the earlier reigns, it may be enough to say that through the reigns of the Princes of the House of Tudor, the rights of both Houses of Parliament were, to a great degree, in abeyance, both Houses being over-awed by the Crown. But neither in the reign of Henry VIII., nor in that of Elizabeth, did the Crown ever venture to dispute the right of the House of Commons to tax the people to the extent to which it was disputed by James, and subsequently by Charles I. But the right to tax had always been valued by the Commons more than all their other rights put together, and they have always regarded the struggle for the right of taxation as a struggle for their own existence.

Now, Sir, having thus rapidly given a sketch of the previous periods of history before the Report (I am very unwilling to occupy the time of the House; I assure them that I will not do so longer than is absolutely necessary), I now come to the year 1640, when Pym asserted the rights of the House of Commons, and I venture very shortly to say that Pym insisted upon no new right; but he insisted upon a right which had existed for centuries before. I beg to call the attention of the House to what took place upon that memorable occasion. The Lords sent a message to the Commons to this effect. They intimated very politely at first that it would be desirable to begin with Supply before anything else; but they accompanied that message with these memorable words, to which I beg to call the attention of the House. They say:—

"Upon all these considerations, although my Lords would not meddle with matters of subsidy which belong properly and naturally to you; no, not to give you advice therein, but have utterly declined it, yet being members of one body, &c., they have declared by vote that they hold it most necessary and fit that the matter of Supply should have precedence over any other matter or consideration whatsoever."

Sir, the House of Lords, in 1640, declared that they would not meddle with subsidy; not so much as even to give advice. But the House of Lords, in 1860, have done a good deal more than give us advice. They have not only taken on themselves to advise, but they have also taken on themselves to correct. Upon that occasion to which I refer, Pym vindicated the rights of the House of Commons. He said:—

"Your Lordships have been pleased to affirm that the matter of subsidy and Supply naturally belonging to the House of Commons, your Lordships would not meddle with it; no, not so much as to give advice. But," he continued, "if you have voted this (referring to their vote), you have not only meddled with matter of Supply; but as far as in you lies, have concluded both the matter and order of proceeding which the House of Commons takes to be a breach of their privilege."

If the House will now kindly give me their attention for a few minutes, I think I shall be able to show that there are none of the precedents quoted in the Report of the Committee to which I am about to address myself at all applicable to the recent proceedings of the House of Lords. Those precedents are divided into two classes—where the Lords have amended the Bill, and where they have rejected the Bill. And this I must say, that if the question had been whether the Lords had a right to amend instead of rejecting, I should have had more difficulty in dealing with the precedents, because there are far more precedents for amending than for rejecting Bills. It ought to be borne in mind that the House of Lords never relinquished the right to amend. They asserted it as strongly as they did the right to reject; more so, in fact.

Now, Sir, if the House will permit me, I will proceed to deal with the thirty-four precedents relating to the rejection of Bills repealing or altering a tax. I have classified them, and I think I shall be able to state the effect of them very shortly. Let it always be borne in mind with respect to these precedents that the House of Commons does not dispute, and never has disputed, the right of the House of Lords to deal with all questions independent of taxation. All that the House of Commons maintain is that taxation is our province. We have never said that if a Bill concerning the Church, for example, or concerning highways, incidentally imposed a tax or contained taxing provisions, that, therefore, the House of Lords have no right to deal with it. If we did so, we should arrogate to ourselves a most unconstitutional power, and should be encroaching on the proper functions of the House of Lords. But I shall be able to show the House that these precedents do not contain a single case in which the Lords have rejected a Bill repealing or altering a tax upon purely financial grounds. Five of the precedents (I will go through them very shortly) relate to religion—the Gael Chaplains Bill, the Roman Catholic Land Tax Bill, the Tithes (Ireland) Bill, the Personal Tithes Abolition Bill, and the Church Rates Abolition Bill. These all relate to religion, and I may state that several of these are what are called "tacks," that is, provisions were added to them which the House of Commons had, strictly speaking, perhaps, no right to add, and relating to matters other than taxation. I find, for example, that the Gaol Chaplains Bill was an Act relating to the salaries of clergymen, and giving justices of the peace the power of dismissing officiating chaplains in Houses of Correction. There can be no doubt that the House of Lords had a perfect right to deal with that Bill.

Now, Sir, I come to six other Bills. I have disposed of five. Six other Bills are the Highways Bill, the Highway Penalties Bill, the Sale of Game Bill, the Court of Session (Scotland) Bill, the Tolls on Steam Carriages Bill, and the Rating Stock-in-Trade Bill. All these Bills involve questions of policy of various descriptions relative to the regulation of highways, the sale of game, the relief of the poor, &c.—questions with which this House never asserted an exclusive right to deal. Eighteen other Bills relate to the regulation of trade, and I say that the House of Commons have never arrogated to themselves the exclusive right to regulate any branch of trade. The House of Lords might have thrown out a Bill concerning the corn laws when that Bill was sent up to them, that being a question with which they had a perfect right to deal. It was a question of free trade and of protection. The distinction suggested by Lord Chatham should be clearly borne in mind with reference to this point. "You may tax the Americans," Lord Chatham says, "for the regulation of trade, but you must not tax them for fiscal purposes." The House of Lords have a perfect right to interfere with Bills for the regulation of trade, but they have no right to interfere with money Bills. Now, the Woollen Manufactures Bill was a question of protection to trade; the Irish Cattle Importation Bill and the Irish Tallow Bill were questions of justice to Ireland. The Anglessea Copper Mines Bill was a question of protection. The Thread Lace Bill involved the protection of the lace manufacture of the country. The Foul Salt Bill—salt used for manure—the Brass Exportation Bill, the Corn Regulation Bill, the Coasting Trade Bill, which has been quoted, and which is what is called a "tack"—all these Bills contained regulations on a variety of subjects with which the House of Lords had a perfect right to deal. The Duties on Coals in Wales Bill was a Bill regulating the coasting trade. Then there is the Worts Bill, and I dwell upon this for a moment because it has been quoted, I am in "another place" as a precedent. In 1841 the price of corn was very low, and the question was whether facilities should be given for distilling from molasses. The question between the West India Company on the one side, and the farmers on the other, and it was so argued in the House of Lords. That, therefore, was a question of free trade or protection. We have the Manure Carriage Bill and the Goods Bill, after which comes the Bottled Stone Bottles Bill, which, I believe, is the main foundation of the proceeding of the House of Lords to have the preamble of the Bottles Bill, or rather of the Bill which was subsequently passed, which will show the meaning of it. The preamble expresses

Mr. Collier

"Whereas, for the protection of the manufacturers of the United Kingdom, it is expedient to repeal the said duties and draw to impose other duties, &c."

And I may make this observation with respect to this Bill and a great many others, that there were always fifty other Bills besides those. This is a Bill which contains a great variety of provisions of all sorts, and finally there is the Bill to which I have just called the attention of the House. That, therefore, was a question of the protection of a trade with which the House disputed the right of the House of Lords to deal. Then we have the Inland Navigation Bill, the Inland Navigation Bill, the Tobacco Growth (Ireland) Bill—all relating to the regulation of trade.

Sir, I have thus disposed of the Bills containing respectively five, six, seven, and eighteen of those Bills. I now come to the Bills which cannot be disposed of upon the same grounds. Two of them are Custom House Bills—the Fees Abolition Bill—one for England and one for Ireland. These have been taken as precedents directly to the House of Commons which justify the course adopted by the House of Lords. I maintain that the House of Lords have nothing whatever to do with the prevention of Custom House officers from levying gratuities on persons who deal with them. They involved nothing whatever on the public, nothing to a tax upon the public, either by imposing it or the taking it off. They were simply Bills containing certain provisions preventing Custom House officers from exceeding their duty. There is another Bill—the Tobacco Du-which I may confess, when I first looked at it, rather staggered me. Here, I said, a Revenue Act—an Act for repealing duties on tobacco and snuff, and granting new duties in lieu thereof. This clearly is a fiscal Act. But I looked at the second Bill which passed, and the former Bill which it was to explain and to amend, and I find that the Bill which it explained and amended contained no less than 177 clauses regulating the whole of the tobacco and snuff trade between America, Spain, Portugal, and Ireland, prescribing the tonnage of vessels, the size of casks, the forfeiture of vessels, respecting warehouses, the right of entry of Custom House officers into the premises of private persons, the jurisdiction of justices, &c. This, then, constitutes no precedent at all. This was one of those Bills which nobody whose senses ever denied the right of the House of Lords to deal with, and which I am astonished to find quoted as a precedent.

Now, Sir, I have, I am happy to say, only two left. I now come to the Wine Merchants Bonds Bill, and the Tobacco and Wine Merchants Bill; and here we are getting “small by degrees and beautifully less.” These precedents are so small that Mr. Hatsell does not think it worth while noticing them, and they are hardly worth quoting. A few wine merchants petitioned to be relieved from the interest on bonds which they had given for duties. They had paid the principal, and they wished to be relieved from the interest, and the question was whether a clause in an Act of Parliament then existing was sufficient to enable the officers of Customs to remit the interest. That was the question. The House of Lords differed from the House of Commons upon that subject. Thus I have disposed of these two Bills which are perfectly frivolous questions, and have nothing whatever to do with this subject. They were so small that we need not be surprised even if the Commons did not watch them very closely. They could not always be awake to their rights in regard to such questions. Perhaps the principle de minimis non curat occasionally prevailed.

Now, Sir, I have gone through the whole of the precedents which have been cited of Bills altering or repealing taxation which had been rejected or postponed by the House of Lords. And allow me to observe with respect to them that several of them were dropped by the Government, one or two in consequence of the lateness of the Session, one or two in consequence of Amendments in Committee. But if the House will favour me with their indulgence for a very few minutes longer, I will proceed to deal with another class of Bills, namely, Bills imposing a tax; and I shall show that here all precedents are equally irrelevant. I shall be able to go through these in a very few minutes if the House will be good enough to follow me, and they are far less in number than the others. The Worsted Yarn Duties Bill was a question of protection to the worsted trade of this country. The Tobacco Trade Bill—(and if the House will allow me I will refer to the preamble of the Bill) if any one does not know what a “tack” is, he may learn from this—contained provisions for encouraging the tobacco trade, for disposing of goods in Her Majesty’s warehouses, for the making of linen in Scotland, provisions with regard to Customs officers, to enable the Bank of England to lend on South Sea Stock, for the relief of Sir J. Lambert and others, and a variety of other heterogeneous provisions.

Now, that is gravely quoted as a precedent. If the House of Commons chose to send up such a hotch-potch as this, the House of Lords had no other course but to reject it. Again, the Pawnbrokers Regulation Bill prescribed a great number of regulations with respect to pawnbrokers’ tickets, and the lodging of them, and a great number of things of that kind, but before a certain date we can find no Bills. I cannot tell you precisely what the Bill was, but it appears to have related to the regulation of the trade. There are a hundred clauses prescribing all sorts of regulations with which the House of Lords had a perfect right to deal.

It has, moreover, been just suggested to me with perfect truth, that before a certain date we cannot find the Bills, and we cannot therefore tell precisely what some of them were. The Raw Silks and Velvets Bill was a most clear “tack,” for besides imposing additional duties on the importation of raw silks and velvets, it had clauses to prevent the unlawful combination of workmen employed in the silk manufacture. That is a totally different question.

It was never alleged that the House of Lords had not the right to deal with a Bill relating to the unlawful combination of workmen. I need hardly mention the case of the reward to Dr. Smith. Then there is the Bill with regard to Phillips’s powder

Lords is financially right, and whether they are constitutionally right. If they happen to be financially right the more the danger—the danger that those who do not distinguish clearly in questions which are essentially different may accept a present benefit at the expense of a permanent evil. But, Sir, I am satisfied that the eyes of this country are upon this House. We must look well what we do. Remember we have rejected the Reform Bill. [Cries of "No, no!"—we have virtually rejected it, and we have thereby refused the extension of popular rights. It remains to be seen how far those to whom popular rights have been promised by statesmen on both sides of the House will rest satisfied, if, in addition to withholding popular rights, we show ourselves inclined to abandon those which we already possess. If we show ourselves careless guardians of those rights, depend upon it that we shall entirely and irrevocably forfeit the confidence of the country, and the forfeiture of that confidence will, I believe, more than anything else, give an impetus to that democratic and dangerous reform which is dreaded by all who value the institutions of the country.

Sir, in conclusion, (and tendering to the House my sincere thanks for the indulgence which they have shown me) I am satisfied that we shall not part with our right of taxation. The exclusive right of taxation is the life blood of the House of Commons. The principle of taxation being co-ordinate with the representation is the most vital element of the Constitution. But should the time ever arrive, and I trust that time may be far distant, when the House of Commons shall bate one jot or tittle of its privileges in respect to the sole and exclusive control of the finances, I say from that day we date the decadence of the Constitution of this country.

MR. CONINGHAM: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the speech of the noble Lord, the First Lord of the Treasury in bringing forward these Resolutions on the part of the Government, and I very much doubt whether that speech will be received throughout the country with the same degree of favour which it seems to have met from the Opposition benches. For my part, I cannot help thinking, nay, I am firmly convinced that the determination of Her Majesty's Government to do nothing but place a mere dry and idle record upon the Journals of this House as an answer to the vote of the House of Lords, is calculated to be fatal to the Administration. I am satisfied that no Government can last in contempt to which it must inevitably rise on the part of the country while the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton stands forward in this manner the defender of the rights and privileges of the House of Peers instead of the defender of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons. The noble Member seems to forget that every word he has uttered in palliation of the conduct of the other House of Parliament is a reality casting a censure upon the conduct of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Member who sits beside him.

Mr. Collier

Sir, it is not a financial question which has been said before, which we should consider. It is a great constitutional question whether the people of this country and their representatives are to maintain their ancient rights and privileges, or whether they tax themselves by their representatives whom they have sent into the House of Commons.

Sir, I can state to the House that I have recently met my constituents in my own constituency, and I venture to say that the Members who would be inclined to doubt my statements, that the constituents of this country are not so enlightened and as intelligent as that of the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, and I believe that the opinions are but a type of the opinions of the majority of the people of this country. You talk of the apathy of the people of this country! For my part I am not to deny that that apathy exists, but I venture to tell the hon. Member for the Government as well as the hon. Member who sit on the Opposition benches, that they are tampering with dangerous elements when they bring the rights and privileges of the responsible House into direct collision with the rights and privileges of the representatives of the people. You think that by passing this Resolution you have solved the question. I can tell you that the debate which is taking place this evening will create an agitation such as has not been seen for many years. [Oh, no!—I imagined that the proceedings of the House were regulated by order and the rules of courtesy. It is not by interruptions that I am to be put down. I intend to be heard and to state what I have to say. I am an independent Member.

this House, and a real and genuine representative of my constituents. I am not the representative of a rotten borough, but I am the representative of a large and enlightened constituency. [Interruptions.] It is not, I say, by idle clamour and interruptions of that kind that I am to be put down and silenced. I am acting upon my right and privilege in now addressing this House, and this is not the first time that I have received those rude and idle interruptions, which I will venture to say are most unwarrantable and most unjustifiable. I have never trespassed unfairly or unduly upon the time or patience of the House whenever I have spoken. I have, on the contrary, endeavoured always to adhere closely and rigidly to the question at issue, and I do certainly appeal to the hon. Gentlemen who sit on both sides of the House, to at all events give me a fair hearing when I come upon an important occasion of this kind to express my sentiments in a manner, I trust, like a Gentleman and a Member of Parliament.

Now, I can assure the House, Sir, that I do not wish to trespass at any length upon its patience. I think that fully enough has been already said upon this question. I think that an immense amount of time has been lost in the idle search that has taken place for precedents. I know well how that search will end; but before I sit down I cannot but enter my deliberate protest against the decision which has been come to by Her Majesty's Government, who have contented themselves by simply placing this unmeaning (for it is unmeaning) platitude upon the Records of this House. If there should be a division upon the present occasion, I should certainly vote against placing any such idle record upon our Journals which is calculated to bring the House of Commons into contempt—it is barking when we do not intend to bite. I am of opinion that the Petition which was presented to this House this evening by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) should be again presented to this House; and if it should be so presented, and if the Paper Duties Repeal Bill should be again brought forward, I am sure it will be passed by such a commanding majority in the House of Commons as shall compel the House of Lords to pass it likewise. I moreover warn the House of Commons that if they turn a deaf ear to the voice of the people, that voice will be raised in no unhesitating accents, and that when the hon. Members of this House go back to their constituents, those who have failed in this great crisis of our constitutional history to do justice to those constituents who have sent them here to represent their rights and to defend their just and ancient privileges—I say, Sir, that I feel that confidence in the honesty and clear-sightedness of the constituencies of this country that they will not send those, who fail in a moment like this to do their duty, back to the House of Commons again to betray the rights and privileges of their constituents.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY: Sir, I have listened with great attention and great admiration to the speech which has been addressed to the House by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier), but although I agree with the entire of what my hon. and learned Friend has stated, I apprehend at the same time that he did not arrive at a right conclusion. If you read over these Resolutions which are now before the House carefully, as I myself read them over most carefully before I came here, I think you will arrive at the conclusion at which I have arrived. I may also add, that I have carefully gone through all the precedents which have been laid before us, and the conclusion I have come to is, that these Resolutions are in substance all that the House of Commons can do at the present stage of the proceedings. I, for one, do not consider these Resolutions as at all final and conclusive; I consider, on the other hand, that they may be regarded as only the first step in the initiation of a much bolder course. I apprehend that it will be quite open to the hon. Member for Brighton, who has just sat down, to take a much bolder course when these Resolutions have been put to the vote and passed.

Now, Sir, to refer at once to the Resolutions, because it is those that we have here to deal with. The first Resolution is a mere transcript, as I read it, of the Resolution that was passed by this House in the year 1692. The words appear to me to be identical; they are given in this printed Report of the Select Committee on Tax Bills, and hon. Members therefore may readily refer to them. As I said just now, the first Resolution proposed to the House by the noble Lord at the head of the Government is an exact copy and transcript of a Resolution which was come to in 1692 by the House of Commons, and which was then handed to the House of Lords. In the year 1692 the House of Lords did not sit down tamely under that Resolution, but they then thought it necessary to come to an equally strong Resolution; in fact, they thought it necessary to give the House of Commons of that day a Roland for their Oliver—at all events they did not think proper to sit quietly down under that Resolution. I find this passage:—

“After several conferences, Mr. Attorney General reported that their Lordships did not insist upon their proviso. Reasons assigned by the Lords: ‘That they can by no means agree to what was offered by the House of Commons at the last Conference because, besides many precedents in former times in taxing themselves for their personal estates, they have had a very late one in the Act intituled, An Act for raising Money by a Poll and otherwise towards the reducing of Ireland and prosecuting the war against France, wherein they did nominate Commissioners of their own for taxing their personal estates. And because they conceive that the making of amendments and abatements of rates in Bills of Supply sent up from the House of Commons is a fundamental inherent and undoubted right of the House of Peers from which their Lordships can never depart; they have therefore thought themselves obliged to assert it upon this occasion. But considering that a difference between the two Houses upon this Bill may create such delays in the passing of it as would be of the most fatal consequence in the present conjuncture, the Lords have not thought it convenient at this time to insist upon their proviso.’”

A Committee on that occasion had been appointed by the House of Commons to draw up reasons, and the reasons to be assigned were,—

“That the right of granting Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution; and the limitation of all such grants as to the manner, matter, measure, and time is only in them, which is so well known to be fundamentally settled in them, that to give reasons for it has been esteemed by our ancestors to be a weakening of that right. And the clause sent down by your Lordships to be added to this Bill is a manifest violation thereof.”

And then the reasons of the Lords follow, which I have already read to the House.

Now, Sir, that occurred in the year 1692. We had thus, to a certain extent, been allowed to establish a precedent in our own favour, but there is the assumption of authority on the part of the House of Lords which, as far as I can make out from reading these Resolutions (and I have, I assure hon. Members, read them very carefully), is a direct assumption; it is an assumption of authority to that extent, that is, as regards the right to interfere in an important matter of taxation upon purely and exclusively financial grounds.

Mr. Vincent Scully

I cannot find that the question is carried to a further extent, and I certainly do not find that the House of Lords ever imagined in that day that they had a right to amend or to reject any Money Bill from the House of Commons. That question had never arisen, but the debate has now arisen, and the question before the House is whether they have a right to reject the Repeal of the Paper Duties Bill; a Committee has been appointed for the purpose of searching for precedents, and the Report of that Committee is before the House.

Well, now, Sir, I look upon that first Resolution as a very valuable one. It raises the question of the right of the House of Lords to interfere. The House of Lords must either have taken some active steps against this Resolution, or they must have fought the battle. If, however, they have taken no steps in the matter and have done nothing, it is perfectly clear that we have got a step in advance. If they do take a step in advance, we may possibly come in collision. But then there are two other Resolutions, which are very vague.

Now, this being the state of affairs, I do not see what more we can do. These Resolutions are merely the assertion of our rights. The oldest precedent to be found in this very valuable Report contains the same sentiment. It is, that these proceedings of the House of Lords are not to be brought into action, are not to be brought into precedent, against the House of Commons. I see that quoted here in page 8 of this most valuable Report, and I will give to the House the exact sentence from the Report, in order that there may be no mistake upon the subject. It says that these proceedings of the House of Lords at that time

“Are not to be drawn into a precedent by which the House of Commons would be bound.” [It is a precedent in the year 1407]—“neither in this present Parliament nor at any time hereafter.”

Now, Sir, I do not for a moment say that these Resolutions of the Government might not have been framed in terms more clear and precise. I do not say that they might not have been framed in more terse, clear, and cogent phraseology by many hon. Members who are now sitting around me. I flatter myself that I could have put them into more clear and bright language than that in which they are framed. However, Sir, there the Resolutions stand, and they must be judged of and decided upon as they stand, and I leave that matter by stating that I think I could have thrown them into more severe and striking language. If the Government does think fit to assert the right of the House of Commons, and the House of Commons supports the Government, I apprehend that that will be sufficient. The House of Lords have found means to enforce their rights in cases where the House of Commons were utterly at variance with them in the House of Lords. I have found a precedent which does not appear in this printed Report of the Select Committee which has been presented to the House, but it is connected with one of the matters which is referred to in the Report of the Select Committee. I have no doubt whatever that if the Government think fit to assert the right of the House of Commons to pass the Repeal of the Paper Duty Bill and the House would support it, the Bill would be carried. The House has the means of enforcing such a course, even if they were in the wrong. There is a precedent with regard to this point which, as I have already said, is not quoted in the Report. It relates to the Irish Cattle Importation Bill in 1758. That Bill was sent up from the House of Commons to the House of Lords, who ordered it to be postponed, which in point of fact amounted to its rejection, and it was afterwards rejected. But I find in the year 1766 a very distinct precedent, which is not given in this collection of precedents. But it appears that a direct and distinct contest arose upon this very question in the House of Lords, and after several pitched battles on the subject the House of Lords were obliged to give way, although they had declared the importation of Irish cattle a public and common nuisance. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth quoted the precedent to which I refer from Cartes Ormond, as extracted from The Irish Land Question, by Mr. Vincent Scully. The battle between the two Houses of Parliament upon the Cattle Importation Bill ended by the House of Commons forcing the House of Lords to accept the measure in its integrity, however unjust, and also to swallow the obnoxious word "nuisance." If, therefore, the House of Commons were to be again driven into a contest with the House of Lords, I have no doubt as to which of the combatants would come out successful. The House of Commons came to a certain Resolution, and the House of Lords came to a counter-resolution; but I take these two Resolutions to amount to this, that they would not draw this misbehaviour into a precedent. They said, you shall not make a practice of it. That is what we say to the House of Lords now:—Although you do this now, we will not allow you to make a practice of it; we will assume your right. Like the lady who allowed her admirer to take a liberty with her on condition that he would not make a practice of it, so the House of Commons should give the House of Lords to understand that what they have done in this instance must not be converted into a practice.

Now, Sir, all I can say with respect to asserting the privileges of the House of Commons, although I gave no vote on the question before and deliberately left the House—indeed, I was not able to make up my mind upon it—all I can say is, that if it is necessary to assert the privileges of this House upon the question of taxation and finance, so much do I think that it is their interest—the existence of this House depends upon the question of taxation—that I shall unquestionably, without the least hesitation, vote for the repeal of the Paper Duty Bill, and that it should be sent back to their Lordships in order that we may assert our rights. It is to be recollected that our very existence depends upon that—our very existence depends upon the power of taxation which is vested in this House, and in this House alone. That power rests with us, and with us it ought to rest if we are to have any weight or importance with the country. When these Resolutions which have now been proposed by the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government were first talked of, I imagined that on this occasion we were to have only a consistent finale to all the other shams, the very numerous shams, which we have had from the beginning of this Session, and of which this Session has been fruitful; but having now carefully examined the whole of the circumstances of the case, I do not see how Her Majesty's Government can well do more than propose the Resolutions which have been submitted for our consideration, thus leaving it open to the House of Commons to take such further and stronger action as it deems necessary under all the circumstances which have taken place. Under all the circumstances of the case, I think it better that the House should adopt these Resolutions, and I hope that they will carry them.

MR. LEATHAM: Mr. Speaker, that one branch of the Legislature should in-

then handed to the House of Lords. In the year 1692 the House of Lords did not sit down tamely under that Resolution, but they then thought it necessary to come to an equally strong Resolution; in fact, they thought it necessary to give the House of Commons of that day a Roland for their Oliver—at all events they did not think proper to sit quietly down under that Resolution. I find this passage:—

"After several conferences, Mr. Attorney General reported that their Lordships did not upon their proviso. Reasons assigned Lords: 'That they can by no means what was offered by the House of Commons last Conference because, besides more in former times in taxing themselves onal estates, they have had a v Act intitled, An Act for raising and otherwise towards the and prosecuting the war they did nominate Comrs taxing their personal conceive that the abatements of rates the House of Commons and undoubted right which their Lordships have therefore assert it upon a difference Bill may or would be present it convenient."

A C
app
dr
a

Now, Sir, the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government has spoken about inaction and forbearance on the present occasion. For my part, I am quite sure that I should be the last man to criticise anything that the noble Viscount has said; but let me ask the House, whom do we sit here to represent? I ask the House do we sit here to represent people intolerant of aggression and insult, or a people who lick the hand that smites them? That is the aspect which the present state of things presents to our view.

Now, Sir, when this question first came before the public, it may be said that the public did not at first perceive how grave was the issue that had been raised between the House of Commons and the House of

I cannot find that the or made to to a further extent, as totally find that the House of the Paper in that day that the infringement or to reject the House. Great of Comrs to lead on the public arisen really at issue the expediency of Sir, I believe that we shall have had time thoroughly to appreciate the wrong which has been done. I may almost say the danger has beset our whole representative system. I believe that there is no event which will occur for many years which will more to disperse that political indifference and apathy which has been the state of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The missing aspect of affairs both at home and abroad alone serves to show on how a thread hangs that political apathy the people in which hon. Gentlemen and, Sir, I do think that the state of things generally is not very encouraging to those who build so much upon it. At home we have the public indifference and abroad, we have the perpetual European war—at home we have prosperity, upon which some of us depend, threatened; a gloomy reality is beginning to exhibit itself, and itself begins to languish. Under these circumstances I say again how slender a thread of that political apathy among the people in which hon. Gentlemen exult!

But, Sir, those efforts were at first successful, and we were reluctant to do this time of day that this House would have been subjected to so incredible an action as this.

Well, Sir, to revert to the question which is more particularly before the House, you appointed a Committee for the purpose of searching into precedents. The Committee has reported. Has the Committee, I ask, found a single precedent? In point of fact, is not the result of the labours of that Committee this, that the act of the House of Lords amounting to an act of attempted taxation without representation?

Now Sir, this taxation without representation is a thing which is not altogether new in our constitutional history. It is only new when it is attempted by the House of Lords. Upon three occasions within the last two centuries and there have been attempts to tax the people without their consent, and all been unfortunate. The first decapitation of one King; another, and the loss of lives were the results of agents of this kind—Mr. Burke has disgraced, and his mind can be constructed with—it the American colo-on occasion it was contended that the bulk of the people not being in Parliament had always been without their own consent. It was alleged that the East India Company had been taxed—it was alleged that the Bishop of Chester and the Bishop of Durham had been taxed. How was it that Lord Chatham, who at that time occupied a seat in this House, disposed of these flimsy artifices to lead the public mind away from the real question at issue? Sir, Lord Chatham upon that occasion said that he came not armed at all points with law cases and Acts of Parliament, but he took his stand on the well-established constitutional principle that British subjects could not be justly taxed without their consent, and I would venture to submit to the House that this is a ground on which, upon this occasion, we might dare to meet any man.

Mr. Leatham

But, Sir, since I have quoted Lord Chatham I shall proceed, with the leave of the House, to refer to another speech of that celebrated statesman upon the American question, and there Lord Chatham says, that to tax America is contrary to every principle of the British Constitution, and I will venture to submit that these words of Lord Chatham apply with peculiar force to that which is the very essence of the subject at present under discussion.

Now, it has been said that these rights are imperilled by precedents? What are those precedents? Upon what occasion have the circumstances of the cases been identical? In the case of any of the precedents to which reference has been made, upon what occasion has a large and important remission of taxation, forming a portion of the financial scheme of the year, (and it is not contended for a moment, that the instance before us has injured in any way any branch of industry) upon what occasion has such a remission of taxation been rejected by the House of Lords?

But, Sir, a precedent to be a true precedent not only requires that the circumstances should be identical but it also requires that the question of right shall have been raised and discussed. But is it pretended that in any of these cases of precedents referred to that the question of right was ever raised at all? They maintained that the right to tax themselves was a right which was imperilled by no precedent. On the contrary, the perusal of the Report of the Select Committee proves this. The Report of the Select Committee proves that the House of Commons was at all times and in all vicissitudes most vigorous in defending this one great and cardinal privilege. On that ground, therefore, which has been adopted by the House of Commons under all circumstances and in all ages, I do earnestly hope and trust that this House is now about to take its stand. But we are told by hon. Gentlemen, perhaps not within these walls but outside the House, that if a precedent do not exist, now is the time to make one. So it was said in the reign of Charles the First, and so thought Charles the First, and he made a precedent which will endure as long as history is read; and so again thought King James the Second who contributed his precedent. So again thought the political ancestors of the hon. Gentlemen who sit on the Opposition side of the House, when, against the solemn prayers and entreaties of the political progenitors of liberal Members, they proceeded to tax America, and lost her.

Now, Sir, these are the great precedents of taxation which have been attempted without the consent of the people, and they are precedents which overwhelmed with execration those who made them. In supporting the House of Lords I maintain that they would be following in the same footsteps, but I do earnestly hope and trust that the House of Commons will not relinquish their right unless it should please them that the symbol of their high privilege should once more become a bauble.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Sir, with all dues submission to you, and to the House in general, I cannot help thinking that on the present occasion the House cuts but a very humiliating figure.

Sir, the noble Lord who moved these Resolutions, and certainly they are not Resolutions which are—

“Sicklied o’er with the pale cast of thought.”

The noble Lord has made a speech which if it means anything at all is, in the shape

vade the privileges of this House, may or may not excite our surprise, but that hon. Gentlemen opposite—although those hon. Gentlemen opposite have not expressed up to this time an opinion upon this subject—and whose cheering and significant cheering, and counter-cheering to-night it is altogether impossible to misconstrue, should volunteer to abet and encourage this invasion, either in this House or out of doors, I must say surpasses all previous experience of their occult policy.

Now, Sir, I ask this House, what is the aim of hon. Gentlemen? I ask this House is the aim of those hon. Gentlemen further to humiliate and degrade this House in the eyes of the country at large? Surely, we have had enough of that in one Session of Parliament. If hon. Gentlemen suppose that the debate upon the Reform Bill has tended to raise this House in public estimation, or that the means to which they had recourse in order to defeat that Bill have inspired their constituents with any deeply-rooted idea either of the dignity of this House or of the feelings of hon. Gentlemen, I ask, have these things inspired the constituents of hon. Gentlemen with any high idea of their sincerity? I ask, do hon. Gentlemen ever read the public press? I ask do hon. Gentlemen now wish still further to lower their position in the eyes of their constituents and of the country at large? I think that there is a growing suspicion which pervades all ranks of society. I think there is a feeling which pervades every class of opinion in this country that this House is becoming contemptible. Hon. Gentlemen sneer, but I do assure you that it is my firm conviction that it is a feeling which is very prevalent throughout all classes of the State.

Now, Sir, the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government has spoken about inaction and forbearance on the present occasion. For my part, I am quite sure that I should be the last man to criticise anything that the noble Viscount has said; but let me ask the House, whom do we sit here to represent? I ask the House do we sit here to represent people intolerant of aggression and insult, or a people who lick the hand that smites them? That is the aspect which the present state of things presents to our view.

Now, Sir, when this question first came before the public, it may be said that the public did not at first perceive how grave was the issue that had been raised between the House of Commons and the House of Lords. Great efforts were made to put together two questions totally different—namely, the merits of the Paper Duties Bill, and the infringement of the privileges of this House. Great efforts were used to lead on the public from the question really at issue to questions affecting the expediency of the Bill. But, Sir, I believe that the people shall have had time thoroughly to appreciate the wrong which has been done to them, I may almost say the danger which has beset our whole representative system. I believe that there is no event which will occur for many years which will do more to disperse that political indifference and apathy which has been the stock-in-trade of hon. Gentlemen opposite. The alarming aspect of affairs both at home and abroad alone serves to show on how slender a thread hangs that political apathy in the people in which hon. Gentlemen so much exult. And, Sir, I do think that the state of things generally is not very encouraging to those who build so much upon what they call the public indifference and apathy. Abroad, we have the perpetual European war—at home we have prosperity, upon which some of us depend, threatened; a gloomy reality is beginning to exhibit itself, and the public itself begins to languish. Under these circumstances I say again how slender is the thread of that political apathy among the people in which hon. Gentlemen so much exult!

But, Sir, those efforts were at first unsuccessful, and we were reluctant to believe at this time of day that this House would be subjected to so incredible an insult as this.

Well, Sir, to revert to the question which is more particularly before the House, you appointed a Committee for the purpose of searching into precedents. That Committee has reported. Has that Committee, I ask, found a single precedent? In point of fact, is not the result of the labours of that Committee this, that the act of the House of Lords amounting to an act of attempted taxation without representation?

Now Sir, this taxation without representation is a thing which is not altogether new in our constitutional history. It is only new when it is attempted by the House of Lords. Upon three occasions within the last two centuries and there have been attempts to tax the people without their consent, and all the tempts have been unfortunate. The first resulted in the decapitation of one King; the deposition of another, and the loss of our American colonies were the results of three former encroachments of this kind—and the third marks what Mr. Burke has called the era of calamity, disgrace, and downfalls which no feeling mind can contemplate without being struck with—it was our attempt to tax the American colonies.

Mr. Leatham

Sir, upon that occasion it was contended that the great bulk of the people not being represented in Parliament had always been taxed without their own consent. It was alleged that the East India Company had been taxed—it was alleged that the Bishop of Chester and the Bishop of Durham had been taxed. How was it that Lord Chatham, who at that time occupied a seat in this House, disposed of these flimsy artifices to lead the public mind away from the real question at issue? Sir, Lord Chatham upon that occasion said that he came not armed at all points with law cases and Acts of Parliament, but he took his stand on the well-established constitutional principle that British subjects could not be justly taxed without their consent, and I would venture to submit to the House that this is a ground on which, upon this occasion, we might dare to meet any man.

But, Sir, since I have quoted Lord Chatham I shall proceed, with the leave of the House, to refer to another speech of that celebrated statesman upon the American question, and there Lord Chatham says, that to tax America is contrary to every principle of the British Constitution, and I will venture to submit that these words of Lord Chatham apply with peculiar force to that which is the very essence of the subject at present under discussion.

Now, it has been said that these rights are imperilled by precedents? What are those precedents? Upon what occasion have the circumstances of the cases been identical? In the case of any of the precedents to which reference has been made, upon what occasion has a large and important remission of taxation, forming a portion of the financial scheme of the year, (and it is not contended for a moment, that the instance before us has injured in any way any branch of industry)—upon what occasion has such a remission of taxation been rejected by the House of Lords?

But, Sir, a precedent to be a true precedent not only requires that the circumstances should be identical but it also requires that the question of right shall have been raised and discussed. But is it pretended that in any of these cases of precedents referred to that the question of right was ever raised at all? They maintained that the right to tax themselves was a right which was imperilled by no precedent. On the contrary, the perusal of the Report of the Select Committee proves this. The Report of the Select Committee proves that the House of Commons was at all times and in all vicissitudes most vigorous in defending this one great and cardinal privilege. On that ground, therefore, which has been adopted by the House of Commons under all circumstances and in all ages, I do earnestly hope and trust that this House is now about to take its stand. But we are told by hon. Gentlemen, perhaps not within these walls but outside the House, that if a precedent do not exist, now is the time to make one. So it was said in the reign of Charles the First, and so thought Charles the First, and he made a precedent which will endure as long as history is read; and so again thought King James the Second who contributed his precedent. So again thought the political ancestors of the hon. Gentlemen who sit on the Opposition side of the House, when, against the solemn prayers and entreaties of the political progenitors of liberal Members, they proceeded to tax America, and lost her.

Now, Sir, these are the great precedents of taxation which have been attempted without the consent of the people, and they are precedents which overwhelmed with execration those who made them. In supporting the House of Lords I maintain that they would be following in the same footsteps, but I do earnestly hope and trust that the House of Commons will not relinquish their right unless it should please them that the symbol of their high privilege should once more become a bauble.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Sir, with all dues submission to you, and to the House in general, I cannot help thinking that on the present occasion the House cuts but a very humiliating figure.

Sir, the noble Lord who moved these Resolutions, and certainly they are not Resolutions which are—

. . Sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought."

The noble Lord has made a speech which if it means anything at all is, in the shape of a defence of the House of Lords, nothing more than an attack upon his own Ministry. The noble Lord was followed by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth, and I must say that to my mind, and I think to the mind of the House generally, the speech of that hon. and learned Member did credit to him as a lawyer and honour to him as a statesman.

Sir, I did expect after that speech that some hon. Member on the other side of the House, well fitted for the task, would at least have paid the House, if not my hon. and learned Friend, the compliment of answering that lucid speech, which I think has exhausted every argument upon the question. I lamented to find that after all that research which my hon. and learned Friend exhibited, and all the pains-taking labour which he had evidently given to the subject, that speech was not followed by any conclusion. It appears that my hon. Friend's Motion has been withdrawn totally unknown to me—but I am told at a meeting of the great Liberal party—[Interruption]—the hon. Gentleman said so—I am in the recollection of the House—the hon. Gentleman certainly said so. Of whom that great Liberal party consists I am at a total loss to conjecture, but I think that, however distasteful it might be to be beaten upon a division, that the hon. Gentleman was bound, after having exhausted that subject in every way, to have brought his arguments to a direct issue. However inconvenient it might have been to have been beaten on a division still I think that his speech was unanswerable, for I heard no answer or no attempt at an answer—I think he was bound to have brought his arguments to a conclusion.

Now, Sir, this question has been, I think, very much mixed up into two parts. I mean the financial and the constitutional question. As to the repeal of the paper duties I was from the first hostile, and I never gave a vote for any measure which I considered more rash, reckless and improper. Sir, I mean that particular repeal of the paper duties; but at any rate this House did not consider it in that light, they repealed the paper duties, and when it is said that the fifty-three majority on the second reading had dwindled down to nine on the third reading that is no argument for the House of Lords. It is sufficient for the House of Lords to know that we repealed that paper duty in this House by a majority. Then we come to the constitutional question. I am averse to the repeal of the paper duty, I might perhaps think that as far as common sense is concerned the House of Lords have acted rightly, but it was strictly unconstitutional. No one has attempted to answer my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth, who has shown, and shown conclusively, that all the precedents adduced in "another place" are just worth nothing at all.

Now, Sir, I believe that this House of Commons is living in a fool's paradise. We are thinking that the people of this country are paying no attention to our proceedings, and we talk of their apathy. There may be something in their apathy at the present moment, but I believe that that apathy may be very nearly allied to contempt. Does the course which they have taken, not only on this occasion but upon another occasion, did their shuffling conduct with regard to the Reform Bill conduce to the credit and respect of the constitutional Government? The noble Lord coming here and making, I admit, a very adroit, a very clever, and a very satisfactory speech as far as both sides of the House are concerned—it would be all very well if there was no public out of doors watching our proceedings. What are the Resolutions which have been proposed to the House—what will the public say? The noble Lord talks about our taking a dignified course, the Resolutions may be dignified, but they are not drawn with grammar. How can the House—how can those hon. Gentlemen who sit there in solemn silence as if they were really attending the funeral of the British Constitution—how can they reconcile themselves on the score of dignity with the grammar of the third Resolution? Will they not stand up for grammar? How can they pass such a thing as this Resolution? Really, Sir, I will not insult the House by reading it. I may say that several hon. Gentlemen have been to me to ask me what it means, and I will tell you for what it is meant. It is meant to patch up some discord, and so eager and willing are the Government to patch up these differences that they have not scrupled to pen and offer for our acceptance an ungrammatical Resolution. However we may throw dust in each other's eyes we cannot throw dust in the eyes of the constituents of this country.

Now, Sir, I had no intention whatever of mixing myself up in this debate until I heard the excellent speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth; but I certainly should deem myself unworthy of holding a place in the House of Commons if I did not rise as soon as I was able to testify my thanks to that hon. and learned Gentleman who at least has shown himself to be a worthy British Member of Parliament, and who has given utterance to truly British sentiments in a way which redound to his credit, and I think to the honour of this House.

Mr. Bernal Osborne

MR. EDWIN JAMES: Sir, I am not at all surprised that no Member on the opposite side of the House has taken part in this discussion, because if I had advocated the same policy as they do—namely, to support the House of Lords in this, which if it is their abstract right I cannot help believing is a great stretch of their prerogative, I too would have remained perfectly silent and have allowed such a Resolution as this to pass.

Now, Sir, I agree with my hon. Friend, the Member for Liskeard, that the Resolutions which have been proposed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government do not appear to be

—sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought,
And following up the quotation from Shakespeare I may add, nor of—

"Enterprises of great pith and moment
"With this regard their current turns away
"And lose the name of action."

Now, Sir, beyond all question, a more lame and impotent conclusion could not by any possibility have been derived from any Resolution that could have been proposed to the House, and I do venture to think that as leader of this House, to whom the honour of the House is confided, the noble Lord at the head of the Government was the proper person to have come forward as the vindicator of these rights and privileges. Mr. Pitt came forward with a Resolution for that purpose, and on the last occasion, when the privileges of the House were affected, in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, the noble Lord the Member for the City of London asserted the privileges of the House, as leader of the House of Commons. But, Sir, upon other grounds than as leader of the House, and the person entrusted with their confidence, it was the duty of the noble Lord at the head of the Government to come forward and vindicate their privileges. The conduct of the House of Lords has paralysed the whole or a great portion of the financial policy of Her Majesty's Government, and these Resolutions appear to me rather to be intended as a compromise of opinions in the Cabinet than a dignified vindication of the policy of this House. They are surely not dictated by regard for the policy of the country.

Now, Sir, I quite concur in the tribute of admiration, I quite agree with the praise which has been accorded by the hon. Member for Liskeard to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth. My hon. and learned Friend has exhausted the question of privilege, he has exhausted the whole constitutional question, and I therefore do not propose to trouble the House with any remarks upon it. But, Sir, in withdrawing the Amendment of which I have given notice, I wish to state distinctly that I did so in order to throw the whole responsibility on the Government who have assumed it, and who in the most sorry manner have proposed to vindicate the privileges of this House. This is no question of party politics, this is no question of policy at all. It is not a mere question which side of the House is to occupy the Treasury Bench; a more vital question, compared with which all questions of policy sink into utter insignificance, is involved in the discussion of this evening. Our system of taxation has been, as everybody who is acquainted with the constitutional history of this country knows, the battle-field of the liberties and privileges of the House of Commons. Everybody knows that the most eloquent speakers, and the ablest of writers, have struggled and have suffered for that cause; and when these events become history it would be a degradation to the Government of the day that they allowed impunity to that which, being a stretch of prerogative had become an usurpation, and satisfied themselves with a meagre and paltry Resolution.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, before you put the question, I wish to take the liberty of addressing a few words to the House with reference, in particular, to an expression which has been used (and, I must say, not unnaturally used) by the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down. It appears to me to be the determination of one moiety of this House that there shall be no debate upon the constitutional principles which are involved in this question, and I must say that, considering that Gentlemen opposite are upon this occasion the partisans of a gigantic innovation—the most gigantic and the most dangerous that has been attempted in our times—I may compliment them upon the prudence that they show in resolving to be its silent partisans. Now, Sir, I should like to know with what language and in what tones those Gentlemen who assume the name of Conservative politicians would argue in support of a great encroachment by one House of the Legislature upon the other. I agree with the hon. Gentleman, the Member for Liskeard, that there are two questions involved in this matter, the question of the repeal of the paper duties (I am glad to see that there is some tendency to a movement on the other side)—the question of the repeal of the paper duties and the constitutional question respecting the rights of the Houses of Parliament. I join, I must confess, in the just compliments which have been paid to the temperate argument which was made by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth; and I frankly own that it appears to me that he does not deserve the censure bestowed upon him by a subsequent speaker for the withdrawal of his Amendment, and that upon grounds which I will venture respectfully to state to the House.

Now, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, says that the Resolutions proposed by the Government are a poor and paltry compromise in the Cabinet. Now, the question comes to be, in the first place, What is the language, and what is the purport of the Resolutions that are before the House? Well, in view of those Resolutions as they stand, I am bound to say that I cannot refuse to them a cordial support, because they contain a most mild and temperate declaration in conformity with the speech of my noble Friend who moved them; they contain, at any rate, in themselves a most mild and temperate declaration, but at the same time an intelligible and firm declaration—as far as verbal expression goes—of the rights of the House of Commons. It has been justly said that, if the rights of the House of Commons are to be vindicated, the question has to be considered whether they are to be vindicated by words, or to be vindicated in action. So far as the vindication by words goes, that proposed by Her Majesty's Government is, I think, a good and a sound vindication; but, in answer to the challenge of my hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Marylebone, a challenge which he has a perfect right to deliver, I do not scruple to say that, in my opinion, this House would do well to vindicate and establish its rights by action; and without in the least degree imputing blame to, or finding fault with the terms of the proposal of the Government, I reserve to myself entire freedom to adopt any mode which may have the slightest hope of success for vindicating by action the rights of this House.

Now, Sir, I do not think that at this moment the question of precedent requires to be further argued. In the presence of various Members of the Committee who sit on the other side of the House, the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth has, with great conciseness, but at the same time with great clearness, and I think with conclusive force, gone through the list of these pretended precedents, and has shown that there is not one of them that affords a rag or a shred of covering for the recent proceeding of the House of Lords. Now, Sir, do not let us be lost in discussions about the mere privileges of this House. The privileges of the Houses of Parliament are the formal dress in which their real rights are shrouded. Your privilege goes far beyond the essential limit of your rights. Your privilege covers in name twenty things with regard to which you cannot establish a substantial claim. You would not, until lately, allow the House of Lords to interfere with a fee; you would not, until lately, allow them to interfere with a local rate; you would not allow them to interfere with a penalty; and absolutely of those supposed precedents which have been printed—and properly printed, perhaps, by the Committee—as bearing on this constitutional question, of those supposed precedents some relate to measures which do nothing more as regards their substance than prohibit the import or export of some article; but because the violation of the law was attended perhaps with a penalty, perhaps with a forfeiture, they are paraded as questions affecting the privilege of the House of Commons. Now, Sir, I am not finding fault with the course taken by the House of Commons, which has found it expedient to assert its privilege largely, in order that it might stand rigidly upon that precedent where substantial rights were involved. The House of Lords, too, has pursued the same course—and, I think, with equal wisdom—for these privileges of the House of Commons are not admitted by the House of Lords. In the year 1640 the House of Lords did make a declaration which undoubtedly condemns as strongly as any Member of this House could wish it to condemn the late Act of the House of Lords in rejecting the Paper Duties Bill, because they did

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

then state that they would not meddle, no, not so much as to advise, in the matter of Supply, which belongs properly and naturally to us. But at the time they made that declaration they did it because they had, in fact, another form of innovation in view. On that great occasion, in the first Session of the short Parliament of the spring of 1640, they had an object in view, which was to constrain and coerce this House to give its attention to matters of Supply before matters of grievance, and it was in order to carry that point that they made this large admission, that they would not so much as advise in matters of Supply. The House of Lords failed in carrying their point, and they never repeated that admission; on the contrary, they entirely withdrew it, and in the year 1671, as well as upon subsequent occasions, they asserted largely their right to deal with matter of Supply, sometimes in broader terms, sometimes in narrower terms. Sometimes they said generally that they could not be ousted of that right; sometimes they claimed merely a right to abate a tax; sometimes they referred in particular to those cases in which considerations of trade were involved, and said that at any rate they were as good judges of the interests of trade as were the House of Commons; but since 1640 they never made any admission; on the contrary, in 1671 they entirely withdrew the admission which they had made of the privileges and rights of the House of Commons. Therefore, Sir, if we look at the theory of this case, the two Houses are absolutely at variance. With limited exceptions, introduced into the case by recent modifications of our own Standing Orders which have taken place within the memory of some of us, the two Houses are, if we look at the question abstractedly, at absolute variance. The House of Commons claims by its privilege everything wherein money is mentioned; the House of Lords recognizing by no act of its own any distinction, but also claiming a legislative power without limits. It is quite a mistake to suppose that the House of Lords has ever made the admission that a Money Bill cannot originate there. By practice a Money Bill does not originate in the House of Lords; but there is no admission that a Money Bill cannot originate there. Just in the same way there is no admission on the part of the House of Lords that a Money Bill cannot be amended there. Strange to say, some great doctors of the Constitution are reported to have stated on a recent occasion that it was a principle admitted on all hands that no Money Bill could be amended in the House of Lords. Why, Sir, on the contrary, not only is there nothing in the rules of the House of Lords, so far at least as the researches of the Committee have gone, to prevent such amendment, but it is actually the fact that the cases of amending Money Bills in the House of Lords are more frequent than those in which such Bills have been rejected by that House. The truth is, I apprehend, that under cover of these broad, and in themselves, perhaps, untenable and extravagant, doctrines of privilege, the House of Commons formally claiming everything, and the House of Lords formally conceding nothing, under cover of that apparent conflict, there has been a real, and until the present time an unbroken, harmony for 200 years. The secret of that harmony is that both Houses by these claims, apparently so conflicting, have meant the same thing. The House of Commons, by its privileges with respect to Money Bills, has meant to reserve to itself the integrity of the taxing power; and the House of Lords, by declining to admit the claim of the House of Commons, has intended to preserve to itself an effective means of preventing the House of Commons from forcing upon it other matters of general legislation under cover of Money Bills.

Now, Sir, I have just made a statement which sounds like an authoritative exposition of the practice of the Constitution; but, of course, I mean it only as an assertion which is to be tested by the evidence of facts and documents. Let any Gentleman review the entire list of these precedents, and see whether every one of them does not completely coincide with the principles I have laid down. There is not, as far as I know, a single case upon record since the present system of taxation was established until the Paper Duties Repeal Bill of 1860, in which the House of Lords has attempted to interfere with the taxing function of the House of Commons. Therefore, Sir, when it is said that we are to maintain our essential privileges inviolate, what I ask myself, and what I ask myself in vain, is, what are the essential privileges of the House of Commons which it is intended to maintain inviolate, and which are not violated by the rejection of the Paper Duties Repeal Bill? It appears to me that the origination of a Bill for the imposition of a tax, or the amendment of a Money

Bill is a slight thing compared to the claim to prevent the repeal of a tax.

Sir, I have said that the precedents are entirely adverse to the step which has been taken. The mode in which many of these pretended precedents have exploded has really been almost ludicrous. I may refer to one case, and it will be the only one with which I shall trouble the House—it is the case of the Excise duty upon stone bottles. A Bill was introduced to “repeal the duty upon stone bottles, and to grant other duties in lieu thereof.” Such was the title of the Bill. It was quoted as an instance of the House of Lords interfering to arrest the repeal of a tax. What did that Bill do? In the first place, it was a Bill which had not a fiscal, but a political object—that object being protection. But, besides that, though it is true it repealed the duty upon stone bottles—as whenever we alter duties we always begin with repealing them—yet it imposed upon stone bottles a duty double that which it repealed. It was not a Bill of repeal at all in any intelligible sense of the term, but a Bill to double the duty upon stone bottles. The precedents, I repeat, are entirely to the effect which has been substantially stated by my noble Friend—that is to say, they do not cover, in the substantial and essential points, the act that has now been done, because none of them were interferences with the taxing power of this House. Some of them were interferences with Bills that had a preamble of Supply; but these were Bills which were prepared for objects other than those of taxation. Taxation was incidental; those other objects were the main purposes; and the House of Lords justly declined to part with its jurisdiction over matters of legislation and policy, on account of the privileges of this House with respect to money.

But, Sir, I am bound to say that, even if the precedents were otherwise than they are, it seriously requires the consideration of this House whether its own essential functions are to be maintained or not. I do not deny, as responsible for the finances of the country, that the sum of, perhaps, £700,000, which will be brought into the Exchequer by the continuance of the paper duty between the 15th of August and the 1st of April, is exceedingly acceptable, provided it be honestly obtained. But, Sir, I must confess that although no person is more likely than myself to be liable to the influence and seductions of money, yet there are other things that are more valuable even than £700,000. I believe that the question, whether the exclusive power of taxation is to rest with the House of Commons, is a question of ten—nay, a hundred times greater importance and value than the continuance of the paper duty. I have said that there is no instance in which, when this House has intended the repeal of a tax, the House of Lords has interfered to arrest it. Some Gentlemen have said that on the present occasion the House of Commons was very foolish, and the House of Lords very wise; that the House of Commons made a great and undue sacrifice of public revenue; and the House of Lords interposed to arrest the House of Commons in its career of extravagance and improvidence. That is the allegation. But without entering at this moment into the argument, with respect to which, however, I am prepared to maintain all that I have maintained on previous occasions, I want to know whether that really is the Constitution under which we live? The House of Commons cannot be infallible in matters of finance any more than in other matters. No doubt the House of Commons may make errors, of which I shall give you an instance presently; but I wish to know whether those errors in matters of finance are, or are not, to be liable to correction by the House of Lords. If they are, what becomes of your privileges? Why does the House of Lords ever differ from us? No doubt because it thinks we have committed an error, and it can suggest an improvement. That is perfectly legitimate; but the question now raised is whether that power of review which is exercised by the House of Lords in all matters of general legislation is likewise to be extended to finance, and whether the function of the House of Commons in imposing and repealing taxes is to be divided as to its exercise and the responsibility which it involves with the House of Lords. I think this case, besides the positive illustration of precedents, is susceptible likewise of negative illustration. The argument is that the House of Lords has interfered to correct the folly of the Commons in giving away revenue which was supposed to be required for the purposes of the year, or rather for the purposes of future years, because, in point of fact, it does not seem to have been stated that the revenue was required for the purposes of the present year. It will be required, or other money in lieu of it will be required, for the purposes of the year; and

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

I do not at all disguise the difficulty in which this House is placed when it has to vindicate its privileges and insist upon its Vote on the one hand, and to receive a considerable addition to the income of the year on the other. But, Sir, what I want to say is, that the House of Lords has not upon former occasions considered itself to be charged with this responsibility. In 1853, a Bill for the repeal of the soap duties was passed at a considerably later period of the Session than the day on which the Paper Duties Repeal Bill was rejected. That Bill was passed at a time when, undoubtedly, the prospects of the country with respect to the probability of war with Russia had become such that there was very serious alarm, and a very general belief that war would be encountered, and that a great increase would be made to the burdens of the country. I am sure that those Gentlemen who recollect the circumstances of the month of July, 1853, will concur in the statement I have just made. If I remember right, the Emperor of Russia had already occupied the Principalities; several debates had taken place in this House; considerable excitement prevailed in the public mind; various Peers in "another place" actually urged the probability of war as a reason why the soap duties should not be repealed. I think I may say that the Government of the day would not have proposed the repeal of the soap duties in July had it not been a proposal to which they felt themselves pledged by their previous proceedings, and by the sanction which the House of Commons had given to it by its vote. But the House of Lords at that period passed the Bill for the repeal of the soap duties, and entirely declined the plea which was urged even for a short delay in the consideration of the measure.

Now, Sir, why did the House of Lords do that? If I remember rightly, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich, and others, exercising the privilege of fair criticism on the acts of the Government, complained greatly at the time of the loss of revenue. They used just the same epithets then that we hear now. They asked what could be more unwise, more reckless, more improvident, more profligate, than to part with the revenue from the soap duties at the opening of a probable war in Europe. Yet, although a war with Russia was likely, I presume, to impose much heavier burdens than a war with China, the House of Lords entirely declined to meddle with a matter in regard to which they felt they had no responsibility. In accordance with the sound doctrine laid down by the Prime Minister of the day, they declared that it was the act of the House of Commons, and if Ways and Means were wanted to carry on the service of the country, on that House would rest the responsibility of providing them.

Now, Sir, there is a view of the matter which I should have thought would have suggested itself to those who have directed the Councils of the House of Lords. When the House of Commons entertains financial proposals, it must hereafter look, not only to their merits, but to their probable popularity. They must recollect that there are those lying in ambush for them who will be ready to interfere at the proper moment. If it chance that in considering the claims of various taxes for reduction, they make that choice which, according to their judgment and conscience, they believe to be for the good of the country, rather than that which will probably meet the popular view, they must bear in mind that there are those who will take advantage of their having acted on their conscientious convictions, and who will use the opportunity to reject the repeal of the tax. That is the very case which has happened this year. After it had been determined that a certain amount of taxation should be remitted, the question in the first place for the Government, and in the second place for the House of Commons, was, whether the paper duties should be repealed, or whether a reduction should be made in the duties on sugar and tea.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: The tea duties.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: My noble Friend is quite right. The tea duties were discussed; though, I think, in consequence of the state of affairs with China, the sugar duties had rather the preference given to them. The Government certainly were well aware that the paper duties constituted an impost which had no great hold of the mind of the general mass of the consumers of the country, and I believe the House of Commons was perfectly well aware of that too. But the Government, and as I apprehend the House of Commons, thought that, under the circumstances, probably greater good would be derived from the repeal of the paper duties than from the reduction of the sugar duties, because though it would less commend itself to the popular mind, the benefit which, through the medium of an extended trade, it would confer on the population of the country would be greater. The hon. Member for Liskeard says, he thinks the repeal of the paper duties a very bad measure, though I believe he did not vote against it. Now, I doubt very much whether he would have ventured to say that of the reduction of the sugar duties. But our proposal of that measure which, though less popular, we deemed more beneficial, was strongly resisted, and led the House of Lords to deviate from the course it had pursued, without interruption, for nearly 200 years. I want to know what is to be the influence of this consideration upon those who are hereafter to frame the financial proposals of the country? Surely, it was for the interest of the House of Lords to give us every encouragement to avoid that temptation to which, being under the influence of popular feeling, we are naturally exposed, to choose not the best but the most popular measure. We did resist that temptation; and what is the lesson the House of Lords has taught us? Did it not at once seize the opportunity of resisting our proposal under shelter of the popular feeling?

Now, Sir, I said that this case was capable of negative as well as of positive illustration, and I have shown in the case of the soap duties of 1853, which was, in most respects, a parallel; and, where not a parallel, a still stronger case, the House of Lords wisely left to us the responsibility of providing the Ways and Means to meet the necessities of the year. But I will show you, Sir, another instance by travelling a little further back. In the year 1839 the Budget was presented at the usual period of the year in which the expenditure and revenue of the country were as nearly as possible balanced. At a later period a measure was proposed, which I regard as one of the happiest and most advantageous measures that has marked the happy reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, I mean the measure for reducing the postage duties to the uniform rate of a single penny. The Post Office at that time returned a clear net revenue of £1,400,000 or £1,500,000 a year; and it was perfectly obvious that the reduction of the rate of postage to a penny, whatever might be its ultimate results, would have the immediate effect of sweeping away the whole of that net revenue from the country; and so it proved. Although that beneficial repeal has been worth five times over all the revenue we lost, yet at this day, after twenty-one years, our revenue has not been entirely replaced. In that year, 1839, the House of Lords, almost for the first time in its history, succeeded in obtaining a copy of the Estimates, with the help of a compliant Chancellor of the Exchequer; and much good it did them, as you will say when you hear the result. That Estimate showed them that there was no surplus. In sending up the Bill to the Lords, the Commons distinctly acknowledged that it would create a deficiency in the revenue; and, by a Special Resolution, pledged themselves to provide for that deficiency in the following year: there was, therefore, no dispute whatever that this measure would produce a deficiency. Why, then, did not the House of Lords interfere upon that occasion? They passed that Bill without difficulty or dispute, without raising the financial question at all; and, strangest of all the strange occurrences of that remarkable year, the man who sent up to the House of Lords that Bill for creating a deficiency in the revenue of the year was Mr. Thomas Spring Rice, the then Chancellor of the Exchequer. The very same Gentleman, unless the almanacks deceive us, who, having since obtained the title of Lord Monteagle, is reported to have played a leading part in advising the House of Lords to take upon itself those functions which, if ever they were to be used at all, ought to have been used in 1839.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Now, Sir, I keep to my pledge, and will not enter into the details of the precedents. If a challenge proceeds from the other side—if it is contended that in the catalogue before us there are cases analogous to the present—and that the House of Lords have ever before attempted to exercise the functions of the House of Commons—we shall have other opportunities of meeting and contesting these allegations—but for the present I content myself with stating that there is no colour of precedent for such proceedings. Sir, I beg the House to believe that this is really a matter of great importance. Since the Peace of 1815 £78,000,000 of taxes have been repealed. All the Bills that have repealed that amount of taxation have been accepted by the House of Lords from the House of Commons, upon the responsibility of the latter; and only now, when we come to the seventy-ninth million, has the House of Lords thought fit to interfere, and establish a new precedent. For my part, I cannot but feel that this is a time when men are little apt and disposed to deal with abstract principles; and those assertions which our forefathers made of their rights we now think of little value or consequence compared with obtaining a few hundred thousand pounds. It may be that my views on this subject are little compatible with the tendencies of the age; but I confess I cannot bring my mind to take that view. I do regard the whole rights of the House of Commons, as they have been handed down to us, as constituting a sacred inheritance upon which I, for my part, will never voluntarily permit any intrusion, or plunder, to be made. Sir, I think that the very first of our duties, anterior to the duty of dealing with any legislative measure, and higher and more sacred than any such duties—high and sacred though they may be—is to maintain intact that precious deposit. I concur, Sir, in every word of the Resolution proposed by my noble Friend, which we have in our hands; but I respectfully reserve to myself the freedom of acting in such a way as shall appear (if any such way should appear) to offer any hope of success in giving effect, by a practical measure, to the principle contained in that Resolution.

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has directed an attack upon Members of the Opposition; but I am at a loss to understand why he assailed us, and why he did not rather attack the Members of his own Administration. Sir, I invite the attention of the House to the course which this debate has taken. The conduct of those with whom I have the honour to act has been remarked upon because they did not stand up to resist the speech and Motion of the noble Viscount. Now, I am as ready to enter upon a debate as any hon. Gentleman opposite. I came down expecting to find upon those benches sincere men, uncompromising patriots, who would not be content with empty speeches, but who would follow up their words with action. But what, Sir, was the first thing that took place? The noble Lord, the Member for Marylebone, the stern asserter of the privileges of the House of Commons, rose, and amid derisive cheers, made an appeal to the hon. Member for Finsbury to be so good as to withdraw his Amendment, lest the happy unanimity of the House should be disturbed by the independent Motion of an independent Member. That hon. Member, who spoke with his usual inimitable wit, yielded to the soft eloquence of the noble Lord, and withdrew his Amendment. That, Sir, was the first scene we witnessed to-night. Then the noble Viscount at the head of the Government rose, and, to do him justice his speech was everything that could be desired. I never heard the noble Viscount speak to more advantage. I think it was a satisfactory speech for the position in which he stands; and I only regret it did not produce an impression on his refractory Chancellor of the Exchequer. The noble Viscount put the question fairly and temperately; he spoke as became the First Minister of the country, that is, in the spirit of the Constitution. It was a speech in favour of peace, in which, while the noble Viscount asserted the rights of this House, he declared with equal good sense and truth that the House of Lords during the last fifteen or twenty years had not been acting in an unpatriotic spirit, or in any way to provoke the opposition of this House. Sir, the precedents in favour of the action of the House of Lords were too many to be resisted; and although they might not be held to be in point, according to the logic of a special pleader, yet they satisfied the Prime Minister, whose speech was repugnant to that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Well, Sir, we had then several speeches from Gentlemen who asked us why we did not attack the noble Viscount, and why we did not resist his speech when there really was nothing to resist, and why also we did not argue when there was nothing to argue. Our answer is that we did not oppose the noble Viscount because he conceded (if he had not, we should quickly have opposed him) the right of the House of Lords to do what they did according to the law and Constitution. Sir, distinctly and emphatically the noble Viscount admitted, as he was bound to do (unless indeed he was a rabid revolutionist) the right of the House of Lords to resist the repeal of an Act of Parliament. The noble Viscount thereupon counselled the House to pursue a moderate and wise course, which was, I admit, entirely satisfactory to our feelings; and furthermore, I venture to say that it will be satisfactory to the country. The noble Viscount recommended a course that was becoming his high position, although it had incensed his colleague the Chancellor of the Exchequer. And what followed? I had still hopes (for making speeches unless they are followed by action is a thing detestable) that the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Plymouth, would have persevered with his Motion. That hon. and learned Member I observed was prepared with oranges, and I thought we were to have a debate. I could not believe the whisper of some of my colleagues that the hon. and learned Member, surrounded as he was by the zealous advocates of popular rights, and backed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham and by the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone, would withdraw his Amendment. That hon. and learned Gentleman thus admitted that he had no arguments to convince the House that his Amendment ought to be admitted. The hon. and learned Gentleman certainly made a speech to which I did not pay the same attention as if I had thought the hon. and learned Gentleman had been in earnest. If I had thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman would have asserted by a division the principle of his Amendment I should have been glad to grapple with him. Then what happened next? Without being disturbed by any speech on this side of the House, and without a word to excite his irritable temperament at the present moment, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer sprang from his seat and attacked the Opposition benches for being silent in regard to what he announced as a gigantic innovation. Now, Sir, I put it fairly to the country to contrast the right hon. Gentleman's speech with what he must consider the miserable Resolution of the noble Viscount. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer believed the tenth part of what he spoke, if he really thinks the House of Lords has been guilty of a gigantic innovation, and that the privileges of the House of Commons have been assailed, why with manly courage does not the right hon. Gentleman carry out his view into action? Why does the right hon. Gentleman say he cordially approves of the speech of his noble Friend, and why does he adopt his Resolution when every Member who spoke upon those benches, or who cheered the right hon. Gentleman, appeared to agree with the hon. Member for Huddersfield in thinking the Resolution worthless, pitiful, and contemptible? The hon. Member for Huddersfield heaped every epithet of scorn and contempt upon the Resolution. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, too, in a tone of virtuous indignation, which I hope was not affected, declared that the House of Lords had been guilty of a violent aggression upon the privileges of this House, that it was the duty of this House to be zealous in the assertion of its rights; the right hon. Gentleman came to a lame and impotent conclusion, and received the cheers of his hon. Friend the gangway, "I approve of everything that my noble Friend the noble Viscount has said." [Cries of "No, no!" "Yes." Is there no inconsistency for you to approve of? Are you consistent with the speech which has just come from the lips of the right hon. Gentleman? If the right hon. Gentleman believes what he has said, why does he not act? I respect a Radical who asserts his radical opinions. I respect a Conservative who acts up to his Conservative views. I have a sincere respect for a Constitutional Whig, like the noble Viscount, who asserts his principles. But I have no respect for a politician who pretends that the great interests of the country are at stake; who asserts that the House of Lords have not the power they have exercised, and who yet proposes this Resolution satisfies his ambition. Now, Sir, what is that Resolution?

Mr. Whiteside

"That although the Lords have exercised the power of rejecting Bills of several Bills to taxation by negating the whole, yet the exercise of that power by them has not been attended with any jealousy, and is justly regarded by this House with jealousy, as affecting the right of the Commons to grant the Supplies, and to provide the Means for the Service of the year?"

Now what does that imply? Why does it not opposed by hon. Gentlemen of the Opposition? It admits the power vested in the House of Lords, declares that the Lords have exercised that power, does not condemn the exercise of that power, does not say it is their right, but says that the exercise of that power has always been regarded with jealousy by this House. Contrast this Resolution with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says, that the time for action has come; but what action, Sir, does he propose? Why does he not announce it? What is the use of these vague words when we are to commence the battle in defence of the Constitution, the sooner the better. The revolutionary movement could be in better hands than in those of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He asks why the Lords interfere in this particular case, and so seldom interfered before. The answer is that they have seldom had to deal with such a financial Minister as the right hon. Gentleman. Such a state of affairs as on the recasian. The right hon. Gentleman created a deficiency, and alarmed the House and country as to the state of the finances. He proposed by repealing an Act still further to reduce the financial resources of the country. The right hon. Gentleman's Bill for that purpose was rejected by the House of Lords; and I fairly and frankly admit that the House of Lords meant thereby to rebuke his policy, and to deny its soundness and wisdom. I believe that in the present aspect of affairs the proceeding of the House of Lords was an act consistent with the highest sense of duty and the loftiest patriotism.

Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman says, that there is no precedent to justify what the House of Lords has done. Without, Sir, wearying the House by going through the detail of precedents, I need only state that, in the other House, a set of men who have built up the fabric of our jurisprudence, a noble work, whose business of life has been to examine precedents and understand their principles and application, the deepest thinkers, the most consummate lawyers, and some of the best writers and thinkers in the kingdom, as well as those who have devoted their time to financial matters, joined with others in condemning the policy of the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We are told that it was an act of presumption on their part; but the precedent of 1671 shows that the Lords acted within their competence on a recent occasion. In that year the Lords inquired if they were not allowed to institute, alter, or amend a Money Bill, what were to be their privileges? To that question the House of Commons emphatically replied as follows:—

"Your Lordships' first reason is from the happiness of the Constitution that the two Houses are mutual checks upon each other. Answer.—So they are still; for your Lordships have a negative to the whole."

Nothing, Sir, could be more explicit than that. [A Voice: "Read on!"] I will read on, but that makes the matter still worse for you. The precedent then proceeds as follows:—

"But on the other side it would be a double check upon His Majesty's affairs, if the King may not rely upon the quantum when once his people have given it; and therefore the privilege now contended for by your Lordships is not of use to the Crown, but much the contrary."

Then again:—

"If the Lords may deny the whole, why not a part? Else the Commons may at least pretend to bar a negative voice. Answer.—The King must deny the whole of every Bill, or pass it: yet this takes not away his negative voice. The Lords and Commons must accept the whole general pardon, or deny it; yet this takes not away their negative. The clergy have a right to tax themselves; and it is a part of the privilege of their estate. Doth the Upper Convocation House alter what the Lower grant? Or do the Lords or Commons ever abate any part of their gift? Yet they have a power to reject the whole. But if abatement should be made, it would insensibly go to a rising, and deprive the clergy of their ancient right to tax themselves."

The Commons, Sir, I believe, have by encroachment deprived the Lords of rights anciently possessed by them, have stopped them from amending and altering, leaving them the power, however, of negating the whole. If you want authority on this point I refer you not so much to law books as to a book written by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University on the connection of Church and State. The Lords do not claim the right to institute, abate, or alter, but to negative the whole: and the right hon. Gentleman uses these words in the work which I have referred to:—

"The Members of the House of Commons have the exclusive right of passing money Resolutions, and of introducing and passing Money Bills. But no such Resolution can be passed—that is to say, no money can be given by the House of Commons except upon the motion of the Crown, to which the initiative is reserved; and no Money Bill becomes law unless it receives the assent of the Upper House and of the Crown in its legislative capacity."

Sir, in another passage the right hon. Gentleman says:—

"The immediate power of granting money is divided between the executive and the popular portion of the Legislature; and only by annual statutes is the House of Lords, with its own consent, limited in its means of intervention to a subsequent stage."

Now, Sir, unless you abolish the House of Lords, it is impossible to deny to that assembly the right either to pass or reject any Bill submitted to its consideration. It has been said that there is no instance where the proposition to repeal so large a sum has been rejected by the House of Lords. Nevertheless, Sir, a great principle is not to be made dependent on a particular amount of money, but on the reason of the thing, and on the law and Constitution of the land. Why, this matter, about which you are making such a fuss, has been discussed by one likely to produce an impression on the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I always like to quote a Whig against a Whig. This great privilege you boast of has been discussed by the late Lord Macaulay. He says :

"The privileges of the House of Commons—those privileges which in 1642 all London rose in arms to defend, which the people considered as synonymous with their own liberties, and in comparison of which they took no account of the most precious and sacred principles of English jurisprudence—have now become nearly as odious as the rigours of martial law. That power of committing which the people anciently loved to see the House of Commons exercise is now—at least when employed against libellers—the most unpopular power in the Constitution. If the Commons were to suffer the Lords to amend Money Bills, we do not believe that the people would care one straw about the matter. If they were to suffer the Lords even to originate Money Bills, we doubt whether such a surrender of their constitutional rights would excite half so much dissatisfaction as the exclusion of strangers from a single important discussion. The gallery in which the reporters sit has become a fourth estate of the realm. The publication of the debates—a practice which seemed to the most liberal statesmen of the old school full of danger to the great safeguards of public liberty—is now regarded by many persons as a safeguard tantamount, and more than tantamount, to all the rest together."

So much, Sir, for the value of the privilege. But as to its legality, what is the argument of the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer? He says that a Bill to repeal a tax is to be viewed in a different light from any other Act. Where, in the Constitution is his authority for that statement? The cases stated in the Report on the table are all the same in principle, and opposed to that view. The hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial side seem to have arranged not to venture to move even the mildest Amendment, and the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone has withdrawn his accordingly pigmy Amendment. After the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has addressed the House con furore; and if that be a specimen of the manner in which the Ministers conduct themselves when alone it certainly is not a proof of their being a very happy family. Every word of the right hon. Gentleman was levelled at the noble Viscount; all his arguments were directed against the noble Viscount; and all his assertions were contrary to the modest, wise, and constitutional statements which the noble Viscount laid down. Amid the cheers of a section of the House the right hon. Gentleman exclaimed that the time for action was come. Then why do not you act? Permit me to say that I expect really to produce that impression on the mind of the public out of doing what you say you are producing, you go beyond mere assertions; for unless you produce something no one will believe you. I have had hon. Gentlemen in the House standing up in this House, and I am told by the Minister to withdraw an Amendment, and I do so because I think that in doing this you are producing a splendid effect on the minds of the public; but the public is too discriminating to be deceived by such a transparent trick. You have abandoned an Amendment which would have fairly raised the question of privilege. I should have been glad to see that question raised by the hon. Member, the Member for Epsom, but he withdrew his Amendment, and doing so condemned his speech, for the use of a speech when there is no chance of its being adopted is to propose. I readily admit that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth was in a difficulty, for there was a general feeling in the House before the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke that the Resolutions of the noble Viscount should be passed with a vote of censure. The noble Viscount produced the Bill for unanimity by his good sense, and the moderate and satisfactory speech he addressed to the House. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is, I believe, under the rebuke he has received from the other House. He is smarting from disappointment and defeat that his and reckless financial policy entailed on him; and hence that most unlucky speech he has delivered to-night. The hon. Member for Birmingham, and the hon. Member near him cheered the right hon. Gentleman; but what do they expect to do? I, Sir, shall certainly not be surprised at any course the right hon. Gentleman may take. He denounced the income tax, and he doubled it. He denounced loans to carry on war; but he supposed he means to have a loan to carry on a war. He denounced the opium trade in China; but now he must have a complete that war. He is a Member of the Government that supports the abolition of church rates; and he is the representative of the University of Oxford. For a moment to the great question of the House I say it is as clear that the House has the power to reject a Tax Bill as it is that you have the power to propose ask whether the American Senate has not the power to reject such Bills?

Mr. Whiteside

MR. BRIGHT: They are elected.

MR. WHITESIDE: The hon. Member for Birmingham says they, the Senate, are elected; but his observation proves nothing. The men who framed the American Constitution were wise and good men.

MR. BRIGHT: Hear, hear!

MR. WHITESIDE: They were men of our own race; they were wise men; and they framed the Senate with such powers as would enable it to guard against the rash legislation of the Lower House, and against reckless interference with the finances of the country. The Senate curbs and checks the proceedings of the President and the Lower House, should occasion call for it. Then, will it be said, Sir, that the power exercised by the Senate in America is not to be exercised by the House of Lords in this country,

MR. BRIGHT: Hear, hear!

MR. WHITESIDE: Then, Sir, let the Gentlemen who cry "hear, hear," enter into a conference with the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and produce a measure that will revolutionize the country. Let them produce something that is tangible, and we will be prepared to meet it. The Resolutions of the noble Viscount have been spoken of as weak platitudes, but they are at all events agreeable; there is nothing venomous in them; they contain an admission of the rights of the House of Lords, and therefore they are not objectionable to us. But, Sir, if there be a body of men who desire to strip the House of Lords of the power which they have exercised so wisely and so well, then I say to them, instead of mere assertion,—instead of declaiming against that which declamation will never prevent,—proceed to action; introduce your measure; let us have open, manly discussion, and an honest decision as to whether we are to live under the ancient Constitution of this country, or whether that Constitution is to be revolutionized or destroyed.

LORD FERMOY: Sir, I certainly must say that I had no intention whatever to-night of taking part in this debate had it not been for the inquiry which was made of me by my right hon. and learned Friend. I say that I should not have taken any part in this debate had it not been for the pointed allusion made to me by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who seemed very angry at something which I had done in reference to this matter. Now, I certainly have not striven to please the right hon. Gentleman; and, indeed, could I but have foreseen that the course which I had taken would have put the right hon. Gentleman in such a fury as he has exhibited himself in to-night, it certainly would have been an additional reason for taking it on that occasion.

Now, Sir, I am not aware that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has any right to advise what he calls the great Liberal party in this House or anywhere else, and therefore we do not consider that he is the proper party to consult as to the course which we ought to pursue.

Now, Sir, the right hon. and learned Gentleman is angry that we are not going to have a division upon the present occasion; but, Sir, I must be permitted to say that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman wants a division he can have it himself by voting the negative to those Resolutions; but we thought it would be better, although those Resolutions do not go as far as we wish them to go, yet, nevertheless, as they travel a certain distance on what we consider the right road, we thought that it would be better for the interest of the Liberal party that those Resolutions should be passed without dissent, and unanimously by this House.

Now, Sir, the right hon. and learned Gentleman has alluded to the second Resolution which has been placed before the House by the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government. But now, I ask, Sir, why did the right hon. and learned Gentleman pass over the first Resolution? The first Resolution is a clear declaration of our rights and privileges in this House. That is a clear declaration, that you say in us, and in us alone, is the power of voting and controlling the Supplies.

Now, Sir, I think as a member of the Liberal party that it is a good step to get Gentlemen and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to assent to that proposition, because that proposition is in itself a foundation and a starting point from which we may take, and from which we, I trust, will take, ulterior measures.

Now, then, Sir, with respect to the second Resolution. If I had had the honour of being consulted as to the drawing of the Resolutions I would have said it was a thing into which we had better not enter. But then the third Resolution, although it does not go so far as we think it ought to go, and although it does not wind up as I think it ought to wind up, by calling upon the House for deeds and not words, by calling upon the House for action and not inaction, still, I say, the third Resolution points out how we can preserve our privileges for the future, and pointing that out, I think it also shows how we may restore our rights for the present if we choose so to do. But, Sir, I think it is a great point to have the approval of Gentlemen and right hon. Gentlemen opposite who were wanting their dinners. We have heard a great deal of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Pakington) who sat down and talked about Resolutions at public meetings, and at public dinners. On the Liberal side you had something done; but you had great dinners, great speaking and great declamation on the side opposite. Now, I saw and read an account of a great dinner at Willis's Rooms, at which the right hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) made a very excited and a very powerful speech. Now, in that speech the right hon. Gentleman tells us that there were hears and heaps of precedents. I will not venture to use the right hon. Gentleman's exact words, because I dare say he has a much better recollection of them than I have; but at all events the general impression was from what he told the meeting that there was precedent upon precedent, which would be stated here for the purpose of showing that the act which the House of Lords have done is no invasion of the privileges of the House of Commons.

Now, Sir, I think that after you have assented to the first Resolution which has been proposed by the noble Lord you will find it very difficult to proceed with respect to the second Resolution. You will recollect that there has been a public dinner on one side, and it will appear from what was there stated that there is no end of precedents, and that this is not an infringement of our rights and privileges; and therefore I say, Sir, that reserving to ourselves as Members of the independent Liberal party in this House the right to take some other measures after we have carried those Resolutions, reserving, I say, to ourselves the right to take any other steps which we may choose to take—I say, that in taking that course we are neither abandoning our principles as public men, nor taking an imprudent part as a party in allowing those Resolutions to pass after being assented to on both sides of the House.

Lord Fernov

Now, Sir, I certainly cannot leave the subject without saying that, although I approve so far as they go of the Resolutions, I am very far indeed from approving of the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, by which we were introduced to the House and brought under our consideration. I must be permitted to say that I think that speech was less calculated to give confidence to the Liberal party in this country than the speech of the noble Lord could possibly be made; and, Sir, I entirely dissent from the assertion which was made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last—namely, that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer answered the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government that is a true proposition. I say that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was a complete and a convincing answer to the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and I think that, generally, as the speech of the Prime Minister, and him, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given him immense credit.

Now, Sir, the right hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last—and who is an open and undisguised speaker on all occasions—he says fairly and candidly on the floor of the House of Commons—“I admit that the act of the House of Lords was a direct censure on the Chancellor of the Exchequer.” Now then, I ask, Sir, is not that admitting the whole question? Is not that at once admitting that the House of Lords claim the right of revising the Bill? If you submit to that quietly, and give to the House of Lords the control of the financial operation of the country, because if the House of Lords censure the Chancellor of the Exchequer as a financier, and reject his Bill, a portion of his Budget, it follows that the House of Lords are taking this course—talking potentially with the taxes and the finances of this country.

Now, Sir, it has been said to me by some speaker on this side of the House, especially by my hon. and gallant friend the Member for Liskeard, that the question of the duty upon paper is a question which ought not to be approved of. I think that the whole question has been very well put by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer—I mean the question in a financial point of view.

may so say—between the House of Lords and the House of Commons; but, Sir, I deny altogether, for one, the right of the House of Lords to consider this question in a financial point of view. If it was a matter political, no doubt they have a right to have a voice; but in a financial point of view I deny that they have any right whatever to interfere in any way whatsoever, either by way of approval or by way of rejection.

Now, Sir, the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last certainly never attempted to question one of the precedents laid down in the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth. I say, Sir, that no one on that side of the House has ventured or tried in any way whatsoever to shake the arguments of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth. I say that no one has ventured to attempt to shake a single proposition which he laid down; and I think that the whole force and reason of the argument went to prove, no matter how far back you went in the history of this question, you have not been able to put your finger upon any one single precedent at any time which would serve to show that the House of Lords have been allowed to interfere potentially in a matter which was purely financial.

Now, then, Sir, the precedents upon which they have acted were of a mixed character; they were something political—something political mixed up with every one of them. They were all relating to small matters; but in no case, I assert, have the House of Lords been able to put their finger upon a case in which they have been vested with a pure and simple control of the money.

Now, Sir, I do hope and trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich will favour us, if he has them, with some of his precedents; and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will give us some of those precedents that he produced at the dinner at Willis's Rooms. I am very sorry indeed to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman from the subject upon which he is occupied at present, but he hears me, I have no doubt, and perhaps he will make some answer to the observations which I am venturing to address to the House.

Well, now, Sir, I was glad to find by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he at least has some feeling in common—I think a great feeling in common, with the really Liberal party in this House. I beg to assure the House that I do not wish to use that word offensively to hon. Gentlemen opposite. I borrow the phrase from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, who has just sat down. He calls us the Liberal party, and I might accept the appellation; but I cannot help thinking that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has something in common—I cannot help thinking that he has a great deal in common—with us.

Now, Sir, I must freely and frankly tell you that in my opinion the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, is, I must admit it, as different in character and in principle from the speech of the noble Lord the Prime Minister as white is different from black. I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Whiteside) will take that admission; but I admit, and I admit frankly, that it is very agreeable to me that it is so, because I dissent from the principles of the Prime Minister, and I entirely adopt, and so do all my hon. Friends around me, or, to a great extent, their principle. I have no doubt that some of them do not; but we below the gangway fully and entirely adopt the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer: and if there was nothing else to prove that on the present occasion we have acted prudently, I think in not introducing any division upon this question, and the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman is a complete vindication of our course in that respect.

Now, Sir, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it meant anything meant this, that he dissents altogether from the proposition that the House of Lords have any right to interfere with the taxation of this country, and that when that principle has been laid down he will be prepared (this is my version of the speech)—he will be prepared at the fitting time and on the first occasion to take action upon it.

Now, then, that, Sir, is the great want of the Resolutions, namely, that they laid down sound propositions, but that they do not propose to do anything. Now, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer is, I augur, that he is prepared to supply that want, and that want is that you should do something to restore the rights of the House of Commons that have been invaded. It appears to me that the only simple thing to do would be to take some other means, and that a speedy means, of dealing with this question. There are many ways in which that may be done. The third Resolution shadows that out. The third Resolution says that we have the power of framing the means of Supply. The third Resolution says that we have the means of dealing with such a tax as this, and I think that that would be the proper course for the Liberal party to take; and the only reason why we do not take it at present is this, that I think it a great advantage that we should have both sides of the House agreeing to the first proposition—namely, that the right of voting taxes lies with this House, and with this House alone.

Now, then, Sir, I am told that there is one great difficulty with Her Majesty's Government in taking a decided opinion upon this subject, and that is, that a majority of this House possibly would not re-affirm the repeal of the duty on paper. Now, Sir, that is a proposition to which, I for one, cannot assent. The history of the repeal of the paper duty is this:—On the second reading of that Bill, issue was taken:—Will you have an addition of a penny income tax, or a repeal of the paper duties? Now, upon that occasion all parties made every exertion. We thought there was a clear issue. The issue was taken, will you have an additional penny income tax, or will you have a repeal of the paper duties? And what was the result? The result was that this House decided by a majority of over fifty that we would repeal the paper duties, and that we would have a penny additional income tax. Now, what was the result of that? The result of that was that afterwards upon short notice with tripping much I certainly think on this side, and probably on the other side, they may or may not, but at any rate without those general notes of preparation which are sometimes sounded by both parties, we came to another division. In that other division, no doubt, there was only a majority of nine; it ought to have been eight, because one Gentleman voted by mistake. However, there was a majority of only nine; but that is easily accounted for. Many of my hon. Friends would have been here to vote, I have no doubt, if they had thought it was to have been a real vote as to whether you would repeal the paper duties or not. There was, for instance, the hon. Member for Birmingham. By some chance, by accident, suppose, the vote of the hon. Member for Birmingham was not recorded on the occasion, and the same was also the case with respect to other hon. Members. I say this, Sir, that the real, decided opinion in this House was upon the second reading of that Bill, when there was a majority of over fifty, and that the other, as far as the third reading is concerned, was what I may call a stolen march, and no test whatever of the real opinion of this House.

Lord Fermoy

Now, then, Sir, I say that that is so, I for one do not at all assent to the proposition that if you come again to the House and test its opinion you would have pretty nearly the same number, namely, a majority of 50. As far as I am concerned I see nothing whatever in the opinion of the country to induce hon. Gentlemen to change their minds upon that subject. It has been stated to-night by the hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that after all, in point of fact, this matter in dispute between us is only a million and a quarter. As regards the Exchequer, although it is a million and a quarter, as regards taxation in one year, as regards the tax upon paper, it is only a duty of £700,000, because it goes from April to September. Now, let us argue in this way. Could that have exercised a serious influence on the minds of Members in this House? Could that sum of £700,000 have exercised a serious influence upon the minds of Members in giving their votes? It is really and truly only a question, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of £700,000; and it is possible upon a question, upon a sum so small as that, that hon. Members who declared it was right that the paper duties should be repealed—I ask, would they be deterred from voting the way they voted before, and vote in a different way? They should say certainly not. Therefore I say, Sir, that that is a bad reason for the Government not taking action on the present occasion. I am one of those who are probably more disposed to be sanguine in matters of this kind than I ought to be. But I cannot help thinking—I am impelled to think—that we ought to take action. I think, Sir, that when we affirm our Resolutions we ought to take a further step, and I am ready to join anybody in this House who will put the question to a but, as I said before, I think we are acting prudently on the present occasion. You do not often have an opportunity of drawing Gentlemen opposite in voting upon a question of this kind, in joining them in assenting to the three propositions, especially the first, as laid down in the present Resolution, namely, that the broad and simple question in this House is this, that in this House lies the sole power of deciding the amount, the manner and the time at which the taxation of this country should be levied. When we have assented to that principle it will be time for us to take a further step in the matter, and to call upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to give effect to the principle which he has laid down this night in that speech which he has delivered. I think that we ought to call upon him to take the further step to resist this gigantic innovation, as he termed it, which has been made upon the House of Commons by the House of Lords.

Now, Sir, I humbly but confidently submit to the House that the only way to do that would be to send up the Bill for the Repeal of the paper duties. Again at any rate we will call upon him to carry out the principle he has laid down to-night, and I really do believe, from the spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman has spoken to-night, whether he be in office or out of office, I say that I believe he will be prepared to vindicate those principles, and in conclusion, asking the indulgence of the House for having detained them so long, I can tell the right hon. Gentleman, not only on the part of a large number of hon. Friends in this House, but on the part of the great body of the people out of doors, that if he is prepared to lead us, we are prepared to follow him.

MR. DILLWYN: Sir, I do not think, as far as I can understand this matter, that it is necessary to discuss the question of precedent or of legal power in the House of Lords to do what they have done in respect to the rejection of the Repeal of the Paper Duty Bill. I do not wish to go into the question of whether they have the power to do so, but at the same time I cannot help thinking that the House of Lords have acted on this occasion in an unconstitutional and dangerous manner. I wish rather to go into the question of what course it is the duty of the House of Commons to take under the present circumstances; and what is the object of the House of Lords in the course which they have adopted. That, I apprehend, is rather a difficult matter to determine. I will merely say in passing that the Resolutions which have been proposed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government for our acceptance and adoption seem to me very like the preamble of a Bill without any clauses whatever attached to it. For my own part, I do not see any very great amount of good in them, because they are not followed up by any enacting clause whatever. But what I wish, as I have already said just now, to point out to the House is my view of the conduct of the House of Lords with regard to this question, what is their object in taking the course which they have done?

Now, Sir, I have been but a short time a Member of this House, not more than five years, and I, of course, cannot shut my eyes to the many occurrences which have taken place during that time bearing upon the question as, I think, now before the House. When I first entered this House, some five years ago, it appeared to me that on some occasions the question was not so much one of the privileges of this House, but rather was one of how far the House of Lords would go without our insisting upon our privileges. I have frequently seen the House of Lords encroaching upon the privileges of the House of Commons, as far as I could collect from the course which they have thought it necessary to pursue. As one instance of their encroachment upon what I consider the privileges of this House, I allude to the case when we discussed the Resolution for admitting Jews into this House. At that time I put a notice upon the Paper with reference to this subject; but I believe it is a general understanding that we should not discuss or interfere with proceedings going on in that House, and I believe it is a general rule with them that they should not discuss or interfere with proceedings going on in the House of Commons. I remember when I proposed a Resolution to emphasise what I consider to have been, and what I still consider to be, our undoubted privilege with regard to the admission of Baron Rothschild into this House, and with regard to the admission of Mr. Pease on a former occasion—I recollect, I say, that the House of Lords, with indecent haste, as I thought, did encroach upon our privileges; they did discuss that question. Now, with regard to the House of Lords, I believe that their main object in rejecting the Paper Duties Bill is not so much to encroach upon the privileges of the House of Commons, or to act from motives of prudence, but that they acted as they did with a view to deciding what party should govern the country. My view is that the House of Lords were actuated by a desire as to who should sit upon the Treasury benches, and not as to whether the course which they adopted would be beneficial to the country at large. When I first came into this House one of the first questions discussed here was that regarding the qualification of Members for seats in this House, and I voted in the majority—that is to say, for doing away with the qualification. I remember that I was talking to a young Member about how I should give my vote, and his telling me that I was a Radical, and so on; but, at all events, that was a matter of little or no consequence to me. However, I thought that the qualification of Members to sit in this House might be very well done away with, but there was an end of it. The abolition of the property qualification of Members was certainly not to the liking of the House of Lords, but directly it was proposed by Lord Derby's Government they assented. Had it been proposed and carried by a small majority here (that is the order of the day now), no doubt the House of Lords would have thrown the Bill out.

Well, then, Sir, there was another subject to which I have already adverted which was brought forward. The other question to which my attention has been particularly called was the Jew Bill—a Bill for the admission of Jews into Parliament. Then the same course of procedure was adopted, which, after being repeatedly rejected by the House of Lords when proposed by a Liberal Government on this side of the House, was passed directly after a Conservative Ministry came into power. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House objected to that measure very strongly, and said that it would unchristianize the country. It went up to the other House, and it was rejected; but directly hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House got into power, the House of Lords passed this measure with a great deal of latitude. It seemed to have been admitted that it was a bungling, bad measure, but nevertheless it was adopted; it was passed; and so it would have been with regard to the question of Reform. The House of Lords hate Reform; but no one can doubt that if the Gentlemen on the Opposition benches had succeeded in passing their Reform Bill the House of Lords would at once have assented to it, however much against the grain it would have gone. I think so. I have no doubt whatever that that is the course which would have been adopted by the House of Lords; and I venture to think that had the Paper Duty Repeal Bill that we are now discussing been brought forward and passed by the Opposition, judging from analogy and from what I have seen in other cases, I have very little doubt that Lord Derby's Government would have assented to it. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, if he had proposed the repeal of the paper duty, no doubt the House of Lords would have been your very obedient servants, and would at once have passed that measure; and if that had been done you would not have had this question raised affecting the privileges of this House. That is my firm conviction and belief, right or wrong, and I do not think that there is any very great deal of doubt upon that subject.

Mr. Dillwyn

Therefore, Sir, I say that the decision of the House of Lords in this matter is that of attempting to dictate to the people who shall govern the country. The Lords, I say, would have agreed to pass the Reform Bill without demur as well as the Repeal of the Paper Duty Bill, thus sacrificing their own principles, and passing what might be considered objectionable measures on the condition that their nominees should sit on the Ministerial benches here.

Now, Sir, with respect to the constitutional question, if we have made a mistake in this matter so much the worse for us, and so much the better for those who lie in wait for us, and who are seeking by every means in their power to trip us up. But, Sir, I deny that we have made a mistake, and I believe that the repeal of the paper duty is a beneficial measure for the people of this country, and if the same question arose to-morrow I should vote for the repeal of the paper duty.

Well, then, Sir, the question arises what ought we in the meanwhile to do for the purpose of asserting our privileges. I quite agree with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this conduct on the part of the House of Lords has been a most violent attack upon our privileges, and now that that attack has been made the question is whether we should adopt measures of retaliation. One measure that suggests itself to my mind is that we might send up a Bill carrying out our views in connection with Money Bills. I do not say that that ought to be done. We may again, as it seems to me, adopt another line of conduct; it may be more dignified not to adopt a measure of retaliation, but rather to adopt the policy of avoidance; and how are we to adopt that policy of avoidance? because it seems to me that we can do it. We may as we find that certain Bills of taxation—Bills for the taxation of the people—if we find that these Bills are rejected by the House of Lords we may be very careful in all matters of taxation to impose direct taxation, to the repeal of which the House of Lords will not be very likely to object. If the House of Lords endeavour to thwart this House in the repeal of taxes, such as that upon paper, one course is open to us, and I think that that course may be very easily adopted—namely, that of determining to carry out measures of direct taxation, the only and the natural consequence of such conduct on their part, because I apprehend it is the principle which, under such circumstances, ought to be adopted. If we, the House of Commons adopt this system of policy, if increased taxation is required, and we extend the Act of the Succession Duties, I do not very much doubt that the House of Lords will readily concur with us in our views.

Now, Sir, in conclusion, I have only to say that although I very much disagree with the Resolutions of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and whose arguments were very lame in conclusion, and considering that the Resolutions of the noble Lord ought to have led to some more practical result than they do, I am nevertheless willing to give them my support. In the absence of any Amendment, although I should have preferred a course which would have led to some practical result—if any hon. Gentleman had proposed an Amendment I should have voted with him—but if there is no Amendment to be proposed I am willing not to give a negative, principally in consequence of the speech which has been made this night by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, for which I beg sincerely to tender to him my thanks, my best and earnest thanks.

SIR JOHN TRELAWNY said: Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate, although I should be very glad if it were to last for ten or twelve days, as I am of opinion that the country at large would then better understand the importance of the crisis.

Now, Sir, I will not attempt to support the Resolutions of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, because I will, as far as I am concerned, have nothing whatever to do with such a lame and impotent conclusion as the noble Lord seems to wish to be drawn from them. It is my humble opinion—nay, my firm conviction—that if the House of Lords have committed an aggression in respect to the privileges of the House of Commons, it is the duty of the House of Commons to meet them then not by mere words, but by acts which will speak for themselves. The truth of the case appears to be this—that the House of Lords have assumed to be Chancellors of the Exchequer, and that in the event of war and disaster overtaking this country, the whole responsibility for the future would belong to them and not to the House of Commons. I certainly shall be the last to deny that the House of Lords, the aristocracy of this country, have shown great qualities; but I have yet to learn that it can be said that there is financial ability among them.

Now, Sir, it is my opinion that the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton has not acted in a manner equal to the occasion, when this attack has been made upon our privileges by the House of Lords; and that being the case, I cannot support these Resolutions which have been proposed to us to-night.

I apprehend that the House of Commons is bound to defend its privileges, and means much more efficacious might be found for that purpose, such means, for instance, as refusing to vote the Supplies for the year. I have only this day heard an ominous hint that the House of Commons is to be asked for money in respect of the Chinese war.

Now, Sir, the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in order to prove that the House of Commons is not bound to follow the mandate of the House of Lords, might, without difficulty, have adopted the simple course of refusing, on the part of this House, to vote any Supplies until the wishes of this House in respect to the paper duty, and the wishes of the country at large have been made the law of the land. Instead, Sir, of adopting this plain and intelligible course, a futile and miserable proceeding has been had recourse to, and of which I decline to accept any portion of the responsibility.

Now, Sir, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton, in the course of the observations which he thought it his duty to address to the House, appeared to me, and I dare say to hon. Gentlemen around me, to attack his own Chancellor of the Exchequer who sat by his side. Much reproach has been cast upon that right hon. Gentleman from all quarters; but he surely, under those circumstances, if for no other reason, might have looked for encouragement and support to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. But, Sir, so far from that being the course, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton declared that the course which the House of Lords has adopted in reference to the repeal of the Paper Duty Bill, is to some extent justified on account of the impropriety of the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or, at least, by something in it which had been discovered to be wrong. ["No, no!"] Sir, I may not, it is true, be repeating the exact phraseology of the noble Lord; but, as far as the substantial confirmation of my statement is concerned, I shall simply appeal to the reports which will appear in the newspapers to-morrow morning. And here I may be permitted to say that the press certainly, to some extent, compensates for the loss of our other liberties; and among the things that it will tell us to-morrow will be, I doubt not, that the noble Lord at the head of the Government in some measure in the course of his speech implied a censure on the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in respect to the finances of the year, although I may have been wrong in the phraseology I used; but there is a press, and that press will, fortunately, make up for that loss of ours. Under any circumstances, I assert that the noble Lord at the head of the Government did, to a certain degree, imply a censure upon his Chancellor of the Exchequer. I understood the noble Lord certainly to do so; at all events, that was my impression at the time the noble Lord was making his speech, and it is my impression still; and I say that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to have been defended by him, and certainly ought not to have been attacked by him. The noble Lord has certainly given the House credit, as it appeared to me, for the supposition that, under the circumstances, there is reason on the part of the Government to believe that the amount of paper duty will fall in very conveniently to the Treasury. In point of fact, instead of defending the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer against the House of Lords, the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton has defended the House of Lords against the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Sir John Trevelyan

Now, Sir, as I said at the commencement of my observations, I did not do so for the purpose of protracting this debate, the object being simply that the country should at least come to know the vast importance of the course which the House of Commons is about to take, and that is the reason why I thought it right to address the House.

MR. J. L. RICARDO: Sir, I am unwilling to say one word upon the subject which is now before the House; my silence may be misconstrued, but I do not wish to trouble the House with very few observations.

Now, Sir, I, for one, decline to support the Resolutions which have been proposed by the noble Lord as a settlement of an important question. I look upon these Resolutions as explaining nothing upon it; that these Resolutions settle nothing; but I am happy to say also that I think they will prevent nothing. I anticipate (and I have no doubt whatever I am right in my anticipation) that the Resolutions will be placed before the House of Commons which will afford hon. Members an opportunity of fully expressing their opinions upon the constitutional question, and that the elaborate apology of the House of Lords which the Prime Minister has thought it necessary to make to the House, will not be at all accepted as a settlement of the question. I must say that it seemed to me that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had no object in view but that of calming down the passions and quietly passing over a difficult subject; but I think these matters will not be passed over altogether so quietly as the noble Lord seems to consider they will be. I believed that the result of this discussion would be the mere acceptance of the Resolutions proposed to us to-night; if I had at the moment believed that the question would be disposed of by the adoption of the Resolutions; if I stood alone in the House of Commons, I would oppose these Resolutions; but it is because I believe that these Resolutions will not prevent the House of Commons from going thoroughly into the question, and from dealing firmly, both politically and constitutionally with the subject.

I am willing to allow them to pass to-night, with the determination that the question shall hereafter be fairly raised, which is not to be done to-night; and that I shall then have an opportunity of expressing my views upon the whole question that is before us.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS: — Mr. Speaker, I can very easily understand the policy of abstaining from saying one word upon this question, after that which has passed in this House this evening, for I know that it is extremely difficult to say anything upon the question itself as regards the privileges of this House and of the other House of Parliament, after the speeches which were made by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Collier) who sat behind me, and by those hon. Gentlemen who have followed him with reference to what has taken place upon this important subject; but, Sir, I do not feel that I should be discharging my duty if I were to remain silent upon this occasion, having taken, as I confess I have, a deep interest in the question itself, and having considered, as I have, the Resolutions of the noble Lord at the head of the Government in every way that I could. I confess that I do believe that whatever may be the opinions and the feelings of any hon. Gentleman on either side of the House, be they the opinions so well exemplified in the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge or any other hon. Gentleman; it would, I say, be extremely difficult to frame an Amendment to which some well-founded objection might not be urged. I attempted to frame an Amendment, and I found that the only Amendment I could frame to my own satisfaction, did not meet with that general concurrence, without which, I should not feel justified in submitting it to the House. My view of the question now before the House is this—that the first Resolution is satisfactory, and the two last are inadequate, and that the question resolves itself into two points—one which is properly for the consideration of the Executive Government, and the other, for the consideration of this House; that for Her Majesty's Government is the question exclusively as regards the paper duties after the way in which the privileges of the House of Commons as I maintain have been violated by the House of Lords; and it seems to me that if this House does come to the conclusion that these Resolutions are to be unanimously supported, that it would be beneath the dignity of this House if they did not hereafter take that action which ought to follow, and, believing this, I am prepared to say that if this House shall give to these Resolutions that assent which I think they will give to them, that action ought to be taken by which this House will practically vindicate its privileges, and then it will be for the noble Lord at the head of the Government (if not for him it will for some one else) to vindicate the question of the paper duty itself.

Now, Sir, I believe that it would not have been very difficult to have met this question by some such means as have been alluded to in the Report proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge. I should like to see carried into effect a Standing Order that whenever a Bill is brought into this House again for remitting taxation, it should be incorporated in a Bill of Supply or appropriation. It is true that there may be objections to that course being taken: for it may be said that you have already the power, and I suppose it is to some such course that the last Resolution of the noble Lord points.

Now, Sir, with regard to the privileges of this House, and the way in which they have been treated by the House of Lords, I, for one, am ready to admit that the other House have the abstract right to reject the Paper Duties Bill or any other; but I also maintain that it is for this House to judge, and that exclusively, how the usage of that right is carried into effect by the other House of Parliament.

Now, I think, Sir, after having heard the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth go into all the precedents with that acumen and clearness which has received the approbation of all sides of the House, it would not be becoming in one who has no connection whatever with the learned profession to venture to intrude my opinion upon those precedents, but at the same time I think I may venture to draw the attention of the House to the somewhat more popular view of the case as exemplified in that work which has now become a standing authority, and properly a standing authority in this House, and out of doors, to which comparatively very little allusion has been made, I mean Hatsell's Precedents. I think I can show to the House, by one or two extracts from those precedents, laying aside for the moment all the minor matters connected with this subject, the popular way in which this may be put, and I think I shall be able to bring conviction to the mind of every man, that my view is the true one.

But I beg in the first place to call the attention of the House to that particular precedent of 1772, which has been already alluded to in the course of this debate, and I trust that I may be permitted to read to the House that which has been said by Mr. Hatsell upon that subject. It is there said that the Amendment that was then proposed by the House of Lords was described by one of the speakers as—

“A flagrant encroachment on the privileges of the House, and as the Lords, forgetful of their duty, had interfered in raising money by inserting those words, he (Mr. Pownall) moved to reject the Bill.”

Now the difficulty with which we have to contend on the present occasion is, as to what course is to be pursued after the line of conduct which the other House has adopted. I think it is not consistent with reason to suppose that the House of Lords is not to have the power of amending or altering any Bill which may be sent up to them, but they have the power of rejecting that Bill in toto, because if they have that power, I want to know how it can be said that we have not been treated with contempt, when we have on various occasions protested against the course which they have adopted. I should like to know how it was that these matters were taken up and dealt with by our ancestors when the privileges of this House were interfered with by the House of Lords. Did they not treat with contempt a Bill, because it was amended or made better? How did they treat it on that occasion? Why, Sir, it was moved that that Bill should be rejected. It was seconded by a Mr. Whitworth, who said:—

“Though desirous of a good understanding between the two Houses, yet he seconded the Motion, as the Lords had violated a privilege which always had belonged, and he hoped always would belong to that House.”

And your Predecessor, Sir, the then Speaker declared that—

“He would do his part of the business, and toss the Bill over the table.”

That was the way, Sir — that was the mode in which the House on former occasions and in former times treated Bills that came down from the House of Lords amended. And why should they not so treat a Bill, when it has been rejected by the House of Lords altogether? Why is it, I ask, that you now propose nothing when they reject a Bill?

Sir Charles Douglas

Sir, upon that occasion, in the that debate, there was a man whose speech which I shall beg leave for there is scarcely a line of that is not applicable to the present. There was a man who made and no man's opinions and judgments considered to be of more value. No man was more respected as a national authority, and no man more ably for the rights and privileges of this House. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham has been accused of very severe upon the aristocracy of the House of Lords, but what, I have been the language which has been used by this House when speaking of a man of this description? I will not use every word certainly of the language used by the hon. Member for Birmingham, but it is nothing when compared with which I will adopt, of a man who the House spoke on behalf of the privileges of the House of Commons. And what was said upon that occasion a certain constitutional authority? [Cries of "Name!"] I will give you the name afterwards. [Cries of "Name, name!"] I will give you the name when I have said you what I have got to say. He

“I wish that there was not only a good understanding between the Houses, but that there was a good understanding in our country, and I wish both for the same reason—despatch of public business * * * do not know what is going on in this country, what is worse, they do not understand the principles of the Constitution. Sir, this privilege which they have now invaded is a known right inherent in this House as the representative of the people. For what do the Lords attempt to invade this privilege? I plainly say to us and to the people, your liberty longer tax (or remit taxation) your liberty exist if we allow them to lay their illegious hands upon this Holy of Holies, the ladium of the Constitution? The tool of the (Government) Opposition will be the face to defend this encroachment. What is the cause of this strange proceeding? I call it absolute ignorance of the Constitution, an insidious trial of our ductility and acquiescence. I have seen enough of their conduct to think the former not impossible, and I have much the sympathy existing between the Opposition (Government) to deem it improbable. Suppose, then, we come to the matter and ascribe to it attempt to part with the Constitution and partly to the (Government) Opposition management. In my belief we shall not be much wide of the mark. * * * Though they frequently merely to show their power we need them to proceed to the annihilation of all our authority."

[Cries of "Name, name!"]

Sir, that Bill was treated in this way at that time. [Cries of "Name, name!"] It was Edmund Burke. The Bill was rejected nem. con., and your predecessor, Sir, tossed it over the table, several Members on both sides of the House giving it a kick as they went out. That, then, is the way in which that Bill was treated by our ancestors.

Now, Sir, it is because I believe that these Resolutions will enable us to take action, if you pass them, that they have my support, although they are not entirely such as I should be glad to see. I think the second and the third Resolution might have been amended; but unless you can amend them so as to have the unanimous support of the House, it is better to pass them as they stand. Believing, however, that these Resolutions will enable us to do all that is indicated by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in that speech, than which there never was a speech delivered here more worthy of any man who ever sat on that bench, or more worthy of the high reputation of the right hon. Gentleman himself. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for having made it. I shall support them. I thank my stars that I was so far fortunate as to hear it delivered, as it was, when so few Members were present; it recalled to me the days when I sat behind another statesman (Sir Robert Peel) who vindicated popular rights and popular principles. I have sat behind that statesman, when he sacrificed everything for the people and had my humble support, and I heard him vilified and abused then, as I hear the right hon. Gentleman vilified and abused in private now, because he is inclined to stand up for the privileges of this House. I say, Sir, that I had much satisfaction in hearing that speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I trust I shall have the opportunity of supporting him in the assertion of those popular rights which I believe to be no less important than those privileges of this House by a steady adherence to which public liberty can best be maintained, and public business be conducted with advantage to the State.

Sir, I feel that I ought to apologise to the House for having trespassed upon their indulgence at this length. For my own part, I believe that no precedent whatever can be found which, when it is fairly considered, can be held to justify the course which the House of Lords has taken by the rejection of the Paper Duty Repeal Bill, because there is no precedent to show that they have ever interfered with the financial arrangements of the year. It is admitted, moreover, that the House of Lords do not possess the right to amend Money Bills, and upon what ground, therefore, they can uphold the right of rejecting such Bills, I am at a total loss to understand. The House of Commons has always exercised the right of dealing with and regulating the finances of the country; they have always exercised that privilege and that right exclusively, and I trust that they never will allow any interference with it.

Then, I say, Sir, that if we can find no such right and privilege on the part of the House of Lords to act as they have done in the instance before us, it is right and proper that we should come to the conclusion that the rights and privileges of this House have been invaded by the House of Lords, in the course which they have taken here, and the usage of that right has never been exercised as to increase taxation or otherwise to regulate the taxation of this country. The House of Lords has interfered in a way which, by construction, may be considered as imposing a burthen upon the people. And now, Sir, let me tell the House what the popular view of Mr. Hatsell upon this subject is. I hope I have not wearied the House, and I promise you that I will detain you but a short time longer. I must say that I think the popular view of the case is to be found without going into the question of precedents at all. In page 14, of the same work I find the following words:—

"In whatever mode the Lords have at any time attempted to invade this right (namely, of granting taxes for the public service) the Commons have uniformly and vigorously opposed the attempt, and have asserted and maintained this claim through such a long and various course of precedents, particularly from the time of the Restoration, that the Lords have now for many years desisted either from beginning any Bill, or from making Amendments to Bills passed by the Commons, which either in the form of positive taxes or pecuniary penalties or in any other shape might by construction be considered as imposing burthens upon the people."

If the recent act of the House of Lords is not one of imposing burthens upon the people, I know not what is imposing burthens upon the people. Then there is another passage which I am desirous of reading to the House. I find these words:—

"Where the Bill or the Amendments made by the Lords appear to be of a nature which, though not immediately, yet in their consequences will bring a charge upon the people, the Commons have denied the right of the Lords to make Amendments, and the Lords have acquiesced."

Why, Sir, if the House of Commons have denied the right of the House of Lords to make Amendments, and the House of Lords have acquiesced, there is an end of the matter. To say that the House of Lords, therefore, has a right to act as they have done, the thing in reason is absurd, and you can only proceed upon a strict technical legal view of the case, and nothing else. Then, Sir, it is stated that—

"In no case whatever will the Commons admit that the Lords may interfere in matter of duties, however trifling or remote that interference may be."

Now, Sir, I submit to the House that the interference of the House of Lords in the present instance is an interference of the worst description.

Well, then, Sir, with these views I hope the House will allow me to say that I look forward with much satisfaction to the time when we shall be able to take some action in consequence of these Resolutions; but I must at the same time confess that I look back to the beginning of this evening with equal regret and sorrow to the speech which was then delivered by the First Lord of the Treasury. I only hope and trust that before this debate is concluded, now that that speech has been received by many hon. Gentlemen, as I understood it, that the noble Lord at the head of the Government will take the opportunity of showing he has been misunderstood on this side of the House, and of making an explanation that will be satisfactory to the House; all events, if not satisfactory, I think that the noble Lord should give some fuller explanation. I am quite aware that such explanation will not be satisfactory to the hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, who have maintained a silence upon this occasion, not a very dignified silence, I must say, and who have been content to rest their case upon the speech of the noble Lord. I hope and trust that the noble Lord will give some explanation of his speech, which has caused pain and disappointment, for the purpose of showing that he has been misunderstood on this side of the House; and in concluding my observations upon this very important subject, I have only now to thank the House for the attention with which they have listened to me.

Sir Charles Douglas

MR. BUTT: I confess, Sir, that I should be very unwilling to give a silent vote upon a question of such magnitude as that which is now before the House. I should be exceedingly unwilling to acquiesce in this Resolution without stating to the House distinctly the grounds for the vote which I shall feel it my duty to give. A question more important than this, affecting as it does the privileges of this House, has never occurred, and I think that no more important subject can be broached than one affecting our privileges.

Now, Sir, I must confess that I should be disposed to accept the epithet which designates these Resolutions which have been brought forward by the noble Lord as "lame and impotent;" but I do not vote for them as being a conclusion and an end of this matter; on the contrary, I think that when hon. Gentlemen opposite come to read the third Resolution, if they assent to that passage, they are pledging themselves that this House is called upon for action. But, Sir, what does the third Resolution say? The third Resolution says, "That to guard for the future." Why are the words "for the future" inserted if it does not employ that there has been an undue exercise of right for the past?

"That to guard for the future against an undue exercise of that power by the House of Lords, and to secure to the Commons their rightful control over taxation and Supply, this House has in its own hands the power so to impose and remit taxes, and to frame Bills of Supply, that the right of the Commons as to the matter, manner, measure, and time may be maintained inviolate."

Now, Sir, I cannot conceive a Resolution more distinctly declaring that some further action is called for by this House than the third Resolution which I have just read. But, Sir, at the present moment the only Resolution which is before the House is the first, and I cannot conceive that any person can object to that except on the ground that it is unnecessary; and if no infringement is made upon the privileges of this House, if nothing has occurred to call upon us to pass this Resolution, it is unnecessary, and, therefore, I say that it first declares that something has been done; and the second and third Resolutions place it beyond doubt that further action is to be taken; and it is, Sir, upon this principle, and distinctly, not as a conclusion, but as laying the ground for future action, that I shall vote for this Resolution. When I heard the noble Viscount's speech to-night I could not help thinking that he did not understand the House of Lords to have invaded the privileges of this House, but that, nevertheless, it was necessary that we should take some steps to warn them of the consequences of the course which they were pursuing. The argument of the noble Lord reminded me of the argument of the Welsh jury, "Not guilty, but don't do it again." The noble Lord appeared to me to say that the House of Lords were not guilty, but recommended them not to do it again. It is only in this view of affirming the principle which I apprehend no one will dispute, and in the view that these Resolutions will lead us to further action, that I shall vote for the one which is now before the House. I should, as I said before, be very unwilling to give a vote without making this explanation. Let any hon. Gentleman rise up in his place and say that this Resolution does not bear the construction which I put upon it. I look upon it as a declaration that the House of Lords have infringed our privileges. Let hon. Gentlemen, if they like, get up and say that the House of Lords have not done that, and I can understand them; but I say that the House of Lords have infringed the privileges of this House. I say, Sir, most distinctly, that the House of Lords, and within the principles which has been laid down by their own advocates, have violated the privileges of this House. There are two principles involved here. Take the broad constitutional question, What are these two principles? One of them is that this House is the judge of the amount of Supplies to be granted to the Crown; and the other is, that it is for this House to judge how those Supplies are to be raised. Will any one tell me that the House of Lords, by rejecting the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty, has not violated one or other of these principles; and if they have done that, then I say that they have violated the privileges of this House; they have, it cannot for a moment be denied, violated the constitutional privileges of this House.

Sir, the House of Lords appear to me to have no avowed defenders here to-night; but I should very much like to hear the arguments of any hon. Gentleman who will venture to assert that the Resolution now before the House does not declare that the House of Lords has infringed the privileges of the House of Commons. I shall vote for the Resolution as a declaration that the House of Lords has done this, and I am sure that many hon. Members around me will vote for it upon the same ground. It is true that the House of Lords may not have violated any technical privilege of the House of Commons, but, at the same time, they have violated one of our constitutional privileges. It has been admitted throughout, it has been conceded on all hands, that the House of Lords cannot adopt one part of a Money Bill and reject another part of the same Bill. In this case they have agreed to the imposition of an addition to the income tax, and they have rejected the repeal of the duty on paper which accompanied it, although in a separate Bill. If the two propositions, let me ask the House, had been made in one Bill, could they have adopted one and rejected the other? I shall vote for this Resolution because it is not a conclusion; but, in the first place, as affirming that something has occurred to make it necessary for the House of Commons to reiterate their privileges, and, in the second place, as affording the basis of future action.

Sir, I thank the House for having listened to these few observations of mine, but I did not think it right to give my vote without stating my reasons for doing so.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY: Sir, I will trouble the House with only half a dozen words upon the subject under discussion. There is, in the first place, one thing that strikes me as most extraordinary, namely, that it will, when this matter comes to be looked at hereafter, be thought a very peculiar circumstance—there will be no man who will say otherwise than this is a debate of the greatest possible importance, and yet, as far as we have gone, we have had only one single Member of the Opposition who has condescended to address the House, namely, the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Dublin, who has given us any opinion at all. As far as I am concerned, Sir, I am much obliged to that right hon. Gentleman for the opinion which he expressed in one portion of his speech, for he stated that the course which the House of Lords had taken was, in fact, intended to be a censure upon the policy of the Finance Minister. That is proving the case of hon. Members on this side of the House, and that the House of Lords have gone beyond their power in so doing. Now, although only one speech has been made on that side of the House, I believe that that avowal which the right hon. Gentleman has made, will, out of doors, do very good service to those who hold the opinions which I entertain upon this subject. Upon this occasion I shall follow the course which has been taken by hon. Gentlemen who have preceded me. I believe, Sir, that, if we stopped at these Resolutions after passing them, we should disappoint the just expectations of persons out of doors. There is nothing in the Resolutions that any one could object to, except they do not go far enough. I do hope, and trust, and believe that some action will be taken upon them. I may state that I have had nothing whatever to do, as a Member of the Liberal party, with the withdrawal of any of those Notices. I came down for the purpose of supporting the Resolution which I found upon the paper to be proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for Plymouth, and not having heard of his intention of withdrawing it, but having listened to the whole of his speech with the greatest possible delight, I was excessively shocked to find that, after his case had been so distinctly stated, he did not persevere with that Resolution.

Now, Sir, I think that the Resolutions of the noble Lord at the head of the Government would be extremely weak and extremely impotent as they stand; but I hope that, if the Liberal Members live till to-morrow, some new course will be chalked out for them. I certainly was most anxious to clear myself of having had any part in the withdrawal of the other Resolutions. I entertain a very strong opinion respecting the course which has been taken by the House of Lords, and I came down to the House prepared to give effect to my opinion by my vote. I was desirous of stating this, inasmuch as I know that the people out of doors would be extremely disappointed if the Liberal Members stopped where they were. I feel that the House of Lords, in this instance, has far exceeded their power, and that the more you look into precedents, the more any man of judgment must feel that there is no precedent for the particular course which the House of Lords has taken.

MR. STANSFELD: Sir, we have heard of the "masterly policy of inaction," and undoubtedly the silence on the Opposition Benches this night has put the Liberal Members of this House in a practical difficulty; for it is no easy matter for hon. Gentlemen to rise one after another to repeat the same tale and to put the same construction upon Resolutions which are supposed to be not altogether intelligible in their character. But, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, the only Gentleman who has spoken on the other side of the House (Mr. Whiteside) made an appeal, almost a personal and individual appeal to us to show to him the reasons upon which we, from our point of view, should support these Resolutions,—I, and I dare say other Gentlemen, will rise for the purpose of responding to that appeal.

Now Sir, the first Resolution states in the very words of one of the old precedents, the supremacy of this House in matters of taxation and Supply, and I am perfectly content to rest the case upon those old precedents. It is impossible for me not to be satisfied with that Resolution.

Sir, the second Resolution is an equally correct one—the first Resolution was a correct statement of right—the second Resolution is an equally correct statement of fact. It states correctly and truly, and I am perfectly willing to make that admission to the House of Lords, that there have been a certain number of cases of Money Bills in which the House of Lords have exercised the right of rejecting them, and this House has allowed them to pass. I will presently take occasion to show the bearing or the want of bearing of those cases upon the matters under our consideration.

Now, Sir, if we come to the last Resolution of the noble Lord we find that that is as positive an assertion of a power existing in this House efficiently to assert their right, as the first Resolution is an immediate assertion of the existence of the right itself; and I am at a loss to understand how hon. Members professing to uphold and approve the course which has been taken by the House of Peers can consent to commit themselves to one Resolution which declares the possession of the right, and to another Resolution which assumes the possession of the power to enforce that right. The only fault I find with the concluding Resolution of the noble Lord is this, that it does not sufficiently point the moral which the circumstances of the case suggest.

Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman who has a great faculty of castigation, who has a great faculty of attacking those who differ from him, without laying down anything very positive or tangible himself, he has hardly told us anything, he has hardly expressed any opinion upon the question before the House. I tried to gather some expression of opinion from him, I do not know whether I have succeeded, but if I have gathered any expression of opinion from him, it appeared to me to be simply this, that the whole question resolves itself into one of legislative functions and powers. That the House of Lords possessed the power in point of fact to refuse their assent to any Bill, and that possessing the power ipso facto they possessed the constitutional right.

Sir John Shelley

Now, Sir, if that was the statement as I understood it of the right hon. Gentleman, I think it would be evidence that he at once put himself and his party out of court, and at once solved the question against himself and against those who think with him, for there can be no question whatever of the existence of our power, if we choose to exercise it; and if the right hon. Gentleman will base right not on constitutional usage but upon the possession of power, why the power is ready to our hands if we choose in our own discretion to avail ourselves of it.

Well now, Sir, the noble Lord who moved the Resolutions which are now before the House made an undue admission as it appeared to me. The noble Lord said that it was undoubtedly true that the House of Lords had the right of rejecting all Bills sent up to them, and the noble Lord's argument, if I did not misapprehend it, went to this, that although this House professes of right a supremacy in matters of taxation and Supply, that although this House has from time to time thought it fit and necessary to assert that supremacy, that although as the noble Lord declares in his third Resolution, that we have the power and that we may at some future time choose to assert it to maintain that supremacy, still as we have not as in this case made use of that power, that there has been no infringement of our privileges and that there is no occasion for any strong expression of opinion against the course which the House of Lords have adopted.

Now, Sir, this argument appears to me, and I think I can show to the House, that it implies an abandonment of every constitutional right on the part of this House—that it admits the equal and co-ordinate power of the House of Lords,—and that it is an argument, therefore, if such be the truth, which coming from a person in the position and with the responsibilities of the noble Lord ought, in the language of our own precedent, “greatly to disturb this House.”

Why, Sir, everything that the noble Lord appears willing to claim for this House would be conceded to it if we had the right to it. We should still have the right by virtue of the discretion vested in us of using existing powers,—we should have the right, if we chose, to refuse to accept Bills sent back to us with Amendments by the House of Lords. We should have the right to couple in our own Bills the revision with the imposition of taxes, and we should have the right in this way practically to control these questions of taxation and Supply. But the House knows perfectly well that the claims which it has been accustomed for centuries to assert have not been claims in the discretionary use of a co-ordinate power, but have been claims to the possession of a superior constitutional right which it is a breach of privilege on the part of the House of Lords even to attempt to infringe upon.

Now, Sir, if this be the case, I think the House is bound to come to the consideration of this question as a question affecting its own privileges and on the assumption that an infringement of those privileges has occurred.

Now, Sir, let me look for a moment into the spirit of those old precedents which have been laid before us, and by which we ought to be bound. Now the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) has been accused of attempting to make an unsound distinction between the practice of imposing taxes, and that of ordinary legislative enactments. But I am bound to say that the very first conclusion which a study of the precedents laid before us brought home to my mind was this, that had that hon. Gentleman been the most exact and the most profound of black-letter lawyers he could not have more accurately defined the question—he could not with a truer instinct have arrived at the true root of this matter.

Now, in order to understand this it is necessary to go back to the very highest precedent. It is not enough to go back to the date when the Journals of this House commenced—it is not enough to go back even to the salutary precedent of 1407. You must trace the history of our system of imposing taxes back to its very birth—and what is the first great fact that you will find there? You will find that the origin of taxes was not that they were impositions made by force of law, but that they were voluntary offerings, free gifts and grants proffered by each of the separate estates separately by itself to the service of the Crown. You have then in the first place at the very birth of your system a separate estate each having an absolute, each having a separate, each having an exclusive control over taxation as far as it affected itself, and my first impression is this that you will find nothing whatever in the precedents which have been laid before this House abandoning on the part of the Commons of England one fraction of that original, absolute and exclusive right. But, Sir, it was naturally impossible that such a system as this should practically work, and the claim to a preponderance in such matters naturally comes back again to this House as representing the bulk of the people and as being largely interested in all questions of taxation, and in the salutary precedent to which I have referred of 1407, you will find the Resolutions of the two Houses settled by what almost amounts to an Act of Parliament. It is settled and agreed that every aid and Supply was solely given by the Commons, the powers of the Lords being confined to simply assenting. If you look at the forms of the House you will find in 1628 the preambles of the Bills of Supply settled by you. You find the Estimates submitted only to this House—you find the Chancellor of the Exchequer always a Member of this House, and you find throughout the whole of those forms the evidence that to this House belongs all questions of taxation and Supply.

Now, Sir, I suppose it will be admitted that although a rapid sketch, this is an accurate and substantial state of our system of imposing taxes. It is true, as the second Resolution argues and states, that there have been a certain number of cases in which the Lords have rejected Money Bills, cases beginning from the year 1714; but it has already been clearly shown by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth and by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it has been already shown that in those cases it was not Supply, but that it was fiscal policy upon which the House of Lords were assuming to act. There can be no doubt that the House of Lords have a right to refuse their assent to any Bill sent up to them; the only question is this, whether such right can be constitutionally exercised in all cases. There can be no doubt, as I see this matter, that the House have the right to refuse their assent constitutionally to certain Money Bills, to deny the right of the House of Lords constitutionally to refuse their assent to a Money Bill which is really a Supply Bill, and the rejection of which involves the rejection of the Budget, of the Estimates, of the Ways and Means.

Mr. Stansfeld

Now, Sir, with reference to the cases of cases I will ask leave to make some remarks to the House, repeating what has been already said by an hon. Member. In the first place the House is well aware that in all cases of Money Bills with which the House of Lords have to deal, otherwise than by assenting to them, and of which this House has to become necessarily possessed in all cases without exception, however trivial the amount, this House has guarded its functions and its rights, and has not allowed such Amendments to be passed. And the other remark which I wish to make is this—that logically and substantially it is impossible to the total rejection of a Bill for the repeal of an existing duty is not a greater interference with our supremacy in matters of taxation and Supply than it would be to propose for our consideration some Amendment upon such a Bill. Members are not prepared to admit the truth of that proposition, they are themselves in this dilemma—in the one hand they will have on the one hand to admit that the House of Lords were in the right in absolutely rejecting this Bill, and in the other hand they are proposed to repeal taxation of a certain year, but at the same time they are forced to admit that had the House of Peers proposed only for our consideration to change by one day the date upon which that repeal should commence, that would have been a high breach of the privileges of this House.

Sir, I now pass to what is as I think a branch of this question, and that is to consider the exact nature and effect of the new claim and of the new principle which has been attempted to be set up by the House of Lords. It is impossible to mistake the nature of that claim, it is the claim of the House of Lords to reject the Paper Duty Repeal Bill, to reject the House of Lords claim to revise the Estimates and the Estimates which are not sent up to them—to perpetuate taxes against the consent of the representatives of the people, and indefinitely to increase Supply as asked for by the Crown. But, Sir, reasons upon which that Act of the House of Lords was founded be wider than the Act itself, the precedent, if allowed to pass, will partake of the nature of those reasons, and will not merely be narrow and small as applied to the Act itself.

Now, Sir, it is not easy to refer within the rules of debate of this House to the reasons which may have induced the House of Lords to adopt the course which they have adopted. But the noble Lord who moved these Resolutions has told us, that there is no evidence of any disposition on the part of the House of Lords to erect this Act of theirs into a precedent. Now, I am prepared to contend that there is ample evidence of their intention to do that—and that there is that evidence—and to erect it into a precedent of wider scope than the present. We all know that the question of constitutional right, as distinguished from that of fiscal policy, was taken up in that House by a venerable and learned Lord, whose wise, profound, and accurate knowledge of Constitutional law, and whose absolute lucidity entitle us to treat his arguments as history will treat them, as a part of a precedent which the House of Lords are attempting to create. Now, we know the nature of the arguments of that noble and learned Lord. ["Order, order."] I will endeavour to obey the injunctions of the right hon. Gentleman. I believe I am at liberty to speak of what is notorious as having happened in "another place." We have heard arguments of this description. We have heard it said in behalf of the course of conduct which the House of Lords chose to adopt, that they were entitled to the exercise of every power which the forms of legislation placed at their disposal; but we have heard more than this—we have heard it also stated that the very rights which the House of Lords have conceded in past times to this House have been conceded, not as constitutional rights, but conceded simply as the possession on our part of superior force. Those arguments will be familiar to many hon. Members of this House. We have the House of Lords repudiating those former concessions, except upon the ground that they were made to superior force. Well, but we have also heard from another quarter that this could not be an invasion of the privileges of this House, because this House has still the ability, if it chose, to refuse to appropriate the source of Supply which the House of Lords had determined against our consent to maintain.

Surely this made the matter glaringly worse, for the claim of the House of Lords thus interpreted amounts not merely to perpetuating a tax against the consent of the representatives of the people, but amounts to the claim to perpetuate such a tax without the assent or requirement of the Crown, when this House has the power, which it ought to exercise, of refusing to appropriate such Supply, and when the Crown has the right (and I trust it will exercise it) to refuse to touch such stolen goods, to refuse to accept a boon at the hands of the House of Lords, instead of at the hands of the representatives of the people, who have in this Session and in all times responded with such lavish generosity to all the demands made on behalf of the Crown.

Now, Sir, I ask, can the House consent to a claim of this description? Can the House consent to a claim on the part of the House of Lords to perpetuate all existing permanent taxes, although substitutes may be provided for them all, and to perpetuate them for no possible constitutional object, but only for the bare and reckless assertion of a right, which, if the question ever came to one of power, it is the easiest thing in the world for this House to defeat. I ask this House whether it be not true that the House of Lords has repudiated all former concessions, save on the ground of submission to superior force, and whether they have not challenged the supremacy of this House in matters of taxation and Supply, and I say that the question to-night is this—Will this House, or will it not, answer that appeal?

Sir, we have been told by the noble Lord that we must not be moved in this matter by any unreasonable or exaggerated estimate of its importance. I agree in that recommendation of the noble Lord, but from a very different point of view, and from very different reasons. In my opinion, we should be dwarfing the true proportions of this question if we were to look upon it as one which regarded simply our own collected personality, or as one dealing alone with our own rights, which we were entitled to maintain or surrender at our discretion. The rights with which we are dealing to-night are not our own, they are the rights of the people. And let hon. Members look to the language of those old precedents; they are the rights of the true Commons, they are the rights of the people of this country, of whom we are the

Representatives, without whom we have no being, and which rights it is our duty and our special function to maintain and to defend; and what I ask the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth is this,—at what juncture in the history of this House is it that an endeavour has been made to tempt us from the performance of that duty? What has this House been about of late? One of its latest acts has been to refuse its assent to a measure having for its object the widening and popularizing of our electoral system. This House does not need reform, it says. It already fully represents the intelligence, the opinions, and the rights of the people of this country, and it represents them with an independence which might be vainly expected from a Parliament elected under a degraded suffrage. Now, I ask the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, what becomes of that plea of independence if we surrender rights which we have maintained for centuries, and what becomes of that claim already efficiently to represent the people of this country if we are about to surrender their very birthright, which has been committed to us for safe keeping and defence. Sir, some short time ago a Minister of the Crown rose in his place in this House to announce the withdrawal—under the pressure of a necessity for which he was in no wise responsible—a Minister of the Crown rose in his place to announce the withdrawal of a measure of Parliamentary Reform. An admirable discipline—such a discipline as we have seen a different example of to-day,—an admirable discipline restrained the rising cheers in the ranks of Her Majesty's Opposition. But, Sir, those who watched that scene as I did, might have perceived, as the announcement was being made, a smile of peculiar intelligence sweep like a sudden gleam of sunshine over the sea of faces which from those places looked expectant upon the noble Lord. A party ruse had been successful. Yielding to the tempting opportunity afforded by defections in the Ministerial ranks, and making use of the obstructive services of hon. Members who may some day or other find it no easy task to reconcile such services with the votes which repudiated as unworthy of consideration a former Reform Bill, and which ejected the former Ministry from office—yielding to such temptations, I say that a party triumph was sought and was gained. But what a triumph! and at what a cost! I confess, Sir, that it seems to me to marvel at the shallowness and at the heedlessness of a Conservative policy, whose very success consisted in the postponement of that question of Reform to those more troubled times of which the Conservative leaders were the first and the loudest to herald the approach, of which success was purchased at the very price of lowering the character of this House for earnestness and sincerity in the public mind.

Mr. Stansfeld

Now, Sir, I ask whether we are to have a repetition of such a policy in order to gain a temporary party triumph for a special financial view, or, it may be, for the gratification of a passing reaction against a single person. I ask whether we are to witness a repetition of that policy, and whether the character of this House is to be again lowered in the public mind, and proof to be afforded out of doors that this House does not at present efficiently and with independence maintain the rights of the people of this country. I do trust that we are to witness no such policy. I venture to ask the House upon this great occasion to cast aside altogether party considerations and objects of minor importance. I ask them to rise to the "height of this great argument." Let the House remember that we are making history to-night. We are about to maintain or to surrender a part of the constitutional rights of the oldest, the freest, and the greatest representative assembly in the world. The precedent of 1860, whether we will or no—for good or for ill, to our honour or to our shame, is about to take its place in the inevitable historic page by the side of those older and greater precedents which have been laid before us, and which are the laurels and traditions of our past. I entreat this House so to act as not to tarnish those laurels. I entreat this House so to act as to be faithful to those great traditions, as efficiently to re-assert and to defend the rights of the people of this country, and to maintain the privileges and enhance the character and the dignity of this House.

MR. DISRAELI: I should be extremely unwilling, Sir, that the House should come to a vote upon this subject without expressing to the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown, both upon my own part, and I am sure on the part of all hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House, our sense of the able, patriotic, and constitutional speech with which he has introduced these Resolutions to our consideration. And, Sir, when the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down calls upon us to consider this question not in a party spirit—when he adjures us to rise to the “height of this great argument,” and to divest ourselves of all party considerations in its discussion, I am gratified that it falls to my lot in the first sentence I presume to utter, to offer to the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown, whose general policy I oppose, the sincere tribute of my adhesion on this occasion.

When, Sir, the real privileges of the House of Commons are assailed or questioned, I can tell the noble Lord, if he be then the leader of his party in this House, that he will not appeal in vain to us to uphold those privileges, or to support him in their vindication; as also I can with equal sincerity assure him, that if there be an attempt in the course of the proceedings of the two Houses of Parliament to raise some artificial agitation, occasioned perhaps by the necessity of satisfying the wounded vanity or gratifying the distempered ambition of some individual, the First Minister might appeal with the same success for us to support him under these circumstances, and vindicate that course which is necessary to uphold the welfare of this country. Sir, the noble Lord has to-night acknowledged—had it not been for circumstances which have since occurred, I should have said on the part of the Government—that the course taken by the House of Lords with reference to the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duties was one which the state of the law justified and authorized them to adopt. Now, Sir, if the law of the country justified and authorized such conduct on the part of the other House of Parliament, there is at once an end to any question of the privileges of this House. A privilege that cannot be asserted ceases to be a privilege, and is only a pretence; and those who remember what occurred only twenty years ago, when this House attempted to assert a privilege which was contrary to the law of the country, will not, I think, with any hope of success, counsel the House again to adopt a course which was replete with so much disaster, and so humiliating to the dignity of this Assembly.

But, Sir, the noble Lord was not content with simply acknowledging that the conduct of the House of Lords was justified by law; he has manfully confessed that it was sanctioned by policy. What then, is conduct justified by law and sanctioned by policy—is that conduct which you are compelled to admit is the observance of the law, and the pursuit of a course which policy approves, to be made the ground and basis of your calling upon us to assert that our privileges have been violated, and our due authority questioned? If the privileges of the House of Commons can only be vindicated by opposing that which law justifies and policy sanctions, I fear that we shall hardly be able to recommend to our constituents the character of those privileges, or to induce them to support them with the spirit which the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down contemplates and desires. It may be said, “If the conduct of the House of Lords in this respect be such as the Chief of the Government has thus publicly announced, what necessity is there for the Resolutions which we are to-night called upon to vote?” When this misunderstanding was first noticed in this House, had any one in authority come forward and laid before the House the nature of the case, and had indicated the precedents that had formerly been established and pursued, we might then have illustrated the present position of things, and have obtained facts and arguments to justify that illustration; and then, Sir, I do not think it would have been necessary for this House to come to these Resolutions. I think that if the question had been then debated with sufficient learning and deliberation—with sufficient calmness and clearness—we might then have avoided a state of affairs which all must confess to be unsatisfactory; but, Sir, when a perplexed House of Commons, rashly and hastily I think, determined to appoint a Select Committee to search for precedents—when you placed upon that Committee the most considerable Members of this House—when they devoted for that purpose all their energies and attention for a considerable period of time, and when they formally reported to this House the result of their investigation, it seemed to me impossible that this House should escape from a formal expression of the conclusions to which that investigation had led them; and I further think it was impossible, after appointing that Committee, that Resolutions for the acceptance of this House should not have been laid upon the table.

Now, Sir, what are these Resolutions? Under other circumstances I might be inclined to cavil at some of the expressions employed in these Resolutions. A word here and there might, I think, be critically noticed. The composition which has attracted the attention of some hon. Members, might be dwelt upon in the spirit of Aristarchus; but after the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and after the large view which he has taken of the whole question, it would be quite unbecoming on my part to enter upon such verbal trifling.

There are, Sir, three Resolutions before us, I doubt not with a distinct purpose. The first is an assertion of our privileges, copied from ancient precedents in the Journals of this House, and claims the sole right of Supply to Her Majesty. That Resolution has been criticised by the highest constitutional authorities. Mr. Hallam, himself a high Whig, has noticed in his Constitutional History the very language which the noble Lord has adopted in his first Resolution; and he notices it as one that cannot be precisely vindicated or proved. That we have the "sole right of granting aids and Supplies to the Crown" which is the language, I think, of the original Resolution, and which is here equivalently expressed, is an assertion that cannot be maintained by a House which, when it carries a Bill of Supply, in that very Bill states that the Supply can only be granted with the assent of the House of Lords. But, Sir, it would be unwise at a moment like the present when, although our privileges may really not be assailed, many think, from the representations that have been made, that they are endangered, to make use of language which might be more accurately precise, but which, to the vulgar ear, might seem to make a modified claim of privilege compared with that put forth by our predecessors. Therefore, I think upon the whole, although precisely and critically you could not word for word vindicate the assertion which is embodied in the first Resolution, it is proper after all that we should adhere to that old language which was used on great, critical, and solemn occasions by our predecessors, and not seem to bate one single inch of the ground which has always been taken by this House on the subject.

In short, Sir, the first Resolution, as far as the constitutional, and I would say the classical, assertion of our privileges is concerned, is one with which I cannot in any way find fault. The second Resolution is an admission—to my mind a legal, proper, and constitutional admission—of the right of the Lords to reject Bills of Supply; and although there may be expressions in it which some may feel disposed to criticise, such as the statement that the exercise of the right on their part has not been frequent, as if in the nature of things it would be frequent, and that on all occasions such an exercise would be viewed with jealousy by this House, as if it ought not to be viewed with jealousy; still it appears to me that the second Resolution is one—containing, as it does, not a qualified, but an absolute acknowledgment of the right of the Lords to reject Bills "on the whole," the propriety of which could not by any one sitting on this side of the House for a moment be questioned.

Mr. Disraeli

I now come to the third Resolution, which seems to give such consolation to hon. Gentlemen opposite below the gangway. I have read the Resolution with the attention it deserves, and I find it embodies a suggestion made in the last two paragraphs of the draught Report of the Chairman of the late Committee upon Precedents.—That Chairman, whose ability the noble Lord at the head of the Government has candidly acknowledged, and whose moderate and safe opinions upon all political subjects must be admired, I think, even by those who do not agree with him. If hon. Members will only look at the two last paragraphs in the draught Report of the Chairman—paragraphs that were not admitted into the Report that was presented to the House—they will find the suggestions which form the gist and marrow of the third Resolution. We threw them out in the Committee, generally upon the ground that our expression of opinion should not be admitted into our Report, and those paragraphs expressed an opinion. There were, however, some Members of the Committee, to whom I shall not particularly refer, who were opposed to the admission of these paragraphs upon other and perhaps higher grounds. They thought they took too low and desponding a view of the privileges of this House. So, Sir, what with the general desire not to admit an expression of opinion on the subject, and the objection of some Members who thought that the view of those two paragraphs of the privileges of this House was of too desponding a character, these, as I thought at the time, unhappy paragraphs of the Chairman, were omitted. But little did I think that they would be so elevated in public, and even in Ministerial estimation, that they would become the basis of that third Resolution which, as I said before, has been the source of so much solace.

I admit, under circumstances of some adversity to hon. Gentlemen opposite.

The House will see that I may be able, from my knowledge of the two paragraphs in question, to throw some light on those mysterious modes by which in the third Resolution we are told that we have it in our power to vindicate our privileges, and that, in fact, it will be our own fault if those privileges are ever successfully assailed. I may say; in passing, that it is rather unfortunate, considering the tone taken by hon. Gentlemen below the gangway, that they should find their only satisfaction to-night in a Resolution which, in vindicating their privileges against the rude assault of the Lords, admits that those privileges have been endangered by the laches and negligence of the House of Commons itself. The Chairman of the late Committee in those omitted paragraphs—the only paragraphs of his draught Report which expressed an opinion and afforded remedial counsel—showed that this House had unwisely parted with its due command over the annual taxation of the country by converting annual taxes into taxes for a term; and he indicated that there were modes by which we might vindicate our ancient privileges by including the whole financial system of the year in one Bill. But it is not the House of Lords that has converted our annual taxation into a permanent taxation. It is not the House of Lords that has made that dangerous assault upon the privileges of the House of Commons. It is the Ministers in the House of Commons that have made these proposals, and it is a willing House of Commons that has sanctioned them. Probably it may be said that they were Tory Ministers, who presumed to propose and who dared to accomplish such gigantic innovations. But it was nothing of the kind. The last and greatest innovation of the kind occurred under a Whig Ministry, presided over by a statesman who had the honour and, as I think, the high privilege of sitting in the House of Commons. The Chief Minister in 1846–7 sat in this House as the Chief Minister does now, and it was the noble Lord the Member for the City of London, whose devotion to the privileges of this House is not questioned, and whose reputation for constitutional learning and constitutional spirit all will admit—who in proposing that our annual sugar taxes, to the amount of more than £5,000,000, should become perpetual, himself, by that proposition lessened our command over the resources of the country, and diminished proportionately our ability to vindicate our privileges. I shall, however, do the noble Lord the justice to admit that, when he made that proposition he accompanied it by a distinct statement that he acknowledged the importance and absolute necessity of the House of Commons exercising a due and efficient control over the annual taxation of the country, though he thought there were peculiar reasons, and I admit them, in the state of the sugar trade at that moment. It was a moment when great changes were taking place in our Colonies, and when the question of protection to those Colonies had assumed a character that demanded the attention of this House—why the sugar duties should become a source of permanent taxation; and he added the declaration, if not the pledge, that he would substitute for that branch of taxation annual taxes to an equivalent amount over which the House of Commons should exercise its accustomed and beneficial control.

Well, Sir, the noble Lord was never able while he continued Minister (although he was Prime Minister for six years) to fulfil that pledge. It has been my lot upon more than one occasion to call on the noble Lord to remember that pledge. I entirely acquit the noble Lord of any negligence in the matter; he yielded to the insuperable difficulties of the case. In this country there are not only constitutional Liberals, but there are commercial Liberals. The constitutional Liberals were ready to have a control over the annual revenue of the country. The commercial Liberals and many of those who now must loudly call upon us to assert the privileges of this House, exercised such a pressure over the Minister of that day that for commercial purposes the control of this House over its annual taxation was lost.

This, then, is one of the mysterious modes in which we are for the future to vindicate our privileges when they are assailed. But I ask the commercial Liberals whether they are prepared to allow the sugar duties, the tea duties, or the malt duties to become a source of annual taxation. I have no doubt the noble Lord and many of his colleagues who love commerce well, but who love the Constitution more, may be disposed, if the House would encourage them, to restore to it its ancient control over the revenue. But, Sir, I doubt very much whether the Gentlemen who have spoken so loudly this evening in favour of our privileges would be prepared to support a Minister who should propose this important change in the mode of levying the taxation of the country.

I now come, Sir, to the second method of defending our rights suggested by my right hon. Friend, and, I take it, adopted in the Resolution—that is by insisting that the whole of our financial scheme shall be embodied in one Bill. We do not—at least I for one and the Prime Minister for another—do not question the right of the House of Lords to reject such a Bill; but of course the responsibility of such a step would, under these circumstances, be greatly enhanced, and the difficulty of disturbing the financial arrangements of the House of Commons proportionately increased. For my own part, Sir, I have no objection to such a course; I should have liked, for example, that that course should have been pursued this year; I should have liked to have had the whole scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in one Bill; I should have liked to have seen the additional two-pence of income tax set down in the same Bill that was to repeal the duties on paper. Such a proceeding would have afforded us, no doubt, an opportunity for deliberation very different from the manner in which the financial measures of the Government were carried in that unhappy first month of the present Session, which we all now so bitterly and deeply repent. Is there any one present who believes that the scheme of the Minister if embodied in one comprehensive measure would have met with success. No. Not even in the frenzy of March, when we were as mad as individuals sometimes are in that month—as mad as March hares—not even then would the scheme have been passed. There are the constitutional methods pointed out in this somewhat mysterious third Resolution which were copied from the draft Report of our right hon. Chairman. There are the two constitutional methods which afford such relief to the perplexed Liberal party. You want action—this is the action that awaits you. Of these two courses, one at least must be repugnant to your great principles, and the other destroys all the schemes of the Minister whom you particularly support. I see nothing to object to in that third Resolution, and for an additional reason. The principles and policy which I strove to assert during the whole course of the Committee are embodied and expressed in this Resolution. I tried with,

Mr. Disraeli

I am glad to say, a majority of the Committee to vindicate the just privileges of the House of Commons. I tried to uphold the constitutional truths which rendered them independent of the other House of Parliament. I tried to recall to the attention of the Committee that in our modern practice the House of Commons had unfortunately lost its ancient and due control over the annual taxation of the country.

Well, then, if I find that this third Resolution expresses my views, why am I not at liberty to support it? It appears, however, that we are not to enjoy this privilege. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has made a violent attack upon us because we support the Government. "It is outrageous," says the right hon. Gentleman. "What! does a party that calls itself Conservative presume to support a Government of which I am a Member?" "I call upon you," exclaims the right hon. Gentleman, "to interfere in this matter, because a gigantic innovation has been perpetrated."

Now, Sir, I listened with great attention, and with the utmost gratification to the mature speech which has fallen from the noble Lord the head of the Government, which commenced these proceedings, and which I accepted as the wise, calm, and ample declaration of a Cabinet that had carefully and deliberately considered this important subject. I heard from the noble Lord that the House of Lords had, in the opinion of the Government, not only acted in a manner by law permitted and justified, but in accord and consonance with no less than thirty-six precedents. Now, Sir, it seems extraordinary to me that a body that acted in accordance with the authority of no fewer than thirty-six precedents, that that conduct should be described very shortly afterwards by the colleague of the First Minister as a gigantic and dangerous innovation. But the noble Lord did more than this. He made this most important communication to the House—which I believe will be a source of great satisfaction and comfort to the country to-morrow—that it was not the intention of the Government to attempt to reverse the decision of the House of Lords with regard to the paper duty. But what says the Chancellor of the Exchequer? He says:—

"I am going to support the Resolutions which in my opinion are utterly unfit and inadequate, because I take them as I have taken other things before, in a non-natural sense, and because, inasmuch as they are utterly passive, it necessarily ensues that they are to be followed by action."

Now, Sir, I should like to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or if not from him, not from some of his colleagues, because it is possible they may not agree with him, but from some more sympathising Member of the House who may follow in this debate—I should like to know of what the action is to consist? what is the course contemplated, and what are the views to be accomplished? Because, I myself, though I am entirely approving of the course which the Government pursued, although I think the statement of the noble Lord was dignified, impartial, and statesmanlike, equal to the occasion, and one which will give satisfaction to the country, still I have that respectful sympathy for hon. Gentlemen opposite, which one cannot help feeling for men you are in the habit of acting with, although you may not share their opinions and agree with them exactly in the case under our consideration—I want to know what balm there is for their tortured feelings? I want to know whether they may not all this time be labouring under some temporary hallucination? I want to spare them the remorse of to-morrow, when, after having summed up the wonderful experience of this night they discover that they have received only a word and not a remedy, and that action, like the action of Demosthenes, thrice repeated, may mean nothing more than what I believe the correct Greek version expresses, namely, a skilful gesture.

Well, Sir, I maintain that the charge of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is utterly untenable and has no foundation. I say with the views which we entertain, and the entire approval that we give to the course of the noble Lord, it was not our duty to oppose the Resolution which we wish to support. Leaving then the right hon. Gentleman answered, I think satisfactorily upon that point, let me for a moment contemplate the position of those whom I suppose I may still, if only in courtesy, call the great Liberal party. Now, Sir, the conduct of that party to-night, especially in the attacks they made on this side of the House—the repeated wonderment which they have expressed at our taking no part in the debate, when really we thought it might have been closed hours ago with the unanimous feeling of the House—seems to me very extraordinary, even if they themselves had been prepared to second their speeches by actions so much wanted. But, Sir, that does not appear to be the case. I remember very often in old days the ridicule that has been thrown on some unhappy Member who on an important occasion has given notice of an Amendment, and who when the House was full, and its pulse beat high, and the atmosphere was loaded with rhetoric and excitement, surprised the House by withdrawing his Amendment. I have always considered that one of the most perilous and perhaps one of the most absurd positions in which an hon. Member can be placed. But now there is not one but three. There are three Richmonds in the field. There are three Amendments, and strange to say, the same sad destiny to suicide which awaited them all. That three hon. Gentlemen should be rash enough to propose Amendments is strange; but that three Gentlemen having determined to take such a course should be equally prepared to follow it up by one that must cover them with absurdity, is perhaps one of the strangest events that ever happened in the House of Commons. But what are more wonderful even than the three Amendments are the reasons given for withdrawing them. They are Amendments to the Resolutions on the table of the House, and because, to use the language of hon. Gentlemen opposite, who belong to what is called the great Liberal party, the Resolutions are mean, impotent, express nothing, and are altogether so inadequate to the occasion that it is necessary to meet to-morrow to consider what is to be done, therefore they are going to vote for the Resolutions. That is a course which is extremely perplexing to comprehend. But see the aggregate of the circumstances that render the position of these hon. Gentlemen contradictory, inconsistent, incoherent, and I might even say absurd. It is that they have had the whole debate to themselves. It is not that they have not enjoyed the opportunity, that they have not availed themselves of the occasion to vindicate their course and to explain it, in the words of the hon. Gentleman who preceded me in the debate with absolute lucidity. Every advantage that men could have in demonstration, illustration, and repetition they have had, and the only consequence of the monopoly of the debate which a party professing free trade principles have enjoyed is that, being unaccustomed to monopoly, they know not how to deal with that portentous implement. Having, however, had the whole debate to themselves, and having conducted it with an ability still more remarkable, because they have not had the advantage of replying to any one, they have so managed affairs that they have brought forward three Amendments and withdrawn them because those Resolutions are in their opinion mean, inadequate, and imbecile. I forgot to do justice to the hon. Member for Banbury: for besides the three Amendments, the hon. Gentleman, with an ingenuousness which, considering the circumstances appeared to be marvellous—the hon. Member for Banbury informed us that he also had prepared an Amendment, but had not thought fit to place it on the table of the House. I think, Sir, the hon. Member must have blessed his stars for his prudence, and I think he has very good cause.

Now, Sir, I have touched with the impartiality which the noble Lord claimed for himself to-night on the unjust remarks on the conduct of Her Majesty's Opposition. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, not satisfied with answering the Prime Minister, fell foul of the Opposition, because they did not follow him and assist him in the unseemly fray. The organized opposition below the gangway apparently not yet experienced in opposition, trembling over their own Amendments and getting up successfully answers to themselves—not satisfied with the result of the debate, can do nothing else to get themselves out of the scrape, but turn round and abuse the Opposition on account of their silence. There are moments, Sir, when silence is, I think, the better part of valour. Fine things, indeed, might be said of the virtue of silence, and I recommend hon. Gentlemen to consult the Greek sages and Greek poets, and they will find how inconsistent is the course pursued by hon. Gentlemen opposite in their unauthorised attacks upon hon. Gentlemen here for their silence. But that attack never in my mind assumed a form of grosser injustice than in the speech of the hon. Gentleman who preceded me. He deplored the loss of the Reform Bill, and attributed that loss either to the silence or the speeches (for he spoke rather ambiguously) of the Opposition. And then the hon. Gentlemen read us a great lecture, dealing with the future with all that liberality which distinguishes the prophets of the new school, and fastening on our heads the defeat of that measure of Reform, for the discomfiture of which he said the noble Lord the Member for the City of London was blameless. But is it true that the Reform Bill was defeated either by the silence or the speeches of the Opposition? Why, there were troops of orators on the other side who opposed the Bill, and not the least eloquent of those who distinguished themselves on that occasion was a young Knight who won his spurs with great distinction, and who to-night maintained that reputation with an ability which I am only too glad to acknowledge. Who was that hon. Gentleman? It was the hon. Gentleman who preceded me in the debate. The hon. Member said he should vote for the Government measure, and he made an able speech to show that it was a most inadequate and injurious measure. I believe that the hon. Member has taken the same course upon both these questions. What the hon. Member wanted was something that would lead to action; and I think he will observe there will be about as much action on these Resolutions as there was on the late Reform Bill.

Mr. Disraeli

MR. STANSFELD: Sir, I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but I feel it my duty to explain to the House that the right hon. Gentleman has misrepresented what I said on both the occasions to which he has been referring. It will be in the recollection of hon. Members who were present on these occasions that I said that I intended to support the measure of the Government, but that I went further than that which was expressed in the measure of the Government, and it will also be in the recollection of the House that I did not attribute the loss of the Bill entirely to the speeches of hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House, but I attributed the loss of that Bill partly to defections in the ranks of the liberal party. I only feel it an act of justice to myself to make this explanation in reference to the remarks which the right hon. Gentleman has just addressed to the House.

MR. DISRAELI: I confess, Sir, I did not expect to hear another speech on the Reform Bill in the present Session. I am sorry if I have misapprehended the hon. Gentleman, but it is not very material to the case.

Well, Sir, I venture to express the hope that I have stated the reasons which induce me and those who sit near me to give our cordial support to the Government on this occasion. It would have been just as well not to have had a Committee of precedents, and then we should not have needed any Resolutions. It is, however, of no use to regret the past. The Committee on their part have done their duty, and have placed before us a Report of great value. It will be an addition to our library, the value of which cannot be over-estimated; the Resolutions are a necessary consequence of that Committee. I think that these Resolutions express a temperate and wise course on the part of this House. If they vindicate the privileges of this House in language which may be criticised for its precision, but which is still language used by our predecessors on memorable occasions, and if they assert more than they practically maintain, I should still think it unwise to alter language of which the popular interpretation is one favourable to the maintenance of the just privileges of the House of Commons.

I think that the second Resolution, with all its qualified terms, admits distinctly and deliberately the power of the House of Lords to reject Money Bills; and no other power for a moment have I claimed. They have not the power to originate, alter, or amend Money Bills, but the power to reject Money Bills must be theirs, or the Constitution of England, of which we hear so much, must instantly change.

We have heard, Sir, very much of late of new principles of taxation of very dangerous import in my mind, but which, fortunately for this country, will no longer be submitted to a new Parliament elected by a new and inexperienced constituency. But, if new principles of taxation ever come into fashion, I will suppose for a moment the House of Commons passing a Money Bill which taxes at a higher rate the estates of the House of Lords. Are we to maintain that the House of Lords are not to have the power of rejecting that Bill, and that it may not alter or amend it. A Bill may then pass this House which lays a peculiar and large charge on the estates of the House of Lords, for such Bills have passed before, and we are now told that the House of Lords would be deprived of the security they possess against an unjust imposition of taxation which all feel to be the greatest grievance. I think the second Resolution, distinctly acknowledging the right of the House of Lords to reject Money Bills, is a Resolution which we, as a Conservative party, ought to support.

Then, Sir, the third Resolution, though vaguely, and from the nature of the subject, necessarily vaguely expressed, is only an intimation of a recurrence to those constitutional courses in fiscal subjects and money affairs which I think it would well become this House to consider whether it might not adopt. If any proposition of that kind be made to the House I anticipate from Gentlemen opposite much more opposition to it than from Gentlemen on this side of the House.

That, then, being the nature of the three Resolutions, I ask the House whether it is not our duty not only to support, but to support cheerfully the Minister who has proposed them, and who in making the proposition has made it in a spirit equal to the occasion, and free from all party and petty considerations? One observation has been made to-night which I cannot pass entirely unnoticed; for if the policy which many hon. Gentlemen opposite have recommended were to prevail, the critical influence of a Senate on subjects of finance would entirely cease, and it becomes a question whether the absence of such critical influence is in harmony with the rest of our Constitution, and might not be extremely injurious to the public welfare. The hon. Member for Birmingham was reminded to-night when my right hon. Friend spoke, that the Senate of America has the power of rejecting Money Bills, and not only that, but of altering and amending them. The hon. Member for Birmingham immediately said across the floor that that is an elected body.

Now, a very important consideration occurs. If it be advisable that some control, modified, and wisely fenced in as it is by the privileges of this House, should be exercised by what we call the Senate of this country over the popular branch of the Legislature with respect to money matters, are we to conclude that that control can only be entrusted to an elected Senate? Thus, the hon. Member for Birmingham and his friends have changed the issue before us, and what we really then have to consider is, if we have a Senate, whether it should be an elected or an hereditary one. Now, Sir, I am in favour of maintaining the hereditary Senate of this country. I would not entrust the large powers which the Senate of America possesses, and of which the hon. Gentleman reminds us, to any elected body. Whatever control the House of Lords possesses in matters of finance, I wish it to possess as an hereditary body, while we guard ourselves against any undue or unwise exercise of that control by the privileges of the House of Commons — privileges acknowledged for centuries, and which, whenever assailed, we find ourselves able to uphold and vindicate. The test of privilege is that it can be asserted. The hon. Member for Birmingham will pardon me for this reference, because he told me that when it was said that he wanted to Americanize the institutions of this country he did not know what the expression meant. To-night the hon. Member has explained what he meant; it is a Senate that should be elected, and not hereditary; and now that the consideration of the question has been introduced, I trust that the House, by supporting the Government Resolutions, will show that it is prepared to uphold the privileges not only of this House, but of all the estates of the realm, which the Constitution has hitherto acknowledged, and under which this country has so eminently flourished.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I must, in the first place, express, on the behalf of the Government, their gratitude for the support given by the right hon. Gentleman to my noble Friend's Resolution and speech; and, Sir, I may, at the same time, vindicate my noble Friend's speech and Resolutions from the interpretation which the right hon. Gentleman has been pleased to put upon them. Now, Sir, no doubt the right hon. Gentleman is in a position of considerable difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman, as a Member of this House, and as leading a great number of Gentlemen on the Opposition side, can hardly abandon any of the ancient rights or privileges of this House. But Lord Derby is connected with the right hon. Gentleman; and so, on the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman can hardly abandon Lord Derby in the course he has thought proper to pursue.

Now, Sir, in consequence of this position, the right hon. Gentleman, I think, has placed an interpretation on my noble Friend's words which they do not bear. The right hon. Gentleman said that my noble Friend had admitted that the act of the House of Lords, in rejecting the Paper Duty Repeal Bill, was not only justified by law, but by constitutional usage. My noble Friend must know the danger of candour exhibited towards an adversary; and a greater proof of that could not be afforded, than by what has taken place to-night. What my noble Friend said was, that with respect to the technical right of rejecting any Bill that may come before the House of Lords, there could be no question that that right belonged to the House of Lords. So far as the technical right goes, my noble Friend, no doubt, made that admission; but with respect to the policy, my noble Friend, going as far as possible in charity to the opposition which the Paper Duty Repeal Bill met with, said that he believed that the majority of the House of Lords that defeated that Bill, did not so because they wished to take a general power over the finances of the country, but because, in this particular case, they conceived themselves justified by policy. That was, I submit, Sir, giving them the utmost credit for the motives by which they were governed; but it was very different from saying that, in my noble Friend's opinion, policy justified the course pursued by the House of Lords; because, if that had been his opinion, the President of the Council would hardly have been the person to propose the Bill to the House of Lords. But the right hon. Gentleman, taking advantage of the statement of my noble Friend, has contended that not only was the House of Lords justified in what it has done within the technical confines of law, but also that it was justified by custom.

Mr. Disraeli

I must say, Sir, that for 200 years there is no instance of the House of Lords having exercised such a power as that which it exerted on a recent occasion. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Resolutions, and gave the House his own interpretation of them. The first Resolution points out that the right of granting aid and Supplies to the Crown is an essential part of the Constitution. The grants in aid to the Crown are not in this country in the form of imposing taxes. There is no power in the Crown of imposing taxes; neither is there any such power in the House of Lords: but there is in the Commons the power of granting a part of that which is their own. If that be the case, then, what a strange anomaly it is that from the 15th of August next a tax of more than £1,000,000 a year is to be levied, not on the authority of the Commons, or of the Crown, but on the authority of the House of Lords alone. The right hon. Gentleman says the second Resolution admits the power of the Lords to do what they have done; but at the same time it states that the exercise of that power has always been regarded with peculiar jealousy. Why, I ask, with peculiar jealousy? If the Lords have done what is quite right and usual, and if there be many precedents for what they have done, surely there is no reason for jealousy? But, Sir, we regard these acts of the Lords with peculiar jealousy, because they are not usual; and because they are not the proper functions of the Lords. The House of Commons have it in their power to reject the Mutiny Bill; and if we were to do so, no one could say we had gone beyond our powers; but that would be an act of very great indiscretion on our part, unless it were done under circumstances of overwhelming danger; such as the Sovereign attempting, by means of a standing army, to put down the liberties of the people. In such circumstances only would the Act be justifiable. That, Sir, is the way in which I view this Act of the House of Lords. It is one that could only be justified by very extraordinary circumstances. If this had occurred when the Duke of Wellington was leader of the House of Lords, I should have believed that there was in his mind some extraordinary case of necessity that led him to take such a course. He would only have been led to do it from what he considered the peculiar circumstances of the case; but as the House of Lords is now led, I have no such confidence. I believe, on the contrary, that this is a rash and unjustifiable proceeding, and which may be followed by others unless the House of Commons should interpose.

The right hon. Gentleman, moreover, says we rashly and hastily appointed a Committee to search for precedents. Then why did not the right hon. Gentleman oppose the appointment of that Committee? The right hon. Gentleman, seeing nothing extraordinary or unjustifiable in the rejection of the Paper Duty Repeal Bill, should have said that there was no call for the appointment of any such Committee. But he took no such course. The appointment of a Committee was in itself a declaration that something extraordinary and unusual had occurred, and that the House of Lords had stepped out of the usual path of the Constitution; but it is only now that we hear the right hon. Gentleman describing the appointment of that Committee as a rash and hasty measure. Certainly it was rashly and hastily done if it were true that the House of Lords have only done what is usual, and acted within the rule of the Constitution; for in such a case there could be no need for the appointment of any Committee. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whiteside) has animadverted on the circumstance that so much stress has been laid on the amount of the tax proposed to be remitted. Now, Sir, we can easily understand that on questions affecting a very small amount of taxation—as, for example, the duty on salt used for manure—the House of Commons may have allowed the interference of the Lords to pass on account of the insignificance of the sum; but when it comes to be a question of upwards of a million, we are bound to consider the question seriously. If the House of Lords reject a Bill for relieving taxation to the extent of £1,000,000, may they not do so to the extent of £10,000,000? And might they not have rejected the whole of the £70,000,000 of taxes that have been remitted since the year 1815? If the House of Lords have power to do that, then it is a total change in our Constitution. It would be an entirely new form of Government under which we now live, but one in which the House of Lords, having no representative character, would have the power of taxing the people; and it would be an overturning of the state of things that has existed not for 200, but for 400 years. The right hon. Gentleman says the last paragraph is, in fact, little more than the last paragraph of the Report as drawn up by the Chairman of the Committee. There is, however, I maintain, a great distinction between them. I myself found fault with the last paragraph of the proposed Report of the Chairman, because I thought it would have appeared to give up all our powers, and left the House of Commons in a state of dependency.

But, Sir, the Resolution, as it stands, affirms that this House has the power to guard for the future against an undue exercise of the power claimed by the House of Lords; that, in short, the power is completely in the hands of the House of Commons. That, of course, means a great deal. It means, Sir, that the House of Lords may, in the future, resort to an undue exercise of power; and that if they do, the House of Commons has the means to prevent that undue exercise of power. It would have been unwise to state in detail what are the means by which that power may be exercised. Some Gentlemen may have one opinion, and others another on this point; but it is quite clear that in one way or other the House of Commons has the means, when it thinks proper, to vindicate its rights and privileges.

The first question, Sir, with us is, whether the House of Commons has always had this control over the taxation of the country; and the second is, whether it is right that we should retain it. The hon. Member for Birmingham proposed to the Committee a statement that contained the usual practice. It is the duty of the Sovereign to ask for a Supply, and it is the duty of the House of Commons to furnish that Supply. The Speaker carries to the Sovereign, in the House of Lords, the Bill which provides for that Supply. Naymore, the House of Lords, on sending down for the Estimates, has been refused those Estimates by this House. A very remarkable case occurred in 1786, when Mr. Pitt was Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was proposed that a quarter of a million should be applied every three months to the redemption of the National Debt, and there was a question in the House of Lords whether any such surplus was likely to arise. It was argued that the real surplus of the year was not £1,000,000, but only £25,000; and it was said there, "In order to be able to judge of the matter, let us send to the House of Commons for the documents showing the expenditure and the income; the mode in which the £1,000,000 is expected to accrue, otherwise, instead of having a surplus of that amount, we may have a deficiency of more than £900,000 to make up." If the House of Lords had been made the judge of the expenditure, and of the sums necessary to be raised for the maintenance of the national credit, nothing could have been fairer and more natural than the proposal; but as soon as the message came to the House, Mr. Pitt proposed an answer by which this House refused to give any information.

I believe, therefore, that according to all former practice of the Constitution, the whole question of granting is in the House of Commons. As Lord Chatham said, "We give and grant what is our own." We balance the expenditure with the revenue. If the House of Lords have any doubt upon that, they ought to rely in confidence on the House of Commons that any such deficiency will be made good. That was the manner in which the Duke of Wellington and the majority of the House of Lords acted in 1839. A deficiency may be had for the House of Commons; it may be had for the Minister; but it was not for the Lords, upon their own calculation, to supply what they think a deficiency. But would it be any improvement for the House of Lords to have that power? The right hon. Gentleman opposite quoted a passage from Lord Macaulay, in which he expressed an opinion that that would not excite any great amount of discontent amongst the people at large. That may be quite true; but I do not think that such a change could exist for a year, nor for six months probably without exciting the greatest discontent. Suppose the House of Commons next year reduced the wine duties. The merchant would import his wines, great consumption would take place; but if the Lords were to say it is not fitting to make that change, and were to refuse to sanction it, the whole commerce in wine would be thrown into confusion. It is impossible that such things could take place without the whole commerce of the country being disturbed. I suppose it would hardly be said that we should not have a concurrent power, that the sole power of taxing should be in the House of Lords; but I believe, Sir, that that would be a far better change than that the two Houses should have a concurrent control of the finances. It is, therefore, not only true that with regard to all past time, ever since our Constitution was a Constitution, we have had this power of regulating the finances; but it is true likewise that if we were to part with this power—if the House of Lords were to be admitted into partnership in it, the consequences must be utter confusion in our finances. The remission or imposition of taxation would be in a perpetual state of uncertainty; each House would endeavour to take off the tax which was most unpopular, thereby to gain for themselves popular credit and applause, and the popular sympathies of the country.

Lord John Russell

Then, Sir, as to the question of the indifference of public feeling on this question, I say it is because our powers and functions are considered settled and safe, that so little alarm is felt as to our maintaining our rights against the Lords. It was only the other day that I read that when a question of privilege arose on Charles I. coming to ask for the five Members, some 5,000 men came from Buckinghamshire, in order to defend their Member against any breach of privilege in his person. The right hon. Gentleman the present Member for Bucks needs no such escort; he and the other Members of this House are quite secure in their persons. The difference is this—that at that time our privilege was supposed to be in danger; at the present time it is believed to be perfectly safe.

But, Sir, although that is the case, it is our business to see that there is not a change in the Constitution, according to which the power of the House of Commons to give, and grant, and regulate the finances of the country should be transferred from the House of Commons to the Senate, which is a non-elected body. That is not the case in America, because those who exercise the power there are either directly or indirectly representatives of the people or of those who represent the people. The only Constitution with which I am acquainted under which that practice prevails is the Constitution of Prussia, where the Estimates and the expenditure are laid before the Senate, and voted by them; but no such Constitution, of course, could be adopted in this country.

The right hon. Gentleman in the latter part of his speech alluded to some new plan of taxation, by which landed property particularly was to be made to bear the whole burden of taxation. Whatever plans of the sort may be proposed for the future, that, at least, is not the case of the history of the present year. What we have been doing for many years past has been to diminish the Excise and Customs duties, and, at the same time, to provide means for the service of the year to allow time for the Excise and Customs to recover themselves. So far from increasing direct taxes and diminishing indirect taxes, the Customs and Excise, which some years ago were £33,000,000, are now £44,000,000. That increase has shown the wisdom of the financial policy adopted for many years past by this House. Since the year 1815, we have got rid of the taxes on such things as salt, leather, candles, glass, soap, and other articles of general consumption, and, at the same time, we have increased not only the general productiveness of the revenue, but especially that part of it which is derived from indirect taxes. The abolition of the paper duty was a measure quite in conformity with the measures adopted in former years. It was a measure of the same nature as the abolition of the taxes on bricks, soap, and glass. It should have been adopted on the same authority as those measures, and if it had been, I have no doubt it would have been followed by the same results. We are, therefore, obliged to ask in what view of finance that measure was rejected. It cannot be because a deficiency was apprehended, because the Lords had not sufficient information on that point. They could not tell what would be the total expenditure voted for the year, nor what would be the total Ways and Means provided. It may be that the vote was given in another sense—namely, to put a stop to the wise and healthy measures of finance which have been adopted in former years, to prevent industry being relieved in future years, and to continue taxes on articles of consumption. If any disproportionate taxes had been proposed on land, there might, perhaps, have been some excuse. But there is nothing of the sort; and if this vote was given merely to stop the wise legislation which has been adopted in former years, to prevent us following the path which Sir Robert Peel asked us to follow, and to leave industry as much fettered as possible in future years, it is an additional reason for jealousy in this House.

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

The right hon. Gentleman at the end of his speech intimated that he should be ready to consider any plan by which the House might in future vindicate its powers of taxation. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman will be ready to vindicate our powers. These Resolutions state moderately but firmly what those powers are, and what it is we shall endeavour to maintain. The right hon. Gentleman said, and said truly, that the speech of my noble Friend was, in part of it at least, statesmanlike, patriotic, and dignified. It was statesmanlike, patriotic, and dignified, because it met the case, and went no further than the occasion required, being intended to provide a remedy for the evil we have suffered, and a security against danger for the future. But my noble Friend did not attempt to thrust a defiance against the House of Lords, nor did he propose, by mere Resolutions, to enter upon a conflict with the other branch of the Legislature. However indiscreet the House of Lords may have been upon this occasion, it is our duty to continue in a calm and even course, and I should be very sorry that these acts should at all endanger or weaken the authority of the House of Lords—a great branch of the Legislature, highly important in its place, as I trust it may ever remain.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR: Mr. Speaker, I move that this debate be now adjourned.

MR. BRIGHT: I am desirous of asking the noble Lord at the head of the Government when the debate will be resumed.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: In answer to the question which has been put to me by the hon. Member for Birmingham, I can only say that if the hon. Member is desirous of expressing his views upon the Resolutions which I have proposed, he is entitled to do so; and, under these circumstances, I propose that the debate be resumed this day (Friday).

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter
after Two o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, July 6, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Augmentation of Small Benefices (Ireland).
2^a Jews Act Amendment.

ST. GEORGE'S-IN-THE-EAST. QUESTION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON in rising

"To call Attention to the continued and serious Riots occurring on each successive Sunday in the Parish of St. George's-in-the-East, more especially to those which took place on Sundays the 17th and 24th of June; and to inquire whether any or what more effective measures of prevention were to be adopted by Her Majesty's Government," said that after the very unsatisfactory reply that had been given on a previous evening in "another place," he feared he should not obtain any better information from the noble Lord who represented the Government in that House. But these riots, under the very prostituted name of religious dissensions, had now assumed a more serious character. They were no longer limited to hissing and hooting, but personal assaults were committed upon individuals. On the 24th of June a ruffianly rabble pursued and assaulted the evening preacher, who was obliged to take refuge in a public-house, whence he was ejected at the command of the mob, but, fortunately, succeeded in jumping into a cab and effecting his escape. On the 17th of June some choristers were pursued in like manner, and ill-treated. They also took refuge in a public-house, and were turned out to the fury of their assailants. Who were the persons who were promoting these successive weekly riots? They were not Mr. Bryan King's congregation, because some of them abstained from attending the church, in consequence of their disapproval of Mr. King's extraordinary proceedings, and others on account of these disturbances. He wished it to be distinctly understood that he was in no way taking up the cause of Mr. King, whose conduct was, in his opinion, characterized by the most culpable want of judgment and perverse obstinacy. Mr. King had adopted proceedings distasteful to his congregation, he adhered to those proceedings, notwithstanding that he must have foreseen how fearful would be the consequences. When their Lordships remembered that these riots had been going on for nearly ten months, and that the short days of the winter season were approaching, they could not doubt that, unless decisive means were taken to put them down, serious affrays, and perhaps loss of life, would ensue. The answer of the Home Secretary a few days since informed them that the authorities had reported that nothing amounting to a breach of the peace had occurred which would justify interference; but if the occurrences of the two Sundays which he had mentioned did not amount to a breach of the peace, he was at a loss to know what constituted a breach of the peace. He had always thought that the law took cognizance of anything calculated to disturb the public peace, but he might be mistaken. The question was, what was to be done? They could not interfere with Mr. Bryan King, who, however culpable, maintained that he was adhering strictly to the rubric. Technically speaking, it might be so, but Mr. King was adhering to a course which was thoroughly distasteful to his parishioners, and he could not help regarding him as the indirect promoter of the evils which were so much to be deplored. They could not close the church. The right rev. Prelate who presided over the diocese of London had tried, but discovered that the law would not warrant that course;—still, in a case of emergency such as this, he should like to know whether it could not be closed by an Order in Council. He did not say whether it could or could not, but it would be far preferable to close the church, if it were for twelve months, rather than suffer these outrageous proceedings. The right rev. Prelate had given his advice, but his monitions appeared to have been disregarded, and he had no power to put an end to that which was not only a scandal to religion, but a positive disgrace to a civilized country. He thought the churchwardens had been deficient in their duty, because they admitted into the church persons whom they knew very well to be the leaders of these disturbances. It might be said that the church was open to all; but persons who resorted there merely to create disorder should be refused admittance. He could not but believe that if the police had executed their duty, as it was intended they should, that the present state of things would not have continued. It was clear that the mob were solely urged on by a sheer love of mischief; and it must not be forgotten that they were establishing a precedent of a most dangerous description. What occurred in St. George's-in-the-East might equally happen elsewhere, and the consequences of an extension of those disturbances become exceedingly serious. An Act had been passed to confer greater powers to check such disturbances on the churchwardens; but judging from past experience it was hardly to be expected that, in this instance, there would be any change in the conduct of these officials. The right rev. Prelate had no doubt done his best to put an end to the riots, and would probably have succeeded had his advice been attended to. He much regretted that the right rev. Prelate had not the power to carry his views into effect. He wished to ask the noble Earl opposite whether the Government were prepared to adopt some decisive measures for repressing these outrages.

Viscount Palmerston

THE BISHOP OF LONDON hoped the noble Earl (Earl Granville) would allow him to interpose for a moment before he gave an answer to the question put to him by the noble Viscount. He wished to point out to their Lordships and to the Government strongly that this was not a question to be trifled with, but one which was every day becoming more and more important. He could not quite agree with the account which the noble Viscount had given of recent occurrences in St. George's—namely, that the disturbances were each week becoming worse. From the information which he (the Bishop of London) received weekly, he believed, on the contrary, that the disturbances were not so bad as they had formerly been. But the improved state of affairs was simply and entirely owing to the presence of the police. The riots would be as bad at this moment as when the attention of their Lordships was first called to them, only for the presence of the police. What he wished to call the attention of the noble Earl to at present was, that while Parliament was sitting there would be some check on the riotous violence of the mob; but they were rapidly approaching the time when Parliament would be prorogued, and when it could no longer be possible to ask Her Majesty's Government questions on the subject; and the noble Earl had to consider whether it would be possible to go on until February next with the present system of keeping down the disturbances by the presence of a body of police. It was painful for him (the Bishop of London) to have thus to speak of any church in the Metropolis, or anywhere else; but he could not avoid saying that there must be great fault somewhere when a clergyman required the presence of a large body of police to enable him to continue his ministrations. Neither their Lordships nor the other House of Parliament had been inattentive in the matter, for a Bill had passed both Houses which would give churchwardens greater power than they had hitherto possessed, and the difficulty which had been experienced in enforcing the statute of Queen Mary would not be felt under the new law. The statute provided that any person disturbing a congregation, or guilty of brawling in a church, might be taken before a justice of the peace and fined £5, or committed for two calendar months. He hoped that no long time would be suffered to elapse before the statute was put in force in respect to those misguided people who were ringleaders in these disturbances in St. George's. Reference had been made to the Churchwardens of St. George's. He had endeavoured to see that they did their duty, and he believed they had done so; but, no doubt, they had done it unwillingly, as any men would under similar circumstances; but he need not point out the difficulties which there were in the way of two churchwardens, aided only by four sidesmen, coping with a mob of a thousand people. He wished to put it to the Government whether, as a law had been passed to punish the persons who had committed these outrages, some legislation was not also required to prevent the cause of them. So far as he had been able to ascertain it, the law of the Church of England, as at present administered, allowed to every parochial clergyman the undivided responsibility of settling the form of his services within certain limits prescribed by the Act of Uniformity, without any consultation with his congregation or with any one else; and there was no check on his arbitrary will except the power of the congregation to leave the church when the services were distasteful to them. The

the Government, and as to what were the critical circumstances which rendered necessary a piece of legislation which the noble Lord himself must admit to be of a very exceptional character.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE acknowledged that the legislation now proposed was of an exceptional character. He quite admitted that their Lordships were entitled to ask for the production of the despatches which had passed between the Governor of the Colony and the home Government; but he had abstained from laying any papers on the subject on the table, because the communications contained the names of persons and statements of a private character which it would have been inexpedient to publish. As, however, he had been requested to produce the papers by the noble Earl opposite and the noble Lord who had preceded him, he could only say that the House had a right to them, and that he would endeavour to furnish their Lordships with such papers as would acquaint them with the full reasons why this Bill had been introduced. He was confident that when their Lordships saw these papers and considered the whole circumstances of the case they would admit that this Bill, though exceptional, was justifiable. He believed that the body which was constituted by the Act would act in harmony with the Colonial Legislature; and that the colonists would appreciate the advantage of having some body interposed between them and the Natives which would enable them to extend the advances of civilization without exciting that antagonism and hostility which now prevailed among a considerable portion of the Natives of New Zealand. There was nothing to prevent Natives being on the Council, but he was not sure that he would encourage their appointment. Whatever might be his opinion of individual Members of the Legislature of the colony, he had nothing to say against it collectively, but at the same time there was no disguising the fact that the Natives did not repose in it the same confidence as they would do in a body appointed by the Crown. The Bill, as a whole, he believed, met with the approval of many of the most intelligent and experienced colonists. Without being too sanguine as to the result of this attempt at mediation, he felt that it was only right that the experiment should be made, and hoped their Lordships would not retard the progress of the Bill.

The Earl of Derby

Motion agreed to. House in Committee accordingly. Bill reported without Amendment; an Amendment made, and Bill to be read 3^d on Tuesday next.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 6, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^o Plea on Indictments; Endowed Charities; Clearance Inwards and Lien for Freight.

2^o Court of Queen's Bench Act Amendment.

3^o Local Taxation Returns.

ANNUITY-TAX ABOLITION (EDINBURGH) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HADFIELD expressed his surprise that the two Liberal Members for the city of Edinburgh should support a measure of that description, which was formally opposed by the Town Council of that city, and met with the almost unanimous disapproval of the inhabitants. He had intended to propose upon that occasion that it should be referred to the examiners of private Bills, to inquire and report how far the Amendments made by the Committee in the Bill were in accordance with the Standing Orders of the House; but he had ascertained upon the highest authority that there had been no violation of the Standing Orders in the case; and as he was at all times prepared to bow to that authority he would not press that proposal.

MR. CAIRD said, he wished to make a final Appeal to the Lord Advocate to withdraw the Bill. The Lord Provost and Town Council of Edinburgh had petitioned against it, and declared that it was opposed to the wishes of their fellow townsmen. The Bill had already been changed in its form in passing through Committee; and the parties whom it would specially affect had as yet had no opportunity of considering it in its altered shape.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it was true that the Bill had been changed since its first introduction in the House; but the change had been made at the request of the Town Council of Edinburgh and of a public meeting; but no sooner did he make the change they asked for by making the rate permanent, than the Town Council turned round and said it was a new Bill, that the Standing Orders had not been complied with, and that the Bill should be withdrawn. Such was a simple statement of the facts of the case; he made it reluctantly, and he left the House to draw from it their own conclusions.

MR. DUNLOP said, he believed that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate had not adhered to the arrangement originally proposed in the Bill, with respect to the mode of ascertaining the value of the quit-rents; and it was in consequence of that change, to which the Town Council had been no parties, that they opposed the measure as it at present stood. House in Committee.

Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 7 (Pews in the City Churches to be let by the Kirk Session, and the Surplus of the Rents to be paid to the Commissioners).

MR. DUNLOP moved the addition of a proviso to the effect that whenever, after deducting the charges on the particular church, the balance should exceed £1,600 a year, the excess should be divided—one-half to the Commissioners for the purposes of the Act, and the other half to be held by the Commissioners in satisfaction pro tanto of the amount payable under the head of annuity towards the extinction of their claims thereunder for each year.

MR. BLACK supported the Amendment.

MR. HADFIELD expressed his astonishment at the course taken by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Black) on the question, considering the strong language in which he had in former times denounced this iniquitous tax, which had the effect of deadening all religious zeal among the people.

THE LORD ADVOCATE objected to the Amendment as altogether unnecessary.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 66: Majority 55.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 9 (Property of the City deponed in Security of the Payment of the Annuities).

MR. DUNLOP objected to the clause as unnecessarily offensive. He had an Amendment on the paper by which he proposed to give a security, not over the property of the town itself, but over the income. A security over the property of the town would lead to great inconvenience, and it was in order that the degradation of the magistrates of the city might be avoided that he wished to see the nature of the security changed. According to the Amendment the security would still remain ample. However, he did not intend to divide the Committee upon it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, there was nothing in the security provided by the Bill that was not absolutely indispensable, and there was nothing in it that ought to be offensive to the Town Council. In 1853 the Town Council agreed to a kind of security far more stringent than that proposed in the present Bill.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to; as were also the remaining Clauses.

MR. STIRLING moved the insertion of a clause to the effect that the patronage of the churches in Edinburgh should be transferred from the Town Council to the Kirk Sessions and the male communicants of three years' standing. The present was, he thought, a good opportunity of transferring the patronage from the hands of those who were seldom members of the Church of Scotland, and putting it into the hands of those who were members of the Church and likely to take an interest in its welfare. He did not think that the conduct of the Town Council since this Bill was introduced had been such as to increase the confidence of the people of Edinburgh in their wisdom. He only wished to have done in Edinburgh what had already been done in Montrose.

Clause (The right of patronage or presentation of ministers of each and every one of the parochial churches or charges in the said city (other than those of which the patronage is hereby expressly transferred to the Commissioners) shall be and the same is hereby, from and after the passing of this Act, transferred to and vested in, and may at all time thereafter be held and exercised by the elders and other male Members of each of the said churches, or any majority of their number, being in full communion, and whose names shall have stood in the Roll of Communicants of the church and parish in which there is a vacancy, for not less than three years next preceeding the occurrence of the said vacancy.")

Brought up, and read 1^o.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he hoped the hon. Member for Perthshire would not press his Amendment. He believed, notwithstanding what had passed, that the Town Council of Edinburgh would carry out the Act with perfect fidelity. He was not prepared to take the property of the Town Council and hand it over to the Kirk Sessions of the various churches. His hon.

Friend referred to the case of Montrose, but the difference between Montrose and Edinburgh was this—that the Town Council of the former place was willing to give up the patronage, whereas the Town Council of Edinburgh were not willing to do so. He maintained that the patronage of the Town Council of Edinburgh had hitherto been wisely exercised. He hoped his hon. Friend would not endanger the safety of the Bill by pressing his clause.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he approved of the principle of the clause; but he was not prepared, by urging it, to risk the success of the Bill.

MR. BAXTER said, that the Town Council of Montrose had surrendered their patronage because they had received an equivalent for that loss; but no such equivalent was offered to the Town Council of Edinburgh in the present instance.

MR. BLACKBURN said, he was not aware that the Town Council of Edinburgh was opposed to the transference of the patronage from their hands. It was not a question of property at all, for the patronage in this case was not a saleable thing, being held by the Town Council in trust for the public. The feeling in Scotland was in favour of vesting the patronage in the congregations.

MR. BUCHANAN said, he would propose an Amendment on the clause to the effect that the Town Council should be empowered to sell the patronage of the churches to the congregations.

MR. DUNLOP objected, that the hon. Member for Perthshire proposed to transfer the patronage only of those churches that were supported by a public tax, while the others were to be under the patronage of the Commissioners. He congratulated hon. Gentlemen opposite on the progress they had made in favour of the popular election of ministers.

MAJOR CUMMING BRUCE expressed a hope that the hon. Member for Perthshire would not persist in pressing his clause.

MR. E. ELLICE (St. Andrews) also expressed a hope that the clause would be withdrawn.

MR. BLACK said, he thought that if the congregations would not pay a reasonable sum for the right of patronage, it ought to remain where it was.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would call upon the congregations to pay their own Ministers, and then no one would dispute their right to elect them.

The Lord Advocate

MR. MURE expressed a hope that the Lord Advocate would introduce a clause which he had inserted in a former draught of the Bill, giving the Town Council the power to sell their patronage.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had no hesitation in saying that he was prepared to support the proposal for empowering the Town Council to dispose of patronage by sale.

Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 87: Majority 62.

MR. BUCHANAN proposed a clause to the effect that the Town Council of Edinburgh should be enabled to sell to the Kirk Session, or to the Commissioners, the right of patronage of the parochial charges in the City of Edinburgh, on the receipt of £600 in each case.

MR. STIRLING said that £600 would be a very moderate amount for a rich parish to pay; but in the poorer parishes it would form a very considerable sum.

MR. BLACKBURN said, the clause was substantially the same as one which had been originally inserted in the Bill. He feared its tendency would be to induce the Town Council to bully the congregations in order to make them purchase the Church patronage.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should not object to the clause, which was then agreed to and added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered on Monday next.

TAX BILLS.—PETITION.

MR. T. S. DUNCOMBE presented a Petition, assuming the shape of a remonstrance, from the Committee of the Constitutional Defence Association, complaining that the Select Committee on Tax Bills had placed the vote of the House of Lords in reference to the paper duty among their recorded precedents, such voting being still in dispute. The Petition concluded by praying the House to expunge the precedent in question (No. 212) from the Report.

MR. PACKE said, he wished to call the attention of the Speaker to the wording of the document, and to ask whether, according to the rules of the House, it could be received?

MR. SPEAKER: There is a precedent exactly in point, establishing that, although in the first instance it may bear the appearance of a remonstrance, yet if the paper concludes with a Petition respectfully worded, it can be received.

On Motion "That the House at rising adjourn till Monday next,"

INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. NORRIS said, he would now beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take steps for the transfer, from persons locally appointed, to the Officers of Inland Revenue, of the duties of assessors and collectors of Income, Property, and Assessed Taxes and collectors of Land Tax?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the question which the hon. Gentleman had put was one of great importance—the possibility of transferring the collection of the Queen's taxes from local to central authorities. There had been some manifestation of feeling in the House on the subject, but he believed the feeling in the country was favourable to the transfer. It was evident, however, that whatever might be the abstract merits of the question it ought not to be proposed or carried into effect except with the general concurrence of those who were affected by it. The course which the Government had taken was this:—A circular had been sent by the Board of Inland Revenue to all the Boards of Land Tax Commissioners in the kingdom, amounting to 699 in number, and a large number of answers had been received from those Boards—about one-half of the entire number; and another circular had since been sent, spurring up those that had not yet answered, so that they might be able to ascertain their sentiments. As far as the answers had gone they showed that the greater number of the Boards were favourable to the transfer. Speaking generally, the Boards in the large towns were unfavourable, those in the country were decidedly favourable to the transfer. There were, therefore, two questions—first, whether the transfer was to be carried by a compulsory measure. To that he could answer at once, that as several of the Boards connected with great masses of the population were unfavourable to the measure, he did not think that the Government would be prepared to introduce a measure of universal application on the subject. It might, however, be that in those instances where the inhabitants of an entire county, or division of a county, were found to approve such a transfer, it might be desirable to take the necessary steps to give effect to their wishes. That question it would be the duty of the Government to decide as soon as they received the answers from the other Boards of Commissioners.

SCOTTISH SCHOOLMASTERS.

QUESTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to ask the Lord Advocate, Whether he intends to bring in a Bill to maintain the Salaries of the Scotch Schoolmasters, or whether he intends to leave them to their fate until he is able to pass through both Houses a general measure for Education in Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, it appeared to him—and he believed he was supported by the general feeling of the House—that it would not be right to deal with the salaries of the parochial schoolmasters till they dealt with the question of exclusive tests. Repeated attempts had been made to repeal those tests, but never with success. He hoped next Session to find such unanimity prevailing among the Scotch Members on the subject as to enable him to place it on a satisfactory footing.

OFFICERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is expected that many Officers of Customs and Excise will lose their situations in consequence of recent reductions and abolition of Duties; and whether it is intended that such officers shall be re-employed in the above and other departments according as vacancies require to be filled up in preference to persons not heretofore employed under Government?

MR. LAING replied, he was not aware of any reduction of duties in the Excise, or that they were likely to part with many officers in that department. In the Customs there were very considerable reductions in the number of the establishment. These were made as far as possible by anticipating the period of superannuation of old officers approaching their period of retirement, and the object of the Government was, as far as possible, to re-employ those reduced by stopping the admission to new places, that patronage having been entirely suspended both in the Customs and Excise for some time. He had every reason to hope that the greater number of men parted with in these departments would find employment elsewhere.

ATROCITIES IN SICILY.—QUESTION.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any information of atrocities, stated by a noble Lord in "another place" to have been committed by General Garibaldi and his associates in the Island of Sicily, since its evacuation by the Neapolitan Troops; and whether it is probable that if such acts have been committed Her Majesty's Government can have remained altogether ignorant of the circumstance?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: In answer to the hon. Gentleman I may state that Her Majesty's Government have received information from Palermo and various parts of Sicily that several atrocious murders have been committed by the mob and armed bands on persons employed in the police of the late Government; but there is no account of General Garibaldi having in any way protected or favoured those committing these atrocities. On the contrary, the accounts state that he had done everything to prevent them, by restraining the people from attacks on the instruments of their former misgovernment.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to inquire, Whether his noble Friend at the head of the Government can give any assurance that the Bankruptcy Bill will be proceeded with this Session?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I conceive that Bill to be one of very much importance; and certainly I will endeavour to persuade the House to pass it this Session, however long it may require the House to sit for that purpose.

RESERVE FUND.—QUESTION.

LORD HOTHAM said, he was anxious to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with regard to the state of the Reserve Fund. Few hon. Members were aware of the existence and extent of that fund; and of the mode in which it was disposed of nobody perhaps knew but the right hon. Gentleman himself. His right hon. Friend would require no assurance that he had no intention to impute to him any misappropriation of the fund; but it was contrary to constitutional practice for any Minister of the Crown to have at his disposal a large sum of money without rendering an account of it. The secret service money was a case in point; it was necessary even there that a statement should be signed by a Secretary or some high officer of State that it had not been improperly disposed of. What might be the increased demands on that fund he had no means of knowing; but certain it was that the fund was largely increasing in consequence of a rule which the right hon. Gentleman had recently made to prohibit the disposal of any first commissions except by purchase, with the exception of those to the military colleges where certificates had been granted entitling the parties to receive commissions. He wished to know whether his right hon. Friend had any objection to lay on the table of the House a statement by which they might be enabled to know the condition of this fund and how it had been disposed of?

ENLISTMENT OF APPRENTICES.— CASE OF JOHN BISHOP. QUESTION.

MR. HUMBERSTON begged to call the attention of the Secretary of State for War to the Petition of John Bishop, presented to the House on the 3rd inst., praying for Inquiry into the Enlistment of his son, John Bishop, into the 7th Dragoon Guards, on the 27th day of June, 1859, his son being at the time of Enlistment a lawfully bound Apprentice, and asked Whether he would consent to such Inquiry being made?

MR. SIDNEY HERBERT, in reply to the Question of his noble Friend (Lord Hotham), said the subject was one which had, with some others, been for some days under investigation by a Committee upstairs. His noble Friend was mistaken as to the rule with regard to the augmentation of the Reserve Fund. His noble Friend had stated—not quite accurately—that this fund was augmented by the sale of the first commissions, excepting those which were adjudged as prizes at Sandhurst. He had never laid down any such general rule on the subject. The Report of the Committee would, however, shortly be laid on the table of the House, showing the state of this fund, and in all probability the Committee would make some recommendations as to the disposal of it.

Mr. Laing

With regard to the case of John Bishop, referred to by the hon. Member for Chester, it had been very fully investigated, and the circumstances were these. By the 61st clause of the Mutiny Act of last year, any apprentice who enlisted could be claimed by his master, and, after the expiration of his apprenticeship, the enlistment would hold good. But the Act said distinctly that no master should be entitled to claim an apprentice who had not been bound for the full term of seven years, and he must not have been above fourteen years of age when he was bound. Now, in this case it was found upon inquiry that the boy was not bound for seven years, but four years; he did not therefore come within that clause of the Act, and his enlistment was perfectly valid. If the Mutiny Act had been transgressed, and the boy had been illegally taken, it would have been his (Mr. S. Herbert's) duty to protect this civilian against such a misapplication of military enlistment, and he should have directed the boy's discharge. But the facts of the case were not disputed. It was admitted that the boy was not bound for seven years. It was stated by two witnesses that the boy was asked, upon his enlistment, whether he was an apprentice or not, and that he said no. The boy, to justify himself, now stated that he said yes; but so far as the law was concerned it did not matter whether the boy now spoke truth or not. The boy's father had made an application to be permitted to purchase his son's discharge, and the usual payment having been made he had been discharged accordingly. The father had since said that he paid the money in the full conviction that, having great Parliamentary interest, the money would be paid back to him. That, however, was a miscalculation on his part; for the Government could only deal with such cases according to a uniform rule. This was clearly a legal enlistment, and the boy had been discharged on payment of the money to procure his discharge.

Mr. HUMBERSTONE asked, whether the Government had therefore power to enlist any Apprentices who were bound for five years, or less than five years?

Mr. SIDNEY HERBERT: Yes, certainly; by the law as it stood, under the Mutiny Act of last Session, there is a power of enlisting those who are apprenticed for less than seven years in England, five years in Ireland, four in Scotland.

OUTRAGE IN DUBLIN.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD GROGAN said, he rose to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if his attention has been called to the Trial which lately took place before Barons Fitzgerald and Hughes, connected with the wrecking of Mrs. Sherwood's house in the City of Dublin; if any, and what steps have been taken, or are intended to be taken by the authorities, to mark their sense of the conduct of the Policemen on duty in the neighbourhood who permitted such an outrage to occur? It appeared that Mrs. Sherwood's husband was a seaman in a ship that had been lost, and it was supposed that he perished in the wreck. Mrs. Sherwood had seven children by him. A philanthropic person proposed to take charge of four of the children. Owing to her consent to that proposition, her house was wrecked by a brutal mob, who twice threw a burning chair into her house.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ESMONDE said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland, what course the Government intend to pursue with regard to the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill, and the renewal of the powers of the Irish Poor Law Commission? The powers of the Commissioners would expire this month, and he trusted that they would not be renewed for more than one year.

Mr. CARDWELL said, with respect to the question put to him by the hon. Baronet (Sir Edward Grogan), he could only state that as soon as the circumstances elicited at the trial held the week before last came to their knowledge, the Government called upon the Crown solicitor to furnish an accurate statement of the depositions of the witnesses. When that statement was obtained, an inquiry was immediately instituted, which was still pending, and of course he could not say what would be its result.

With regard to the other question put to him, he had fixed the Committee on the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill for twelve o'clock on Friday the 13th; but owing to the state of public business he feared there would not be that opportunity for the full discussion of this subject which he desired to afford the Irish Members. It was therefore the intention of the Government to limit themselves this Session merely to proposing the continuance of the powers of the Commissioners, which would otherwise lapse, together with the adoption of another clause that was necessary for restricting the expenditure.

PRIZE MONEY IN INDIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he rose in accordance with the notice he had given to ask a question of the Secretary of State for India as to the amount of prize-money which will be granted to the different corps of the Indian Army employed in suppressing the mutiny of the Native Troops in that country, and to call attention to the General Order of the Governor in Council on the subject, as to what is to be considered prize. He need hardly recall to their minds the fact that the operations in India were not carried on by one army, but by several columns. There was the column which attacked Delhi; the column which advanced to Lucknow; the column, under Lord Clyde, which relieved Lucknow; the column from Bombay, and the column from Madras, composed chiefly of Madras troops—infantry, cavalry, and batteries—with Her Majesty's 50th and 43rd Regiments. In each case victory attended their efforts, and on taking different places they seized the treasure found on them as lawful captors. He was perfectly aware that all prize-money was merely a concession of the value by Her Majesty, and that the captors had no legal title to the treasure which they had taken. But at the beginning of the mutiny the Governor General issued an order in which he promised to recommend for Her Majesty's approval that all property of mutineers should be given to the troops as prize. The division from Madras, which operated in Bundelcund, distinguished themselves. They assisted essentially the advance of Sir Hugh Rose, and they greatly contributed to the subjection of a large tract of country. Their operations were continued during the greater portion of 1858 and 1859, and they suffered as much as the other columns from exposure to the climate. A battle was fought in Bandar by 600 of the column against 8,000 of the rebels, in which they covered the British name with honour and distinction. Eight hundred mutineers were slain and nine guns captured, and the result was that a state of tranquillity was brought about in a large portion of the country. The column was then directed to advance against the Rajah of a neighbouring State who sided with our enemies. The chief made preparations for defence, but on the advance of the British column retired, and was afterwards made prisoner. His capital town was captured, and the question was whether the treasure found there was properly prize. The chief had a sum of £320,000 in the Indian funds, which the Government seized, and they also derived a revenue of £80,000 a year from the seizure of his estates. The troops by whom this capture had been made were, therefore, entitled to some consideration. He contended that this must be considered as prize-money taken in war, and as coming under the order of the Governor General, who announced that the property of any rebel would be held to be a fair prize, and would be distributed as such among the soldiers. In addition to the question whether particular property was to be divided as prize, he wished to know also whether money in respect of the capture of the Alumbagh, Delhi, and other places was to be thrown into a common fund, or whether each column was to divide the prize of its own captures? Perhaps, therefore, the Secretary of State for India would state—first, the amount of prize-money which would be granted to the different corps of the Indian army employed in suppressing the mutiny of the Native troops in that country; and, secondly, whether the division would be made upon the principle adopted in the Russian war, which gave greater advantage to the lower ranks of the army than the mode which had been previously acted on?

Mr. Cardwell

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he would give as complete an answer as he could to the question, but he was not sure that it would prove satisfactory to his hon. and gallant Friend. His hon. and gallant Friend had stated quite correctly that prize money was the gift of the Crown. What was to be considered prize money in India was decided by the Government there. They reported to the India Office here, that office reported to the Treasury, and the Treasury, who were the advisers of the Crown in the matter took Her Majesty's pleasure, and distributed the sum so reported. The first case reported was the prize-money of Delhi. The Treasury proposed a scale of distribution different from that heretofore adopted in India. That new scale, which was sanctioned in the Russian war, was much more favourable to the private soldier than the old, and it received the approval of the India Office. Objections, however, were taken to it, and the result was that a Commission was appointed to consider the scale of distribution. The matter was still under the consideration of the Commission, and he could not, therefore, answer the question put to him. As to the prize-money of Delhi, it was to be given to the troops that captured it; but with regard to the rest, he had heard that a representation had come home that it was so difficult to say what troops had contributed more or less to the capture of any particular place, that it might be fairer to throw the prize-money into one common fund, and distribute it among the troops who contributed to the capture. He believed that this point also was under the consideration of the Commission. With respect to the property of the native chief to whom the hon. and gallant Gentleman had referred, he had not received any report from the Indian Government as yet of anything captured from any such chief which was considered prize-money.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. KEOGH.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. M'EVROY said, in rising to call the attention of the House to the recent appointment by the Attorney General for Ireland of Mr. Keogh to be Sessional Crown Solicitor for the county of Meath, he wished to observe that the duties of that office were very important, and required an extensive knowledge of criminal law. He (Mr. M'Evoy) was informed that the gentleman who had been selected possessed no such knowledge, and, moreover, had no connection with the county in which his duties were henceforth to be performed. The duties of the late Crown prosecutor during his illness had for some time been performed by his son to the satisfaction of all parties, but he had been put aside. He (Mr. M'Evoy) made no charge against Mr. Keogh, except that he was unfit for the office. The only reasons that he had heard assigned for the appointment were that Mr. Keogh had been an active agent in the management of the registration for the Liberal party in Dublin, and also that he had the good fortune to receive his legal education in the office of the brother of the late Attorney General for Ireland. If those were not the reasons for the appointment, he would be glad to hear what the real reasons were.

MR. CORBALLY said, he had no objection to the gentleman who had been appointed, but at the same time he regretted that another gentleman, who had for some time discharged the duties of the office very efficiently, had been set aside. If the objection to appointing that gentleman to succeed his father was a desire not to let it be supposed that the office was hereditary, there were plenty of other gentlemen perfectly qualified for the office, and who possessed the advantage of local connection and acquaintance.

MR. DEASY said, he was sorry that the appointment of Mr. Keogh, for which he was solely responsible, had not given satisfaction to the people of Meath, but he felt certain that when they had experience of the manner in which the gentleman whom he had selected discharged his duties, that dissatisfaction would disappear. The hon. Member for Meath made two charges against Mr. Keogh—first, that he was not connected with the county, but the Attorney General was not bound to select only gentlemen who were natives of or residents in Meath, and neither had that been the uniform practice. The late Crown solicitor for Meath, Mr. Ford, was not a resident in that county but in Dublin, to the corporation of which he was clerk. The other charge was that Mr. Keogh was unfit for the office. He met that charge with a confident denial, for he believed that gentleman to be the most efficient of all the candidates for the office. That was the reason why he appointed that gentleman, and neither his predecessor, the present Justice Fitzgerald, nor any one else, had anything, directly or indirectly, to do with the selection he had made. The reason he had declined to appoint the son of the late Crown solicitor, who had acted as his father's deputy, was that it would have been virtually to deprive the Attorney General of the patronage if such a practice were sanctioned. It was true that Mr. Keogh had conducted ably the registration of the Liberal party in Dublin, and gained the respect of those before whom he practised, and even he believed that of those to whom he was politically opposed. He (Mr. Deasy) admitted that that fact had been one of the reasons which influenced him in making the appointment, for he thought services honourably rendered to a party in opposition should not be forgotten when the party was in power.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he did not think the hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had given a satisfactory answer. He would say nothing against the personal character of Mr. Keogh, who, if known to the hon. Gentleman, was no doubt deserving of the high character he had given him. No doubt, that gentleman had rendered services to the great (or small, as the case might be) Liberal party in Dublin which entitled him to a reward at the expense of the public. The objection that was made to him, however, was that he was not acquainted with criminal law, and it was understood that he never had practised at Quarter Sessions. When he (Mr. Whiteside) was in office, and was called upon to make such appointments, he always addressed a letter to the Chairman of Quarter Sessions to ask whether the applicant was in good practice, and performed his business satisfactorily. If the Attorney General had addressed such a letter in the present instance, the answer would have been that the gentleman was entirely unknown in Meath. From the nature of the duty which sessional Crown solicitors were called on to discharge, they were always supposed to be resident in the county to which they belonged, as application was constantly made to them by the law officers for information; and when a homicide occurred, they were directed in many cases to attend promptly to prevent the coroner from spoiling the administration of justice. He could add his testimony to that of his hon. Friend, that in trials in Ireland it was very desirable that the Crown solicitor should be acquainted, not only with the facts, but with the characters of most of the jurors. Seeing that Meath must contain many gentlemen well qualified to hold the position, he thought the county had been somewhat hardly dealt with.

VOLUNTEER CORPS FOR IRELAND.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN O'CONNELL said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or intend to take, any steps to enable the people of Ireland to form Volunteer Corps in that country?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: There is no intention on the part of the Government to propose that Parliament shall alter the law bearing on volunteering in Ireland, and under the present law there is no power on the part of the Crown to frame regulations under which these corps ought to serve.

Mr. Whiteside

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

TAX BILLS—RESOLUTIONS.

QUESTION.

LORD FERMOY apologized for putting a question to the noble Lord of which he had not given him notice, but felt bound to press it, because on the answer would depend the course which he should take with regard to the debate which was about to recommence, and perhaps also the course which would be taken by other hon. Members. Inasmuch as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that the rejection of the Paper Duty Repeal Bill in "another place" was the most gigantic innovation upon the privileges of the Commons which had occurred in his time, and that the House would do well to vindicate and establish its rights by action; and inasmuch as, subsequently, another Cabinet Minister addressed the House and did not dissent from that proposition, the question which he had to ask was, whether, in case the House carried the three Resolutions proposed, Her Majesty's Government would be prepared by some practical and efficient measure to give effect to the proposition laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the policy which he had pointed out?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question that has been put to me by my noble Friend the Member for Marylebone, I have to state to the House that I am perfectly satisfied with the Resolutions which it has been my duty to submit to them, and if those Resolutions should be carried, as I hope they will, it is not my intention to make any other proposal.

TAX BILLS—RESOLUTIONS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE—SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [5th July],

"That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution; and the limitation of all such Grants, as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR: Sir, the House has just heard from the noble Lord at the head of the Government the declaration that, so far as those Resolutions are concerned, he does not propose to go further than the Resolutions of which he has given notice. So far as those Resolutions themselves are concerned I am not going to express an opinion at all different to that which has been expressed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Those Resolutions in themselves I believe to be excellent, but in my humble opinion they stop far indeed short of the extent to which this House ought to proceed. That is what I complain of, and I trust that I shall be supported in this view which I venture to take of them. Those Resolutions stop far short of giving a true effect to that which ought to be their proper purport, and they content themselves with reciting and laying down that which is true in the abstract and which cannot be contradicted; but there a line is drawn. I think it would have been much better for the dignity of the House and for the consistency of the noble Lord if they had proceeded to draw the inference which I think inevitably and necessarily follows from the Resolutions which the noble Lord has placed on the table of this House.

Now, in the first place we have there stated by the noble Lord—

“That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution, and the limitation of all such Grants, as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them. That, although the Lords have exercised the power of rejecting Bills of several descriptions relating to taxation, by negating the whole of it, yet the exercise of that power by them has not been frequent, and is justly regarded by this House with peculiar jealousy, as affecting the right of the Commons to grant Supplies, and to provide the Ways and Means for the Service of the year.”

Now, Sir, if the sole right, as the Resolutions aver, of originating and controlling the Supplies rests in this House, if this House is jealous of its ancient and undoubted functions, if it is true that the House of Lords has not often exercised the power of interference, and if an undue exercise of power has now been made by the Lords, I think that there ought to have been some plainer and some less equivocal enunciation of their privileges on the part of this House, and I do trust that when we come to that Resolution, that either the noble Lord will consent to amend it in some particulars for the purpose of giving entire effect to it, or that a majority of this House will support me in the Amendment of which I have given notice, declaring that by the rejection of the Bill for the repeal of the paper duty the Lords had violated the constitutional rights of the House of Commons.

Now, Sir, I must at once state that I listened with great admiration and attention to the eloquent speech of the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government last night. I confess, however, that I admire him more as the advocate of the rights of this House than as the apologist for the excesses of the House of Lords, and I certainly thought that the first portion of the speech of the noble Lord was very much in contrast with the concluding portion, and I cannot help thinking that one portion of that speech entitles me to call upon the noble Lord to support me in the Amendment of which I have given notice, and which it will be my duty to submit to the House.

Sir, I find that the noble Lord in his speech last night said—

“It is our privilege to combine the whole into one scheme, and when that scheme is so framed, it certainly is not consistent with the exclusive functions of this House that any material portion of it should be rejected by the other House, so as to alter and entirely vary the bearing of all the financial arrangements. The question is was that done by the House of Lords upon the late occasion? One must admit, I think, that in principle it was so.”

Now, Sir, if the noble Lord really entertained that opinion, I ask the House why has he stopped short from any affected reserve towards the other House? From what the noble Lord said in his speech upon this subject, it would appear that the House of Lords have taken upon themselves to interfere in that which the noble Lord has declared to be the undoubted and ancient function of this House, and if so why does the noble Lord feel any affected reserve with regard to the position of this House in respect to its relation to the House of Lords? If the noble Lord was in earnest in that declaration—if the noble Lord was in earnest in bringing forward these Resolutions, why, I ask, has he not proved his sincerity by declaring not what the House of Lords has done in principle, but that they have in fact violated the privileges and made an encroachment on the functions of the House of Commons? But if I was astonished at those observations on the part of the noble Lord, I was still more astonished at the language which he addressed to this House in justification and apology for the conduct of the House of Lords. The language of the noble Lord was to this effect, he put it to the House

Ireland had given a satisfactory answer. He would say nothing against the personal character of Mr. Keogh, who, if known to the hon. Gentleman, was no doubt deserving of the high character he had given him. No doubt, that gentleman had rendered services to the great (or small, as the case might be) Liberal party in Dublin which entitled him to a reward at the expense of the public. The objection that was made to him, however, was that he was not acquainted with criminal law, and it was understood that he never had practised at Quarter Sessions. When he (Mr. Whiteside) was in office, and was called upon to make such appointments, he always addressed a letter to the Chairman of Quarter Sessions to ask whether the applicant was in good practice, and performed his business satisfactorily. If the Attorney General had addressed such a letter in the present instance, the answer would have been that the gentleman was entirely unknown in Meath. From the nature of the duty which sessional Crown solicitors were called on to discharge, they were always supposed to be resident in the county to which they belonged, as application was constantly made to them by the law officers for information; and when a homicide occurred, they were directed in many cases to attend promptly to prevent the coroner from spoiling the administration of justice. He could add his testimony to that of his hon. Friend, that in trials in Ireland it was very desirable that the Crown solicitor should be acquainted, not only with the facts, but with the characters of most of the jurors. Seeing that Meath must contain many gentlemen well qualified to hold the position, he thought the county had been somewhat hardly dealt with.

VOLUNTEER CORPS FOR IRELAND.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN O'CONNELL said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have taken, or intend to take, any steps to enable the people of Ireland to form Volunteer Corps in that country?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: There is no intention on the part of the Government to propose that Parliament shall alter the law bearing on volunteering in Ireland, and under the present law there is no power on the part of the Crown to frame regulations under which these corps ought to serve.

Mr. Whiteside

Motion agreed to.

House at rising to adjourn till Monday next.

TAX BILLS—RESOLUTIONS.

QUESTION.

LORD FERMOY apologized for putting a question to the noble Lord of which he had not given him notice, but felt bound to press it, because on the answer would depend the course which he should take with regard to the debate which was about to recommence, and perhaps also the course which would be taken by other hon. Members. Inasmuch as the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated that the rejection of the Paper Duty Repeal Bill in "another place" was the most gigantic innovation upon the privileges of the Commons which had occurred in his time, and that the House would do well to vindicate and establish its rights by action; and inasmuch as, subsequently, another Cabinet Minister addressed the House and did not dissent from that proposition, the question which he had to ask was, whether, in case the House carried the three Resolutions proposed, Her Majesty's Government would be prepared by some practical and efficient measure to give effect to the proposition laid down by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the policy which he had pointed out?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Mr. Speaker, with regard to the question that has been put to me by my noble Friend the Member for Marylebone, I have to state to the House that I am perfectly satisfied with the Resolutions which it has been my duty to submit to them, and if those Resolutions should be carried, as I hope they will, it is not my intention to make any other proposal.

TAX BILLS—RESOLUTIONS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE—SECOND NIGHT.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [5th July],

"That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution; and the limitation of all such Grants, as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. DIGBY SEYMOUR: Sir, the House has just heard from the noble Lord at the head of the Government the declaration that, so far as those Resolutions are concerned, he does not propose to go further than the Resolutions of which he has given notice. So far as those Resolutions themselves are concerned I am not going to express an opinion at all different to that which has been expressed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Those Resolutions in themselves I believe to be excellent, but in my humble opinion they stop far indeed short of the extent to which this House ought to proceed. That is what I complain of, and I trust that I shall be supported in this view which I venture to take of them. Those Resolutions stop far short of giving a true effect to that which ought to be their proper purport, and they content themselves with reciting and laying down that which is true in the abstract and which cannot be contradicted; but there a line is drawn. I think it would have been much better for the dignity of the House and for the consistency of the noble Lord if they had proceeded to draw the inference which I think inevitably and necessarily follows from the Resolutions which the noble Lord has placed on the table of this House.

Now, in the first place we have there stated by the noble Lord—

“That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution, and the limitation of all such Grants, as to the matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them. That, although the Lords have exercised the power of rejecting Bills of several descriptions relating to taxation, by negating the whole of it, yet the exercise of that power by them has not been frequent, and is justly regarded by this House with peculiar jealousy, as affecting the right of the Commons to grant Supplies, and to provide the Ways and Means for the Service of the year.”

Now, Sir, if the sole right, as the Resolutions aver, of originating and controlling the Supplies rests in this House, if this House is jealous of its ancient and undoubted functions, if it is true that the House of Lords has not often exercised the power of interference, and if an undue exercise of power has now been made by the Lords, I think that there ought to have been some plainer and some less equivocal enunciation of their privileges on the part of this House, and I do trust that when we come to that Resolution, that either the noble Lord will consent to amend it in some particulars for the purpose of giving entire effect to it, or that a majority of this House will support me in the Amendment of which I have given notice, declaring that by the rejection of the Bill for the repeal of the paper duty the Lords had violated the constitutional rights of the House of Commons.

Now, Sir, I must at once state that I listened with great admiration and attention to the eloquent speech of the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government last night. I confess, however, that I admire him more as the advocate of the rights of this House than as the apologist for the excesses of the House of Lords, and I certainly thought that the first portion of the speech of the noble Lord was very much in contrast with the concluding portion, and I cannot help thinking that one portion of that speech entitles me to call upon the noble Lord to support me in the Amendment of which I have given notice, and which it will be my duty to submit to the House.

Sir, I find that the noble Lord in his speech last night said—

“It is our privilege to combine the whole into one scheme, and when that scheme is so framed, it certainly is not consistent with the exclusive functions of this House that any material portion of it should be rejected by the other House, so as to alter and entirely vary the bearing of all the financial arrangements. The question is was that done by the House of Lords upon the late occasion? One must admit, I think, that in principle it was so.”

Now, Sir, if the noble Lord really entertained that opinion, I ask the House why has he stopped short from any affected reserve towards the other House? From what the noble Lord said in his speech upon this subject, it would appear that the House of Lords have taken upon themselves to interfere in that which the noble Lord has declared to be the undoubted and ancient function of this House, and if so why does the noble Lord feel any affected reserve with regard to the position of this House in respect to its relation to the House of Lords? If the noble Lord was in earnest in that declaration—if the noble Lord was in earnest in bringing forward these Resolutions, why, I ask, has he not proved his sincerity by declaring not what the House of Lords has done in principle, but that they have in fact violated the privileges and made an encroachment on the functions of the House of Commons? But if I was astonished at those observations on the part of the noble Lord, I was still more astonished at the language which he addressed to this House in justification and apology for the conduct of the House of Lords. The language of the noble Lord was to this effect, he put it to the House whether the House of Lords in the course which they had taken might not have thought that it would be wise to give the House of Commons at least time for consideration, with a view to see whether the revenue under the altered circumstances might not be seriously affected by the contemplated change in respect to the repeal of the paper duty. What! Sir, are we come to this—that the noble Lord the leader of this House, the noble Lord at the head of the Government, standing up in his place to vindicate the privileges of the House of Commons, and to place on record Resolutions declaratory of our undoubted rights and privileges, is to become the apologist of the Lords, and to find an excuse for them in the suggestion that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the course which he has taken, has exhibited so little wisdom or foresight in his proposition for the Supply of the year, that, therefore, the House of Lords were entitled to review the Budget which he has laid upon the table of the House? If the apology of the noble Lord amounts to anything, it amounts to that. But are we so likely to forget the Speech of the Queen in the opening of the Session of Parliament, in that stereotyped form of expression which, though vulgarized by perpetual use, is ever present to our minds, as to in whom resides the right to furnish the Supplies? Does not Her Majesty, I ask, on every occasion of the opening of the Session of Parliament call upon her “faithful Commons” to grant the Supplies for the public service, and does she not tell them that she will take care that the proper Estimates for the year shall be laid before them for that purpose? If the noble Lord be right all this must be reversed, and in future we must have an Address to the Throne asking both the House of Lords and the House of Commons for Supplies, and suggesting that the Estimates for the year shall be laid before both Houses of Parliament. This, I cannot help thinking, is the legitimate conclusion to be derived from the apology made by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, for I confess that I can read it in no other way. For my own part, I must be permitted to protest against the course which has been taken by the House of Lords in setting themselves up as a Court of Appeal from the House of Commons, from the Committee of Ways and Means. The Lords have clearly made this question, every one knows, a question of party

Mr. Digby Seymour

struggle in the other House, and they have not hesitated to single out the proposition of an individual Member of the Government for comment and criticism with regard to the financial preparations for the year. Talk of a simple assent! Talk of a simple negative! Is it a simple assent or a simple negative? Instead of a simple assent or a simple negative, they have gone into a debtor and creditor account upon the subject of the balance of finances for the year, and they have indulged in a somewhat angry and personal debate upon the merits of the Budget which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has laid before the House of Commons. I think, Sir, that the apology of the noble Lord at the head of the Government was not only misplaced but mistimed, and in his anxiety to justify the course which has been taken by the House of Lords, and to harmonize their act with that of the House of Commons, he has only placed their position in a more unconstitutional light. But the noble Lord has made matters worse by suggesting that the House of Lords might have been guided in the course which they took by the extent of the majority in the House of Commons. The noble Lord referred to the numbers that had carried the third reading of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty. Now, I think that the argument of the noble Lord upon that subject was a most unfortunate argument, and I do protest against the argument being addressed to this House—I do protest against the principle that the House of Lords are to measure the degree of a majority of the House as to the course of policy which they are to take. That argument is opposed to every constitutional principle, and to every sound reason of philosophy or argument which can be addressed to this House, and I certainly am utterly astonished to find that the noble Lord has seriously urged it upon the attention of this House. But it did not for a moment occur to the noble Lord to ask what the numbers were that placed the Ministry in power. It did not occur to the noble Lord that it took nine votes which might well suffice to carry a Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty, and that it only took a majority of thirteen to place the Ministry in power. Ministers who are the guardians of the British Constitution, Ministers who advised the Queen on matters of peace at home and war abroad, Ministers who have to give their opinions in matters of state affecting the interests of untold millions throughout the wide extent of Her Majesty's extensive dominions, throughout the wide extent of the habitable globe, if we are to be told that a majority of nine on the third reading of the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty is so insignificant that even the House of Lords are entitled to look at it, it appears to me that the noble Lord should not have used that argument when we know that sometimes in this House questions of the greatest possible magnitude are decided by the smallest minority.

Now, Sir, I have humbly but earnestly, and, as I hope, clearly endeavoured to explain the ground upon which I have placed the Resolution on the paper, and which I trust before this debate closes will receive the sanction of some hon. Members, and that I shall not be left alone to do that which I conceive to be of paramount importance at this juncture—namely, to vindicate the rights and privileges and authority of this House.

Now, Sir, there was one other observation which I wish to refer to, and when I have alluded to that I shall pass away from the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and that was with reference to the importance of the House of Commons and the House of Lords at this particular juncture not being placed in a position or in an attitude of unfriendliness or of hostility or of jealousy one towards the other. I quite agree with the noble Lord; I believe that it is well that in the eyes of all foreign nations, the Legislature of this country, the Legislature of England, should stand in a dignified position aloof from the strifes and jealousies of Parliament in either House, and that the House of Commons should not be degraded in the eyes of the country and the nation. It appears to me that the House of Commons, whose duty it is to vote the Estimates for the year, whose duty it is to discuss questions of war and peace, which questions are generally most significantly and amply and fully discussed; it is far more important, it appears to me, that the dignity of this House should be maintained in the eyes of foreign nations, than that we should for a single moment suffer that dignity to sink from any apathy on our part, or from the want of taking the necessary steps to uphold and sustain it.

Now, Sir, after these observations upon the speech of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, I cannot pass away to another part of the subject without for one moment alluding to the position which has been taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I know not how the conduct that the right hon. Gentleman has exhibited, and the speech that he delivered last night, may affect the minds of hon. Members of this House, but I can say this, that much as I admire the high position, much as I admire the talents which he possesses, much as I admire his talents as an orator, much as I respect him as an orator, and his ability as a Minister of Finance, it certainly does appear to me that he last night assumed the character of an indignant and honest and a fearless patriot. It appears to me that that speech will bring its fruits sooner or later, it appears to me that his speech will produce an effect from one end of the country to another, and that, although some may here condemn him, the fervour of his language and the honesty of his utterance will elsewhere meet with almost universal approbation; it will be that of a Minister who consulted rather the interests of his country than the convenience of his colleagues, who would suffer for his fearlessness. But I beg to tell the right hon. Gentleman that if, on account of that speech he were to lose a seat in the Cabinet, he will at least be rewarded by a throne in the affections of his countrymen.

Sir, whatever the action may be that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer sketched out to this House, whether he would propose another Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty, whether he would ask the House to suspend its ordinary course of proceeding, in order that that Bill may be sent up to the other House, whether he would give instructions to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, that they shall not, after the 15th day of August next, proceed to collect any further portion of the paper duty for the purposes of the Revenue, I do not know. I cannot tell what course the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer will think it necessary or advisable to ask the House to adopt. I am not in the secret, and therefore I do not know what course the right hon. Gentleman intends to pursue with regard to this most important subject. Although the noble Lord at the head of the Government has told us to-night that he does not intend to go further with the Resolutions which he has submitted for the approval of the House, and that he is prepared to let these Resolutions remain a dead letter, the pledge and promise given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot be forgotten, but it will, I hope, hold good, and be carried out to its fulfilment. They are recorded side by side; the one is pledged to inaction, the other is pledged to action; and I do sincerely hope and trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, considering nothing but his own high character, considering the pledge which he has given in the face of this country, considering that the eyes of a large section in this House and countless persons out of doors are turning their eyes towards him, I do hope and trust that the right hon. Gentleman will be true to that character, and that he will be true to the promise which he gave to the House last night, and that he will really redeem that pledge.

Sir, I now am led to call the attention of the House to the position in which we are placed. In my opinion there is a great deal worthy of being considered on this important subject at the present moment. In my opinion we ought either to have done nothing at all, or that having thought it necessary to interfere we ought to interfere in a manner consistent with our dignity and consistent with the position which we hold in the eyes of the country. Our position is this—either the House of Commons should suffer calmly this encroachment of the House of Lords on their rights and liberties, or they ought so to vindicate those rights that their proceedings might serve as a beacon and a landmark for the guidance of their latest posterity. Let us for a moment see the position in which this country is placed. What is that position? Repeated Resolutions and declarations by former Parliaments had been come to which had doomed the paper duty, and declared that it must be repealed. Then came the present Session; then came the preparation for Supply for the year; the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the Budget was opened. Sir, upon the repeal of that paper duty every Vote that was passed in that Committee of Ways and Means on this side of the House was come to after the most deliberate consideration. Every hon. Member who voted, and who supported the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, supported him as a Minister, who had pledged as part of that provision the repeal of that paper duty, and therefore what is the effect? The effect is this—the present position of affairs is this—that a tax which has been declared by the House of Commons unfit for continuance—a tax which this House has, as far as they are concerned, repealed, will, as soon as the 15th of August comes, instantly and for ever become a tax, imposed not by the House of Commons, but by the House of Lords. As soon as the 15th of August comes the anomaly will be presented, that instead of being a tax imposed by this House, it will in effect be a tax imposed by the other House of Parliament, and the people will thus be paying a tax inflicted and imposed upon them by the House of Lords.

Now, Sir, that is the true way to view it; that is the true position in which this House and its representatives will be placed. On the morning of the 16th of August a tax will exist which, if there were no House of Lords, the country would not be called upon to pay. On the morning of the 16th of August next every man that pays a paper tax in this country—every man that does that, will entertain a feeling of resentment against the House of Lords, because he will feel perfectly conscious that he will be paying a tax which, if the House of Lords did not exist, he would never have to pay. I say, therefore, again, that that is a position in which this House ought not to be placed. I say that that is a position in which the Commons of England and those who represent them ought not to be placed. I say that that is a position which has no precedents to support it. I say that there is no example of previous years which can be cited in its favour, and if the House will allow me, I think I shall be able to satisfy them that a very great, and wise, and salutary rule exists with regard to this subject. I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that if they take the three parts of this Report of the Committee upon precedents—if they take the precedents as to the rejection of Bills by which indirectly a charge is made upon the people—if they take those precedents which show the rejection of Bills which impose a tax or charge in the nature of Supply upon the people, and if they refer in the last place to those Bills repealing a tax upon the people, there is not one of these precedents that I have not carefully examined, and there is not one of them, I deliberately affirm, that does not, on careful consideration, crumble into dust and ashes, and are vox et præterea nihil.

Mr. Digby Seymour

Now, let me call the attention of the House for a moment to the first class of precedents upon which so much has already been said by hon. Members; and here I must confess that I cannot help making the observation that it does appear to me that the hon. Members who sat upon this Committee have exhibited great industry and research, that they have devoted their time most anxiously with the view to furnish this House and the country with the results of their careful research and labours; but still, there is one thing which I cannot refrain from stating, and that is that I find in this Report—solemnly as the result of the researches of that Committee—numerous cases which are not only precedents in the ordinary sense of the term, but which give an air of the ridiculous to the other examples placed near them, and to which I think some observation or some distinction or line of demarcation ought to have been drawn by the hon. Members of that Committee.

Now, Sir, I will take for instance the Tax Bills rejected and postponed by the House of Lords, at page 40, of the Select Committee on Tax Bills. Let me just see what they are. I shall go as rapidly as I can through them. I know how much has been said with respect to these precedents, and I know the amount of reliance which is placed upon them; and I believe that I have formed a proper and just appreciation of their value. I shall endeavour to follow the course and to vindicate the course which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) has taken, and I shall take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to one class of these precedents to which my hon. and learned Friend did not last night call the attention of the House. In the first place, at page 40, we find the Forfeitures Bill, the Worsted Yarn Duties Bill, the Tobacco Trade, &c., Bill, the Pawnbrokers Regulating Bill, the Wrought Silks, &c., Bill, Dr. Smith Bill, Phillips's Powder Bill, again Phillips's Powder Bill, the Lotteries Bill, the Cocoa-nuts Bill, again the Cocoa-nuts Bill, the Lotteries Bill, the Malt Duties Bill, the Extra Post Bill, the Corn Bill, again the Corn Bill, the Excise Licences Sale of Spirits Bill, and the Public Revenue and Consolidated Fund Bill.

Now, with respect to the Worsted Yarn Duties Bill—upon making an examination into the circumstances connected with that Bill, we find that the very statement of the Bill itself at once announced to the House that which can also be predicated with regard to two or three other Bills. The Worsted Yarn Duties Bill was not a Bill connected with Supply; the Worsted Yarn Duties Bill was not a Bill forming part of the provision which was made for the public revenue of the year. It was a Bill referring to particular interests in this matter; it was a Bill which involved not a matter with regard to Supply, but it involved questions of a party character; it involved questions of protection or free trade as affecting a particular manufacture in England.

Then, Sir, we next come to the Tobacco Trade Bill, and this House will see stamped upon the face of that Bill unmistakeably the powers of its own authority to deal with it. It was not thrown out by the House of Lords in a sense that would make it a precedent here, but it was a Bill in which, besides dealing with certain duties, provisions are made—

“For discharging the Lustring Company from sealing Lustrings and à la modes to be made in Great Britain, and for continuing the deputations of Custom-house officers, notwithstanding the death or removal of any Commissioners of the Customs, and for the relief of Sir John Lambert, and others in relation to the duties of certain wines taken as prize, and for better enabling the Bank of England to lend money on Stock of the South Sea Company, and for the more effectual taxing and determining several accounts relating to the Forces and Marines.”

Now, Sir, this Bill upon the face of it is a tack, and a Bill which ought not to have been included in these Returns.

Then, Sir, the next Bill is the Pawnbrokers Regulation Bill. Now, what in the name of common sense, and common fairness can be said of a precedent, what can be said of quoting the Pawnbrokers Regulation Bill affecting the time at which they should open and close and various other regulations relating to the conduct of the Pawnbroking business? what, I ask this House, has that to do with the question whether the House of Lords has or has not a right to reject the repeal of the Paper Duty Bill?

Now, Sir, the next Bill is the Wrought Silks and Velvets (additional duties on) Bill, and I find here the following words:—

“The order of the day being read for the second reading of the Bill entitled ‘An Act for laying

[Second Night.

he has submitted for the approval of the House, and that he is prepared to let these Resolutions remain a dead letter, the pledge and promise given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer cannot be forgotten, but it will, I hope, hold good, and be carried out to its fulfilment. They are recorded side by side; the one is pledged to inaction, the other is pledged to action; and I do sincerely hope and trust that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, considering nothing but his own high character, considering the pledge which he has given in the face of this country, considering that the eyes of a large section in this House and countless persons out of doors are turning their eyes towards him, I do hope and trust that the right hon. Gentleman will be true to that character, and that he will be true to the promise which he gave to the House last night, and that he will really redeem that pledge.

Sir, I now am led to call the attention of the House to the position in which we are placed. In my opinion there is a great deal worthy of being considered on this important subject at the present moment. In my opinion we ought either to have done nothing at all, or that having thought it necessary to interfere we ought to interfere in a manner consistent with our dignity and consistent with the position which we hold in the eyes of the country. Our position is this—either the House of Commons should suffer calmly this encroachment of the House of Lords on their rights and liberties, or they ought so to vindicate those rights that their proceedings might serve as a beacon and a landmark for the guidance of their latest posterity. Let us for a moment see the position in which this country is placed. What is that position? Repeated Resolutions and declarations by former Parliaments had been come to which had doomed the paper duty, and declared that it must be repealed. Then came the present Session; then came the preparation for Supply for the year; the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the Budget was opened. Sir, upon the repeal of that paper duty every Vote that was passed in that Committee of Ways and Means on this side of the House was come to after the most deliberate consideration. Every hon. Member who voted, and who supported the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, supported him as a Minister, who had pledged as part of that provision the repeal of that paper duty, and therefore what is the effect? The effect is this—the present position of affairs is this—that a tax which has been declared by the House of Commons unfit for continuance—a tax which this House has, as far as they are concerned, repealed, will, as soon as the 15th of August comes, instantly and for ever become a tax, imposed not by the House of Commons, but by the House of Lords. As soon as the 15th of August comes the anomaly will be presented, that instead of being a tax imposed by this House, it will in effect be a tax imposed by the other House of Parliament, and the people will thus be paying a tax inflicted and imposed upon them by the House of Lords.

Now, Sir, that is the true way to view it; that is the true position in which this House and its representatives will be placed. On the morning of the 16th of August a tax will exist which, if there were no House of Lords, the country would not be called upon to pay. On the morning of the 16th of August next every man that pays a paper tax in this country—every man that does that, will entertain a feeling of resentment against the House of Lords, because he will feel perfectly conscious that he will be paying a tax which, if the House of Lords did not exist, he would never have to pay. I say, therefore, again, that that is a position in which this House ought not to be placed. I say that that is a position in which the Commons of England and those who represent them ought not to be placed. I say that that is a position which has no precedents to support it. I say that there is no example of previous years which can be cited in its favour, and if the House will allow me, I think I shall be able to satisfy them that a very great, and wise, and salutary rule exists with regard to this subject. I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that if they take the three parts of this Report of the Committee upon precedents—if they take the precedents as to the rejection of Bills by which indirectly a charge is made upon the people—if they take those precedents which show the rejection of Bills which impose a tax or charge in the nature of Supply upon the people, and if they refer in the last place to those Bills repealing a tax upon the people, there is not one of these precedents that I have not carefully examined, and there is not one of them, I deliberately affirm, that does not, on careful consideration, crumble into dust and ashes, and are vox et præterea nihil.

Mr. Digby Seymour

Now, let me call the attention of the House for a moment to the first class of precedents upon which so much has already been said by hon. Members; and here I must confess that I cannot help making the observation that it does appear to me that the hon. Members who sat upon this Committee have exhibited great industry and research, that they have devoted their time most anxiously with the view to furnish this House and the country with the results of their careful research and labours; but still, there is one thing which I cannot refrain from stating, and that is that I find in this Report—solemnly as the result of the researches of that Committee—numerous cases which are not only precedents in the ordinary sense of the term, but which give an air of the ridiculous to the other examples placed near them, and to which I think some observation or some distinction or line of demarcation ought to have been drawn by the hon. Members of that Committee.

Now, Sir, I will take for instance the Tax Bills rejected and postponed by the House of Lords, at page 40, of the Select Committee on Tax Bills. Let me just see what they are. I shall go as rapidly as I can through them. I know how much has been said with respect to these precedents, and I know the amount of reliance which is placed upon them; and I believe that I have formed a proper and just appreciation of their value. I shall endeavour to follow the course and to vindicate the course which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) has taken, and I shall take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to one class of these precedents to which my hon. and learned Friend did not last night call the attention of the House. In the first place, at page 40, we find the Forfeitures Bill, the Worsted Yarn Duties Bill, the Tobacco Trade, &c., Bill, the Pawnbrokers Regulating Bill, the Wrought Silks, &c., Bill, Dr. Smith Bill, Phillips's Powder Bill, again Phillips's Powder Bill, the Lotteries Bill, the Cocoa-nuts Bill, again the Cocoa-nuts Bill, the Lotteries Bill, the Malt Duties Bill, the Extra Post Bill, the Corn Bill, again the Corn Bill, the Excise Licences Sale of Spirits Bill, and the Public Revenue and Consolidated Fund Bill.

Now, with respect to the Worsted Yarn Duties Bill—upon making an examination into the circumstances connected with that Bill, we find that the very statement of the Bill itself at once announced to the House that which can also be predicated with regard to two or three other Bills. The Worsted Yarn Duties Bill was not a Bill connected with Supply; the Worsted Yarn Duties Bill was not a Bill forming part of the provision which was made for the public revenue of the year. It was a Bill referring to particular interests in this matter; it was a Bill which involved not a matter with regard to Supply, but it involved questions of a party character; it involved questions of protection or free trade as affecting a particular manufacture in England.

Then, Sir, we next come to the Tobacco Trade Bill, and this House will see stamped upon the face of that Bill unmistakeably the powers of its own authority to deal with it. It was not thrown out by the House of Lords in a sense that would make it a precedent here, but it was a Bill in which, besides dealing with certain duties, provisions are made—

“For discharging the Lustring Company from sealing Lustrings and à la modes to be made in Great Britain, and for continuing the deputations of Custom-house officers, notwithstanding the death or removal of any Commissioners of the Customs, and for the relief of Sir John Lambert and others in relation to the duties of certain wines taken as prize, and for better enabling the Bank of England to lend money on Stock of the South Sea Company, and for the more effectual taxing and determining several accounts relating to the Forces and Marines.”

Now, Sir, this Bill upon the face of it is a tack, and a Bill which ought not to have been included in these Returns.

Then, Sir, the next Bill is the Pawnbrokers Regulation Bill. Now, what in the name of common sense, and common fairness can be said of a precedent, what can be said of quoting the Pawnbrokers Regulation Bill affecting the time at which they should open and close and various other regulations relating to the conduct of the Pawnbroking business? what, I ask this House, has that to do with the question whether the House of Lords has or has not a right to reject the repeal of the Paper Duty Bill?

Now, Sir, the next Bill is the Wrought Silks and Velvets (additional duties on) Bill, and I find here the following words:—

“The order of the day being read for the second reading of the Bill entitled ‘An Act for laying

[Second Night.

several additional Duties upon the importation of Wrought Silks and Velvets, for the encouragement of the silk manufactures of this Kingdom; and for preventing unlawful combinations of workmen employed in the said Manufactures."

It then says:—

"The said Bill was read a second time. And it being moved 'to commit the Bill' the question was put thereupon. It was resolved in the negative. Ordered that the said Bill be rejected. Not noticed in the Parliamentary History."

Therefore, Sir, this Bill was a Bill not only for laying several additional duties upon the importation of wrought silks and velvets, for the encouragement of the silk manufactures of this kingdom, but also for preventing unlawful combinations of workmen in manufactures. It was therefore an obvious tack, and of course the House of Lords had a right to reject it.

Then, Sir, comes the Bill, "Reward to Dr. Smith." I do not know who Dr. Smith was, but it appears that he was a Doctor of Physic, who, for the humane treatment of prisoners, received some compensation for his conduct, according to the statements of certain hon. Members of this House.

Now, Sir, I ask the House, is a Bill providing a reward on account of the humane conduct of Dr. Smith to be quoted seriously in this House as a precedent for the House of Lords rejecting a Bill which imposes a tax, not upon Dr. Smith alone, but upon all the subjects in the kingdom.

Now, then, Sir, what are the next two Bills? The next is called Phillips's Powder Bill, and I find here "The Order of the Day being read for the House to be again put into a Committee upon the Bill." I confess that I thought this might be some detonating powder, or some powder that was used for Her Majesty's Army or Navy, but instead of that I find that the Bill is headed "An Act for providing a Reward to Henry Philips on his making a proper discovery for the use of the public of the composition of his Powder for the destruction of insects."

Now, Sir, what these insects were, whether they were bugs, or whether they were fleas, or what kind of insects they were, or whether they were worms of any particular description, it is of course utterly impossible for me to say. All I can say is, that that Bill which was a Bill for providing a reward to Henry Philips, for discovering a particular powder for the destruction of insects, is taken as a justification for the attempt of the House of Lords to interfere with the right of taxation of this House, and to destroy the liberties of the people.

Then, Sir, the next Bill is a Bill to the same effect. It is "Reward to Mr. Henry Phillips."

"The House was moved that the last of the Resolutions which upon the 21st day of June last were reported from the Committee of the Whole House, to whom it was referred to consider further of the Supply granted to His Majesty, and was then agreed to by the House, might be read."

And so on. That Bill is to the same effect as the preceding one, "Phillips's Powder Bill," and, therefore, I will pass it over.

Then, next, Sir, I come to the Lotteries Regulation Bill, and I find—

"The Order of the Day being read for the third reading of the Bill entitled 'An Act for amending and more effectually carrying into execution an Act made in the 22nd year of the reign of His present Majesty entitled "An Act for Licensing Lottery Office Keepers, and regulating the sale of Lottery Tickets"—and for hearing counsel against the same."

That Bill contained penalties of a most severe character, and into the particulars of it I need not go; it is a Bill which contained the penalty of death in certain cases, and, therefore, I submit to the House that that Bill cannot be quoted as a precedent here.

Then, Sir, I come to two Bills which have a peculiar significance, as having been referred to by a noble Lord, who is greatly distinguished in the other House of Parliament, and whose opinions certainly are entitled to great weight, but who has treated the question somewhat in the spirit of a partisan. I am sorry to say that the noble Lord to whom I refer quoted this Bill, but he quoted it with the omission of the statement which is to be found in this book annexed to it. I shall merely say that if this Bill can be quoted by any noble Lord, whether the justification was made in the House of Commons or out of it—all I can say is, that it was a grievous misquotation, and if this Bill was quoted without a reference to that which I am now going to call the attention of the House to, it was not only not an apposite quotation, but it was not an honest one. It is the Cocoa-nuts Duty Bill. That was a Bill entitled "An Act for charging a Duty on Foreign Cocoa-nuts imported into the British Plantations." Imported where, I ask? Not into England, or into the United Kingdom, but imported into "the British Plantations." It is also—of the reign of his present Majesty to permit the removal of sheep from the ports of Southampton to Cowes; and for permitting the removal of sheep and lambs and all other goods (not liable to duty on exportation, or prohibited to be exported) between the said ports reciprocally without cocket or bond, under certain regulations and restrictions; for empowering the collectors and controllers of the customs to grant licences to open boats of certain descriptions free from stamp duties on bonds; for subjecting tub boats of certain build and dimensions, and vessels of certain tonnage to which they belong (except square-rigged vessels), and also vessels with sliding or moveable keels to forfeiture."

"For reviving an Act made in the Sixth year

Now, Sir, I submit to the House, in the first place, that this is a Bill with reference to cocoa-nuts imported, not into England, not into the United Kingdom, but it is a Bill with reference to cocoa-nuts imported into the British Plantations. I submit to the House, in the second place, that it is a Bill which is an obvious tack; because it includes provisions with regard to the removal of sheep from the ports of Southampton and Portsmouth to Cowes; and further it is a Bill with regard to the forfeiture of certain vessels, if they happen to be of a certain build and dimension, and not in accordance with the regulations of the Legislature. I therefore pass from the Cocoa-nut Bills, because the grounds upon which they were passed are perfectly clear.

Then, Sir, we have the Lottery Bill which is "An Act for Granting to His Majesty a certain Sum of Money to be raised by a Lottery." I do not see the bearing of that upon the present case before the House; and I will, therefore, not occupy the time of the House by making any remark upon it.

We now come to No. 68, which is the Malt Duties Bill. We find that when that Bill was brought up, a Standing Order, No. 25, was read; and the Bill was rejected. This Bill is quoted here as a great precedent; there was no line of demarcation drawn; it swells the number of those precedents which have been referred to by various speakers; but this Bill is an obvious tack. I find here—

"The Order of the Day being Read for the House to be put into a Committee upon the Bill, entitled, 'An Act for Continuing and Granting to His Majesty certain duties upon Malt in Great Britain, for the service of the year 1807.'"

This is an obvious tack, because it says it was a Bill for

"Removing doubts with respect to signing the Exchequer Bills issued pursuant to two Acts of the last Session of Parliament for granting to His Majesty certain Duties upon Malt in Great Britain, and upon Sugar, Malt, Tobacco, and Snuff in Great Britain."

And then we find that when the Bill was brought before the House of Lords it was moved that the Standing Order be read; and the Standing Order was read, "that no clause be annexed to a Money Bill foreign to the matter thereof." "The same was accordingly read by the Clerk;" and it was then ordered that the said Bill be rejected. And I find this—

"Ordered that an entry be made in the Journals of this House of the reasons which induced the House to give leave for the bringing in the Bill now Ordered.

"Memorandum containing all the Provisions meant to be enacted in this Bill, together with other matters which had already passed the House in this Session; but as the House were now informed by a Member in his place, that the same had been rejected in the House of Lords on account of its containing multifarious matter; therefore the House permitted this Bill to be ordered in some of the matters contained in the former Bill.

"It was moved that no clause should be added to a Money Bill foreign to the matter contained in that Bill; that the Standing Order to that effect should be read; and that the Standing Order was read; and that it was then Ordered that the Bill be rejected, and the Bill was rejected."

Why, I ask the House, was that Bill rejected? That Bill was rejected, because it was a direct invasion and inroad upon the Resolution of the House of Lords.

Then, Sir, the next Bill is the Extra Post Bill. It was a Bill for the purpose of authorizing His Majesty's Postmaster General to receive certain additional rates of postage for the conveyance of letters and packets on the establishment of an extra Post in Great Britain. That is a Bill upon which I shall say nothing further than that it was a Bill which was withdrawn ultimately; and it really is not a Bill that affects, in any degree, the question now before the House.

Now then, Sir, we come to a series of Corn Bills; and there we have a Bill rejected, no doubt, on the 12th of June, 1827; but what do we find a little further? In the first place, we find that the Bill was a tack; and, in the second place, we find that a few days later, on the 19th, the Bill having been read on the 12th of June, 1827, on the 19th of June, only seven days afterwards, a second Bill was brought in and passed. Therefore here you have the House of Commons, within a week after the first Bill had been rejected by the House of Lords, sending up the same Bill; omitting the tack which made the objection to it, in the first instance, and then you have that Bill passed by the House of Lords without any addition.

[Second Night.

Then you have The Excise Licences Sale of Spirits Bill, and The Stamp Duties Assimilation Bill, which was a Bill to assimilate tacks under previous Statutes.

Then, Sir, we have The Public Revenue and Consolidated Fund Charges Bill. That Bill contained numerous tacks of a similar character to those contained in other Bills to which I have called the attention of the House. That Bill is rejected by the House of Lords; but three days afterwards it is sent up again and is then passed.

Now then, Sir, I have gone through this part of the Select Committee connected with Bills either rejected or postponed by the House of Lords: and I ask hon. Gentlemen opposite, who are so zealous even in their silence—because, although they do not speak, they still have a mode of expressing their sentiments—I appeal to the hon. Gentlemen opposite, they have urged us to get up in this House—I ask any hon. Gentleman opposite—I ask any man on those benches to rise up—be he lawyer, or be he layman, and take the Report of the Select Committee, to demonstrate the fallacy of the argument which I have felt it my duty to address to the House; and, if that be so, here you have one chapter, at all events, of this “strange, eventful history,” which crumbles into dust at the mere touch; and which does not stand the test of either sober reason or sound logic.

But now, Sir, I approach a subject of a more significant and delicate character. I now come to public Bills, which were not strictly Bills of Supply, or Tax Bills; but which operated as a charge on the people, and which have been rejected or postponed by the House of Lords. They form part of this Report from page 61; and if I was right in what I said with regard to the former precedents, I think the House will see in a moment that these precedents are a mockery and a delusion; for there is nothing in them at all bearing upon this question before us; and I think that the House will agree with me in thinking that they ought not to have been included and ranked on an equality with the other precedents. The first Bill is a Bill “For taking, examining, and stating the Public Accounts of the Kingdom.” I do not know what taking, examining, and stating the public accounts of the kingdom has to do with the question, whether or not a Bill inflicting an injury upon the public of this country, has been rejected or postponed by the House of Lords.

Then, Sir, we come to the “Dundee Duty on Beer Bill.” Now, let us see what that is. That is a Bill entitled,

“An Act for continuing a Duty of Twopenny Scots, or one sixth part of a Penny Sterling laid upon every Scots pint of Ale and Beer sold within the Town of Dundee, and privileges thereof; for paying the public debts of the said Town, or endowing a new Church; and for other purposes therein mentioned.”

Therefore here is a Bill which not merely regulates the sale of beer at Dundee, but which also regulates the religious principles of the people of Dundee, and which provides, not only the price of each pint of ale, but which also provides for a new church. I submit to the House, therefore, that that precedent does not apply to the case before us.

Then, Sir, here is a precedent; and I certainly should very much like to hear from some hon. Member of the Committee what it means. It is Lord W. Poulett's Bill. What that was, I really do not know. At all events, it seems to be very mysterious in its character. There I find, after some time spent in considering the subject of the Bill:

“The Lord De la Warr reported for the said Committee, that they had gone through the Bill, and made some Amendments thereto; but upon consideration of the whole, find several things contained in the said Bill unparliamentary and unprecedented, entrenching on the rights and privileges and derogatory to the honour of the House, and therefore did not think fit to proceed any further in the Bill without having the direction of the House.”

See what words the other House of Parliament can use! So that this has nothing to do with the millions or the masses of the country, this is declared to be unparliamentary and unprecedented, entrenching on their rights and privileges, and derogatory to the honour of the House. These are words I like. They are not mindful of the rights and privileges of this House—they are not tender with regard to our feelings. We send Bills up to them, and they send them back to us accompanied with language worthy of them and setting upon record an example which they appear to consider is worthy of being adopted. No doubt the increased revenue of the Post Office was an important matter to be considered. This is dated so far back as 1789, and, as I was not born myself till a good many years afterwards, I may be excused, perhaps, for not recollecting it so well as the more ancient friends of mine near me do; but I think that the fact of the Bill having been thrown out by the House of Lords is not a precedent for the House of Commons conceding to the House of Lords the right of resisting the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Tax.

Mr. Digby Seymour

Now, the last Bill is this New Church of Scotland Bill. The Bill was entitled an Act for Building and Promoting the Building of Additional Churches in Scotland. But surely that is no precedent. What, I ask the House, has that Bill relating to a religious question to do with the question of Supply? What has that Bill to do with the question of the rejection of a Bill inflicting an impost of duty upon an article which is used by the people of this country?

Now, Sir, I have called the attention of the House to every one of the precedents under the two heads which bear principally upon the question before us, and I now come to the last head, which I do not intend to go through with much minuteness. But I have taken the trouble of analysing the Bills in that list headed "Precedence for the rejection by the House of Lords of Bills of Supply and Taxation," and I think that the observations which I have made before, apply only with increased strength, apply à fortiori when we come to this. The noble Lord said last night, and I will quote his words in order that there may be no mistake,—

"There are, however, precedents which bear directly upon the point at issue, because between the year 1714 and the present time there have been about thirty-six cases of Bills for repealing duties or imposts of some kind or other which have been sent up to the Lords, and have been rejected by them, or at least have not come down again to this House."

Now, Sir, I come to those Bills, and I find the number to be exactly thirty-six. It can hardly be called thirty-six. In the first place you must strike one off, because that was the Paper Duty Assessed Tax. I therefore think that was not quite correct, strictly speaking, a Bill that could be considered strictly applicable, because it sounds something like a special demurrer, but there are in fact thirty-five Bills. I find that there are eleven Bills which, in no sense of the term, can be quoted as precedents or examples for our guidance, or warning, or direction. In the first place there is the Wine Merchants Bond Bill and the Tobacco and Wine Merchants Bill, which would affect only a particular interest, but which clearly are not Bills which affect the general taxation of the country. There are two Bills, namely, the Custom House Officers Fees Abolition Bill, and the Tithe Commutation Bill, which do not at all apply. They have nothing whatever to do with this question. There is then the Highways Bill, which relates to the Highways of the country, and there is the Court of Session Bill in Scotland which relates to tolls on steam carriages—it is a Toll Bill regulating the Management of Railways in Scotland; and there is the Stone Bottles Bill, about which we heard from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night. Then we have the sale of Game Bill, relating to matters connected with the game certificates, the Church Rates Abolition Bill, relating to matters affecting religious sections in this country, but which has nothing whatever to do with the right of Supply or the sources of revenue payable by or imposed on Her Majesty's subjects at large. Here we have therefore eleven Bills which cannot be fairly quoted in any sense of the word. Then there are five Bills which I cannot conceive how it is that they have been introduced into this Report at all. There is the Highways Bill—that was read a first time in the House of Lords, and no division upon it took place—it was not pressed to a division. There is the Inland Navigation (Ireland) Bill, which was not pressed to a division. There is the Roman Catholic Land Taxation Bill, there is the Tobacco Growth Prohibition Bill—that was also read a first time in the House of Lords, and there is the Tithes Abolition Bill which was also read a first time in the Lords. But these five Bills perished the moment they got within the walls of the House—they were never debated—no division ever took place with regard to them, they were simply printed by order of the House and abandoned by the promoters. Therefore these Bills cannot be said to have been rejected or postponed—they simply died of inanition or some other cause in their early infancy, and they certainly, not one of them, can be drawn as a precedent.

Then, Sir, I find seven other Bills which were all brought in and which were sent again to the House of Lords in the same Session and passed, with the exception of one that was passed in the subsequent Session. Therefore I submit that these Bills are Bills which went up into the House of Lords with regard to which the House of Lords seems to have exercised their authority; but this House did not submit to the rejection of the Bills, but sent the Bills back to the House of Lords.

[Second Night.

Then, Sir, there remains another class of Bills, the last with which I will trouble the House, and to which it is necessary I should call their attention. I am sure that what I am now doing may not be considered a very ambitious duty or a very pleasing one. I might have taken less trouble and time had I contented myself merely with dealing with platitudes in this House and in mere speaking without calling the attention of the House to them. I have thought it my bounden duty to go through these precedents which have been brought before us in the Report of the Select Committee. I have felt it my duty to go through these precedents and, as truthfully as I can, to give the House the result of my honest judgment. There are twelve other Bills, and amongst them the Woollen Manufactures Bill, and the Coasting Trade Regulation Bill. They are every one of them Bills, whether they affect the workers in brass or the workers in coal-mines, whether they affect the manufacturers in the north or the agriculturists in the south, they are all Bills connected with a particular trade or policy. They are all Bills connected with matters of policy in the purviews and gist of the Bills, and they are not one of them Bills which were sent up to the House of Lords as Bills of Supply. There is not one of them a Bill which formed part of the provisions of the Ways and Means of the year, still less is there one of them a Bill like the Paper Duties Bill brought in as part of the Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and forming one of the conditions on which other portions of it were adopted.

Now, then, Sir, I have gone through that Report, and if my argument be correct—if there be no precedent—if neither in the rejection of Bills which directly charged the public, or in the rejection of Bills which imposed duties upon the public, or in the rejection of Bills which repeal a tax upon the public—if there be no precedent—if the Rolls of the House of Lords and its records have been searched and ransacked in vain—if the eyes of the hon.

Mr. Digby Seymour

Gentlemen who sat upon that Committee have peeped into every corner and crevice with no other result than I have stated, if they have only been able to bring up these Bills that I have just referred to, why, Sir, all I can say is, it is not fair—it is not dealing honestly with this House to call upon this House to avoid maintaining its privileges, and telling the House of Lords in the face of the Commons of England, and in the name of the Commons of England, that not having a precedent for the course which they have taken, and ours being a Constitution whose pivot and basis is in use and in custom, that they have violated the privileges of this House, and that they have thrown an affront upon the constitutional representatives of the country. But if these precedents are wanting, why restrict the proposed precedents to 1628? Why were the framers of this Report content to draw a line at 1628?—I do hope and trust that hon. Members will not be content to let their conduct be directed or regulated solely by precedents arising since that period—I believe that the rights of this House, Sir, are much older than 1628. In the earliest chapters of History I find precedents. I submit to the House that the Committee ought to have gone back to the times of the Stuarts and the Tudors, even to the earlier days of the contests between the Houses of York and Lancaster—the Wars of the Roses, and I believe that, in the earliest chapters of our Constitutional History, you will find in language which cannot be gainsayed in words which stand out in bold relief, a distinct and explicit avowal of the right of the Commons alone to control the Supplies and taxation of the country. Sir, allow me to call the attention of the House for a moment to one or two precedents which appear to me to be worth 10,000 such flimsy precedents as those which appear in the Report which has been presented to the House. In the year 1515 I find something recorded upon the Rolls of Parliament which I believe is worthy of the attention of the House. I find a record there that the Supplies were granted by the Commons alone, without even the formal assent of or any reference whatever to the House of Lords; and, Sir, I find on looking to that same enactment on the other side of that very Roll on which this principle is engrafted—I find it recorded that the Lords and Commons have acted together in questions of arms, thus showing that the distinction between Lords and Commons existed—that they acted together in questions of arms, but that the Commons alone acted in the matter of Supply. Now, Sir, we come to 1404, and let me see whether there is a precedent there. In that year, according to the Rolls of Parliament in the 6th year of Henry the Fourth, I find this precedent a somewhat significant one. The Commons in 1404 granted a subsidy, and they annexed to it the following condition—that the subsidy should be expended upon the defence of the realm according to the intent of the Grant and no other, as the Treasurers for War should answer to the Commons in the next Parliament. So I say here. It is not here merely a voting of Supply, but here is a calling upon the country upon the Treasurers of War to account for the expenditure of that Supply, not to the Lords and Commons, but to the Commons of the Realm in this Parliament.

Now, Sir, I come to another precedent, one of still greater importance, and a precedent which, mutatis mutandis, putting the paper duty in the place of woolskins and woolfells, expresses the very same position in which we stand to the House of Lords. I refer to a Resolution of still greater importance—I refer to a Resolution as old as the year 1407—the ninth of Henry the Fourth. What does that Resolution declare? I should say that I now come to the year of that celebrated indemnity of the Lords and Commons. The statute to which I refer applies in this way—the Lords deemed it necessary that they should have, for the purpose of the Supply for the year, a continuation of the tax on woolskins and woolfells. The King, according to the record of that time, assembled the Lords in the Council Chamber within the Abbey of Gloucester, and there they had sundry, sober, and weighty councils of war held upon the subject of saving the King from the hands of his enemies. The result was that it was agreed that the Lords should send to the Commons to furnish the King with a Supply in the shape of a prolongation of a tax.—As soon as the Commons heard this message they sent twelve of their body to confer with the Lords. The twelve returned and informed the House of the reasons for the demand made by the Lords. And what was the effect upon that Parliament?—What was the effect upon the Commons of England, when they were told by the Lords in 1407, that the Lords required a prolongation of a tax to help to save the King from the hands of his enemies? Now observe the language of the Record, it says—it is that “the Commons were greatly disturbed.” They were not disturbed by laughter. The Commons did not receive the communication of the Lords with a sardonic grin and ironical cheers, but were “greatly disturbed,” and declared that compliance was in great prejudice and derogation of their liberties, and the King caused it to be solemnly recorded on the Rolls of Parliament, even in that hour of his necessity, as significant of the undoubted rights of the Commons that his permitting the Lords to assent to the grant which the Commons had voted should not be drawn into a precedent. If the Commons of 1407 were greatly disturbed more than 450 years ago when they were guarding the liberties of this country, shall it be said that in 1860 we will allow those liberties to be violated and overrun?

Now, Sir, I pass from these earlier precedents and I now come to one significant precedent, which is recorded in the year 1640, because allusion has been made to that year. In the course of last night’s debate quotations were made from distinguished writers. Allow me to call attention to an extract from a work of Lord Clarendon, in which he expresses himself with respect to the position in which the Lords and Commons were placed in the year 1640. The Lords had committed a similar encroachment on the privileges of the Commons, and the Commons had demanded “satisfaction and reparation from the House of Peers.” Satisfaction and reparation from the House of Peers!—How are we to exact satisfaction, but by putting a Resolution upon the table saying that this House has the power to guard its liberties? Stop there, say that you have the sword; say that you have the weapon of defence, but do not say that you will receive a deadly blow. I submit, Sir, that this precedent shows that in the year 1640 there was not such a conciliatory disposition on the part of the House which now seems to be in the ascendant. I have not, as I said before, ventured to go through a minute detail of all that passed on that occasion, I am merely calling the attention of the House to the opinion of a great constitutional writer as to the principle which regulated the proceedings of the House of Commons at that time, and I am contending that it would be only an equivocation and a deception to say that the principle which regulates the Supply and controls the taxation does not greatly affect the question of the rejection of a Bill of this description.

[Second Night.]

Then, Sir, I come to these Resolutions, which one would have thought were a sufficient exercise of the abstract powers of this House. The noble Lord at the head of the Government must have these Resolutions too, but I ask the noble Lord in what way the Resolutions which he has put upon the books improve or add strength to the Resolutions passed in 1671, 1678, and 1689? The Resolution of 1671 declares that in all aids given to the King by the Commons, the right to tax ought not to be altered by the Lords. The Resolution of 1678 affirms that all aids and Supplies to his Majesty in Parliament are the sole gift of the Commons. If ever words could be used to express the controlling power of this House, one would think that the words of the Resolution of 1678 were those words. Then comes the Resolution of 1689, to the effect that all money raised and to be raised for the purposes of the country were the sole and entire gift of the Commons of England

Sir, the Bill for the Repeal of the Paper Duty which has been brought before the House of Lords is now thrown out. £800,000 a year is added to the Supplies of the country—who has given those Supplies, or granted that tax?—We have not done so—the House of Commons has not done so, we have refused to grant it; but they have done that in the other House which we by all these Resolutions and examples in former times have declared to be unauthorized. I submit, Sir, that it can never be said that we, who are the sole givers and granters of Supplies to the Crown, while such a state of things exists to which I have called the attention of the House—I submit, Sir, that it never can be said, that that principle is to be for one moment controverted. I shall only quote one precedent in modern times which has not been referred to in that Report—it does indirectly affect the question, and being a late precedent I will call the attention of the House to it. Sir, I refer to the Debate on the Municipal Corporations Bill for Ireland on the 7th of August, 1839. I find there “a Bill which as it passed the Commons contained clauses with certain power which was hitherto exercised by grant—

(reading down to)

“hereby exercised them,” therefore the House of Commons proposed to deprive certain persons of the right to impose taxation. The Lords continued the powers of those parties. What says the Speaker of that day?—The Speaker said:

“If he correctly understood the question, it had reference to those Clauses in the Bill—(reading down to,)

“have never consented and never would consent to any alteration being made.”

Now here, Sir, is a modern precedent so late as the year 1839, which shows, even with regard to the powers of grand jurors in Ireland, how properly jealous the Speaker of that day was to show the House of Commons that the House of Lords had no right whatever to make an Amendment.

Now, Sir, I have stated the grounds upon which I have ventured to address the House, feebly, it is true, but at the same time carefully, I hope, because I have been anxious that there should be no mistake—why I ask the House not to be simply content with the reciting part of the noble Lord's Resolutions—not to be content with a simple abstract principle, but manfully and distinctly to draw the obvious conclusion from those precedents to which it is better that a clear enunciation shall be given, in order that the future generation can look to this as a precedent to guide them. I say that I have given these reasons for the purpose of showing why we should draw a conclusion from those principles, and declare that the Lords have infringed upon the rights of the Commons. Sir, I quite agree with the distinction which was drawn by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier). There is a wide difference between the letter of the law and the spirit of the Constitution; there is a wide difference between the mere exercise of power and the exercise of it in such a manner as shall invade the principle of the other House of Parliament. Sir, we have examples pervading throughout the whole system. The spirit and practice of the law says, that the right of taxation rests with the Commons. The spirit of the law and practice, says, that the House of Lords even may amend a Bill; the spirit of the Constitution, says, you have no right to do it—that it is an invasion of the rights of the British House of Commons. The technical rule of law, says, that the Queen may reject a Bill sent up to Her from the House of Commons, but the spirit of the Constitution is averse to such a proceeding. The past declares that the exercise of that right would be a wrong done and an affront to the Constitution. So I say in this question, however much technicalities may be in favour of the course pursued by the House of Lords, the spirit of the Constitution will condemn it.

Mr. Digby Seymour

Sir, I therefore agree with my hon. and learned Friend—I think that my hon. and learned Friend put this question upon the proper ground when he asserted the distinction between the practice of the law and the spirit of the Constitution. In conclusion, Sir, I do not speak in any revolutionary spirit of the practice of the House of Lords: I believe that distinctions of order are necessary in a State; I believe that the House of Peers is highly important in the working harmoniously of the Constitution of this country. I hope that the day may be long distant indeed when even the most sanguine can hold out to himself the prospect of there being no House of Lords; but I believe that that House will maintain its honour and its dignity in an efficient condition so long as it is content with its sole high and dignified duties, and not attempting to make an invasion upon the valued rights and privileges of the Commons. I disclaim any antagonistic feeling whatever towards the House of Peers, and I trust that the result of this debate will be that which will conduce to the safety, to the dignity, and to the usefulness of both Houses, and I trust that, notwithstanding the warnings which have been held out—notwithstanding the picture which has been drawn of the result of a conflict between the Lords and the Commons—I trust it may be said by and bye, in the spirit of that Prayer which on every Sabbath day is offered up at the altar,

“That all things may be so settled by our endeavors upon the best and surest foundation, that peace and happiness, truth and Justice, Religion and Piety may be established amongst us.”

Sir, I shall reserve to myself the right of moving the Amendment of which I have given notice as an addition to the three Resolutions of the noble Lord at the head of the Government.

MR. HORSMAN: * Sir, I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, as to the magnitude and importance of the question before us. But its magnitude and importance have not now come upon me for the first time. On the very first occasion that the Budget was discussed in this House, I ventured to single out the proposition for the repeal of the paper duty as the subject for an humble and respectful warning to the House—not, indeed, couched in the vigorous and startling phraseology of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who speaks of “a gigantic innovation”—but, expressing the same sentiment in feebler and more diluted language: I stated that this was the most important financial measure submitted to Parliament by any Minister in our day, whether for the principle it involved or the consequences to which it must inevitably lead. After an interval of some weeks, when the question was brought more directly before us, on the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Somersetshire (Sir William Miles), I ventured again to employ the same words, both as to the principle and the consequences of that measure. Since then I have watched with unabated interest the progress, I may say the change, of opinion upon it. I have seen how it gradually came to be less favourably regarded in this House, how it became less popular in the country, how it rose to be a source of embarrassment to the Ministry—subjecting them to a mortifying discomfiture in the other House of Parliament, raising the most serious Constitutional question that could be raised as to the relation of the two Houses with each other—and threatening consequences which have only been averted because in the head of the Government there have been exhibited a calm sagacity and sound constitutional views which, unhappily, are not shared by all who occupy the Treasury Bench. I listened with great satisfaction to the speech of the noble Lord, because I saw in it a gratifying fulfilment of the assurance which he gave to the House when he moved for the Committee, that that was not a step intended to provoke a collision between the two Houses; but it was a still greater satisfaction to me to gather from some portions of his speech that he had a distinct perception and appreciation of that which is one of the greatest political problems of our day—how to reconcile the inevitable growth of the House of Commons with the maintenance of a mixed form of Government and a balanced Constitution. That danger and that necessity did not appear to have presented themselves to the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The noble Lord wishes to make the independence of the Lords a reality; the Chancellor of the Exchequer seems to desire that it should be a fiction. The noble Lord would place them in a position which the Constitution had assigned to them—of entire independence of the House of Commons; his colleague would raise the House of Commons into an absolute position and place the Peerage at his feet.

[Second Night.]

The Chancellor of the Exchequer asked a question to which I should like to give an answer. He asked, "Is it the Constitution of this country that the financial policy of the Commons should be reviewed by the Lords?" Before I answer that question in detail I will meet it by another—Is the Budget of the Minister a question between Downing Street and the House of Commons? If it be, then I admit that the Lords' interference with that Budget is an intrusion, a meddlesome and unconstitutional intrusion; but if the Budget, instead of being a matter between the Minister and the House of Commons, is in reality a question between the House of Commons and the country, then, if the Commons run riot, there comes in the power of the Lords, which the Constitution has provided as a check. Let me ask another question. Is it not the first law of our Constitution that there is no power in this country without control and without responsibility? But where is the check or control upon a House of Commons recently elected, that has five years to live, that is elected upon reform, and, throwing aside reform, begins to play tricks with finance? Why, a House of Commons in that condition may ruin the country before a dissolution can take place; and therefore I say that the power of the House of Lords to review and to check the financial policy of the Commons—a power which can be rarely exercised, and which ought to be kept for most exceptional occasions—is a power vested in them as directly, as distinctly, and as constitutionally as that of interfering with any other political matter that may be submitted to them.

I am not going into any question of precedent, except one point—and that not so much to prove the bearing of precedents on the present case, as to show what were, in times referred to, the constitutional relations of the two Houses, as insisted on by the Peers in that very remarkable controversy, recited by our Committee, on the Bill for "An Importation of Foreign Commodities," and on which, for his management of the Conference, the Attorney General received the thanks of the House of Commons. The Lords on that occasion met a very strong Resolution of the Commons, by one of their own, declaring what at that time they considered to be their Constitutional rights. They say—

"That the power exercised by the House of Peers, in making the Amendments and Abatements in the Bill intituled 'An Act for additional Imposition on several Foreign Commodities, and for Encouragement of several Commodities and Manufactures of this Kingdom,' both as to the matter, measure, and time, concerning the rates and impositions on merchandise, is a fundamental, inherent, and undoubted right of the House of Peers, from which they cannot depart."

Mr. Horman

Then in their "reasons" they go on—

"Consult the writs of summons to Parliament, and you will find the Lords are excluded from none of the great and arduous affairs of the kingdom and Church of England; but are called to treat and give their counsel upon them all, without exception."

In another "reason," which is important with regard to an argument which has been used elsewhere, they add—

"If positive assertion can introduce a right, what security have the Lords that the House of Commons shall not in other Bills (pretended to be for the general good of the Commons, whereof they will conceive themselves the fittest judges) claim the same peculiar privilege, in exclusion of any deliberation or alteration of the Lords when they shall judge it necessary or expedient?"

Those were the Constitutional rights asserted by the House of Lords. I do not say that they have been, or that they ought to be, maintained to the extent then claimed, but at least they show that the absolute power claimed by the Commons has not passed undisputed. The fact is, whenever such rights are asserted in opposition to the Commons, the Lords must come into collision with the Commons. But collisions between the two Houses are in effect appeals to the nation. If the Commons are right they must, upon a great question, override the Lords. If the Commons are essentially in the wrong, the Lords may defy and correct the Commons. There is no authority, either in the Lords or Commons, against the other: the real authority rests with the nation, as the Court of ultimate appeal, by the decision of which both parties must abide.

In what form, then, does this question come before the nation? It was said most truly by the Chancellor of the Exchequer last night, and has been repeated by the hon. Gentleman to-night, that this rejection of the repeal of the paper duties is not the mere rejection of a Money Bill; it is, and must be admitted to be, the reversal of a financial policy. It was in that character that we contested—that we condemned—the Bill in this House; not as the repeal of an insignificant excise, but as part of a great and dangerous and innovating scheme of financial policy, defaced by two novelties: first, the remission of a tax with a deficiency in the Exchequer; secondly, the substitution without inquiry, and on a principle that was capable of indefinite extension, of direct for indirect taxation. The noble Lord said last night that the repeal of the paper duty was a main element of that financial policy. Sir, the repeal of the paper duty was the keystone of the whole, for it let in both these objectionable principles—the remission of a tax with a deficiency in the Exchequer, and the addition to the income tax, which was the substitution of direct for indirect taxation. That, in reality, was what the House of Lords checked and defeated when they rejected the Bill, the passing of which they believed would be as much at variance with the national sentiment as it was opposed to the national interest.

But we are told that their act was entirely against precedent. Precedents may be quoted on either side, and the manner in which they have been quoted during this discussion shows that on neither part will anything be gained by them; but the real character of these differences has been well described by the constitutional historian who was quoted last night by the right hon. Member for Bucks, and from whose work I hope the House will allow me to read a few lines, in order to dispose of this part of the question. Mr. Hallam, in his Constitutional History, chap. 13, page 197, says—

“These restrictions upon the other House of Parliament, however, are now become in their own estimation the standing privileges of the Commons. Several instances have occurred during the last century, though not, I believe, very lately, when Bills, chiefly of a private nature, have been unanimously rejected, and even thrown over the table by the Speaker, because they contained some provision in which the Lords had trespassed upon these alleged rights. They are, as may be supposed, very differently regarded in the neighbouring chamber. The Lords have never acknowledged any further privilege than that of originating Bills of Supply. But the good sense of both parties, and of an enlightened nation, who must witness and judge of their disputes, as well as the natural desire of the Government to prevent in the outset any altercation that must impede the course of its measures, have rendered this little jealously unproductive of those animosities which it seemed so happily contrived to excite. The one House, without admitting the alleged privilege, has generally been cautious not to give a pretext for eagerly asserting it; and the other, on the trifling occasions where it has seemed, perhaps unintentionally, to be infringed, has commonly resorted to the moderate course of passing a fresh Bill to the same effect, after satisfying its dignity by rejecting the first.”

And this statement of Mr. Hallam's is replete with truth and reason. The extreme views of neither House can nor ought to be insisted on, and their mutual moderation and good sense must smooth difficulties otherwise embarrassing to both.

Let me now say of the precedents of which we have heard so much, that, in my opinion, their importance is often exaggerated, because it is not sufficient to show that they are analogous in their character; it must also be shown that they are applicable to the present time. Our privileges are the growth of time, and even of accident. Every era has its own precedents, and the precedents of one era are not applicable to another. No precedent has been more dwelt upon than that of 1678, and yet it is in many respects inapplicable to the circumstances and the Constitution of the present day. In 1678 there were no Ministers responsible to the House of Commons—there was no Government in its modern sense—there were no annual Budgets—no complete statement of the income and expenditure of the country—no elaborate review of the national finances—no enunciation of the principles which the Chancellor of the Exchequer chose to adopt. Most of the public revenue was then voted for the natural life of the Sovereign. Hence the control of the Commons over the financial affairs of the country was at that time very limited, and the power of the House very small. Hence, also, it became necessary to be extremely tenacious as to Money Bills. So great was the power of the Crown, that if Money Bills could have been originated or modified in the Lords, advantage would often have been taken of the weakness of the Commons, and a serious blow dealt at their power in the State.

Every one knows that, during the reign of Charles II. (from which the most important precedents are taken), the nation was always in imminent danger of despotism. The Appropriation Act, one of the greatest safeguards of the Commons, was then unknown; the command over the Supplies was almost the only weapon of the Commons. But against whom was that weapon used? Not against the Lords, as Gentlemen would have us now believe. Any one listening to the speeches delivered in this debate might imagine that it was the Lords who were perpetually threatening and assailing the liberties of the Commons; and that these Resolutions of Privilege, behind which we are now again to entrench ourselves in alarm, were directed against them. But it is notorious that these Resolutions were all directed—not against the Lords, but against the Crown, which attempted to act on the Commons through the Lords, and had facilities in the Lords for furthering its designs that it had not in the Commons.

[Second Night.]

But does that bear any analogy to the present case? and can it be pretended that the condition and circumstances of the Commons in those days—the wise jealousy then shown of the encroachments of the Crown—and the defences thrown up in an age when their rights were perpetually besieged and their liberties were insecure, are really such a precedent as to constitute a guide and obligation and necessity for us in the full enjoyment of the liberties of 1860?

But if we turn to the other branch of the Legislature, it will be found that still greater changes have taken place in the relations of the Lords both to the Crown and the House of Commons. I was amazed to hear the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth assert last night that the Revolution of 1688 made no change in the relations of the two Houses or in the Parliamentary Government of the country. I have always believed that the revolution of 1688, in the new distribution of political power, made one of the greatest changes that was ever made in the Parliamentary Government of England. It placed the Government of England in the hands of great families, and from 1688 to 1832 the power of the peerage was immense. The Peers made and unmade Governments. By their influence at Court, by their wealth, relatively so great before the extension of commerce, by their close connection with the landed gentry, by their absolute sway in so many boroughs, they set up and threw down Cabinets with a power greater than that either of the Crown or Commons, greater even than the power of both combined. There was, therefore, no need to excite jealousies and dissensions with the Commons by taking up questions on finance and money Bills for which the House was not then well adapted. The financial arrangements of the country developed themselves in the Commons, and the Lords could accomplish all they desired in finance by their indirect influence in that House. No financial burdens were imposed on them as peers. As landlords they were in close alliance of sentiment and power with the landed interest in the House of Commons, and the feelings and interests of the Peers in matters of taxation and finance were identical with those of the predominant power within the House of Commons. There was no motive, therefore, either as regarding the personal interests of the peerage or the expectation that the financial policy of the Commons would or could be revised by an independent and essentially different body for setting the House of Lords in Motion on money Bills sent up from the Commons.

Mr. Horsman

But the Act of 1832—which is the constitution under which we now live, and which has been strangely overlooked and forgotten by the assertors of Privilege on the present occasion—changed all that. It transferred the power over the State to the middle class and the constituencies that elect the Commons. The peerage no longer, directly or indirectly, rules the country. The landed interest is no longer dominant in the Commons. The commercial interests have their due share of power; and it may perhaps be thought, judging from the experience of the present Session, that they have something more. The effect of the Act of 1832 on the House of Lords was fully as great as on the House of Commons. The House of Commons became a truer representation of the people, because it ceased to be a representation of the Lords. The new power given to the Commons was so much taken from the Lords, and in proportion as the Commons were strengthened the Lords were weakened.

But while the Act of 1832 deprived the Peers of powers they had usurped, it became only the more necessary to secure and strengthen them in that legitimate authority which the constitution really intended them to possess. Losing their territorial ascendancy, they were thrown back on those functional services which became the condition of their existence. They were to give to the nation those legislative services without which their institution would be a fiction. They are established as a second council of the nation—to provide for the nation that security which all constitutional Governments have sought in the existence of a second Chamber, as the only safeguard against the despotism of democracy.

But Gentlemen around me, ignoring all those changes, forgetting that the House of Commons, instead of being the weakest is now the strongest power in the State,— and, instead of defending with difficulty its own rights, threatens to override and absorb all other rights, and to assume the whole government of the country—follow the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who made a speech last night in the spirit, if not in the language, of those who look upon the House of Lords as an anomaly, to be tolerated only so long as, with a becoming consciousness of its inferiority, it consents to register the edicts of the Commons, and receive from these new expounders of the Constitution that certificate of good behaviour which graciously prolongs to it an existence on sufferance.

The speeches we have heard—able and instructive as to the past—impressive as to the present—derive their greatest interest and importance from their ominous character as to the future; for they suggest an inquiry which, I think, could not be long delayed as to the constitution and powers and functions of the House of Lords. It has been found convenient by some speakers to assume that the Lords are a privileged class—distinct and separate from the nation—with interests even antagonistic to the people at large. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government, in one passage of his speech last night, when he spoke of the ancient Barons, must have carried back the imagination of some Members to those feudal times when the Barons sat with armed retainers, exercising authority for themselves, dispensing justice in their own names, and recognizing no laws but those of their own making; and I think that the tone of some even of the most moderate speakers must have conveyed to the House an idea that the Lords are still a proud and domineering and dangerous class, against whom the Commons and people of England should be perpetually on the watch as against a common enemy.

But happily the daily experience and common sense of every man amongst us suffices to correct such delusions. We see that the Lords of our modern times are no longer the masters but the fellow-subjects of the people—obeying the same laws, paying the same taxes, ruled by the same interests, and having no exclusive privilege whatever.

In their individual capacity the Peers are country gentlemen; and they derive weight and influence in their localities from precisely the same causes as other country gentlemen, not from the titles they bear, but from the property they possess.

VOL. CLIX. [THIRD SERIES.]

In their collective capacity, as a legislative body, they are a national institution—created by opinion—maintained by opinion—and no more existing for the exclusive benefit of the peerage than the Crown exists for the exclusive benefit of the Royal family; and they exercise power, not in their own name and by their own authority, but in the name and by the authority of the people, of whom they are a part just as much as we are a part, and whom they represent as constitutionally as we represent them. As this is a point which lies at the bottom of the whole question, I will cite the authority of a constitutional statesman, who was quoted last night. Burke, on the constitutional relation of the Peers to the people, says,—

“For it is not the derivation of the power of that House (Commons) from the people which makes it in a distinct sense their representative. The King is the representative of the people; so are the Lords; so are the Judges. They are all trustees of the people as well as the Commons, because no power is given for the sole sake of the holder; and, although Government certainly is an institution of divine authority, yet its forms, and the persons who administer it, all originate from the people. A popular origin cannot, therefore, be the characteristic distinction of a popular representative. This belongs equally to all parts of Government, and in all forms.”

This establishes that the Lords, as well as the Commons, are the representatives and the trustees of the national interest. Although they are the wealthiest class in the nation, they are not less on that account a national class, but the reverse. For there is this peculiar feature in the English Peers, to which too much weight cannot be given in this discussion, that, as contrasted with nobles of other countries, who, relying solely on their titles, have been swept away by the first storm, the English Peers have this great element of strength, that they are a body of landowners—that is to say, they derive their wealth from that trade which is the greatest trade in the country. Their revenues are intimately associated with the prosperity of that trade which employs and supports the greatest number of the people, and is the most productive industry in the nation. This gives them a vital sympathy with the progress and improvement of the people; it identifies them with the people; and no one can compare the peerage of England with the aristocracy of any other country without perceiving how they are eminently distinguished for habits of business, for knowledge of agriculture, for entrench ourselves in alarm, were directed against them. But it is notorious that these Resolutions were all directed—not against the Lords, but against the Crown, which attempted to act on the Commons through the Lords, and had facilities in the Lords for furthering its designs that it had not in the Commons.

But does that bear any analogy to the present case? and can it be pretended that the condition and circumstances of the Commons in those days—the wise jealousy then shown of the encroachments of the Crown—and the defences thrown up in an age when their rights were perpetually besieged and their liberties were insecure, are really such a precedent as to constitute a guide and obligation and necessity for us in the full enjoyment of the liberties of 1860?

But if we turn to the other branch of the Legislature, it will be found that still greater changes have taken place in the relations of the Lords both to the Crown and the House of Commons. I was amazed to hear the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth assert last night that the Revolution of 1688 made no change in the relations of the two Houses or in the Parliamentary Government of the country. I have always believed that the revolution of 1688, in the new distribution of political power, made one of the greatest changes that was ever made in the Parliamentary Government of England. It placed the Government of England in the hands of great families, and from 1688 to 1832 the power of the peerage was immense. The Peers made and unmade Governments. By their influence at Court, by their wealth, relatively so great before the extension of commerce, by their close connection with the landed gentry, by their absolute sway in so many boroughs, they set up and threw down Cabinets with a power greater than that either of the Crown or Commons, greater even than the power of both combined. There was, therefore, no need to excite jealousies and dissensions with the Commons by taking up questions on finance and money Bills for which the House was not then well adapted. The financial arrangements of the country developed themselves in the Commons, and the Lords could accomplish all they desired in finance by their indirect influence in that House. No financial burdens were imposed on them as peers. As landlords they were in close alliance of sentiment and power with the landed interest in the House of Commons, and the feelings and interests of the Peers in matters of taxation and finance were identical with those of the predominant power within the House of Commons. There was no motive, therefore, either as regarding the personal interests of the peerage or the expectation that the financial policy of the Commons would or could be revised by an independent and essentially different body for setting the House of Lords in Motion on money Bills sent up from the Commons.

Mr. Horsman

But the Act of 1832—which is the constitution under which we now live, and which has been strangely overlooked and forgotten by the assertors of Privilege on the present occasion—changed all that. It transferred the power over the State to the middle class and the constituencies that elect the Commons. The peerage no longer, directly or indirectly, rules the country. The landed interest is no longer dominant in the Commons. The commercial interests have their due share of power; and it may perhaps be thought, judging from the experience of the present Session, that they have something more. The effect of the Act of 1832 on the House of Lords was fully as great as on the House of Commons. The House of Commons became a truer representation of the people, because it ceased to be a representation of the Lords. The new power given to the Commons was so much taken from the Lords, and in proportion as the Commons were strengthened the Lords were weakened.

But while the Act of 1832 deprived the Peers of powers they had usurped, it became only the more necessary to secure and strengthen them in that legitimate authority which the constitution really intended them to possess. Losing their territorial ascendancy, they were thrown back on those functional services which became the condition of their existence. They were to give to the nation those legislative services without which their institution would be a fiction. They are established as a second council of the nation—to provide for the nation that security which all constitutional Governments have sought in the existence of a second Chamber, as the only safeguard against the despotism of democracy.

But Gentlemen around me, ignoring all those changes, forgetting that the House of Commons, instead of being the weakest is now the strongest power in the State,— and, instead of defending with difficulty its own rights, threatens to override and absorb all other rights, and to assume the whole government of the country—follow the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who made a speech last night in the spirit, if not in the language, of those who look upon the House of Lords as an anomaly, to be tolerated only so long as, with a becoming consciousness of its inferiority, it consents to register the edicts of the Commons, and receive from these new expounders of the Constitution that certificate of good behaviour which graciously prolongs to it an existence on sufferance.

The speeches we have heard—able and instructive as to the past—impressive as to the present—derive their greatest interest and importance from their ominous character as to the future; for they suggest an inquiry which, I think, could not be long delayed as to the constitution and powers and functions of the House of Lords. It has been found convenient by some speakers to assume that the Lords are a privileged class—distinct and separate from the nation—with interests even antagonistic to the people at large. The noble Viscount at the head of the Government, in one passage of his speech last night, when he spoke of the ancient Barons, must have carried back the imagination of some Members to those feudal times when the Barons sat with armed retainers, exercising authority for themselves, dispensing justice in their own names, and recognizing no laws but those of their own making; and I think that the tone of some even of the most moderate speakers must have conveyed to the House an idea that the Lords are still a proud and domineering and dangerous class, against whom the Commons and people of England should be perpetually on the watch as against a common enemy.

But happily the daily experience and common sense of every man amongst us suffices to correct such delusions. We see that the Lords of our modern times are no longer the masters but the fellow-subjects of the people—obeying the same laws, paying the same taxes, ruled by the same interests, and having no exclusive privilege whatever.

In their individual capacity the Peers are country gentlemen; and they derive weight and influence in their localities from precisely the same causes as other country gentlemen, not from the titles they bear, but from the property they possess.

In their collective capacity, as a legislative body, they are a national institution—created by opinion—maintained by opinion—and no more existing for the exclusive benefit of the peerage than the Crown exists for the exclusive benefit of the Royal family; and they exercise power, not in their own name and by their own authority, but in the name and by the authority of the people, of whom they are a part just as much as we are a part, and whom they represent as constitutionally as we represent them. As this is a point which lies at the bottom of the whole question, I will cite the authority of a constitutional statesman, who was quoted last night. Burke, on the constitutional relation of the Peers to the people, says,—

“For it is not the derivation of the power of that House (Commons) from the people which makes it in a distinct sense their representative. The King is the representative of the people; so are the Lords; so are the Judges. They are all trustees of the people as well as the Commons, because no power is given for the sole sake of the holder; and, although Government certainly is an institution of divine authority, yet its forms, and the persons who administer it, all originate from the people. A popular origin cannot, therefore, be the characteristic distinction of a popular representative. This belongs equally to all parts of Government, and in all forms.”

This establishes that the Lords, as well as the Commons, are the representatives and the trustees of the national interest. Although they are the wealthiest class in the nation, they are not less on that account a national class, but the reverse. For there is this peculiar feature in the English Peers, to which too much weight cannot be given in this discussion, that, as contrasted with nobles of other countries, who, relying solely on their titles, have been swept away by the first storm, the English Peers have this great element of strength, that they are a body of landowners—that is to say, they derive their wealth from that trade which is the greatest trade in the country. Their revenues are intimately associated with the prosperity of that trade which employs and supports the greatest number of the people, and is the most productive industry in the nation. This gives them a vital sympathy with the progress and improvement of the people; it identifies them with the people; and no one can compare the peerage of England with the aristocracy of any other country without perceiving how they are eminently distinguished for habits of business, for knowledge of agriculture, for personal activity in the management and improvement of their estates, for acquaintance with farmers and labourers, and a general commercial interest and feeling; and it is difficult to over-estimate the great and enduring sympathy that these qualities have won for the Peers from the people at large.

It is not true, therefore, to say that, because they are not an elective, they are in no sense a representative body. They do indirectly represent a very vast amount of the interests and feeling of the people of this country, and it fits and qualifies them the better to compose that Council of some 400 or 500 men, which is established for the express purpose of discharging constitutional functions absolutely essential to Parliamentary Government. No democratic or mixed constitution has been found capable of long duration without a similar body. If there were no House of Lords, it would be necessary to make one. They are a small portion of the people, chosen for a special purpose, and their legislative power is derived, as the power of the Crown is derived, from the people; and they exercise it, as the Crown exercises it, for the people—in the name of the people—in behalf of the people—and, above all, as a part of the people.

This is not only the theory, but in these days it is essential that it should be acknowledged as the law and practice of the constitution, for if it be not, the peerage is a fiction, and cannot be sustained.

I have dwelt on these points, because I believe that at no time in the history of England has it been so all important as at present, to set forth clearly the constitutional rights of the House of Lords, as well as the expediency and political necessity of those rights in the common interest of all, and to uphold them with the utmost vigilance. Already their admitted legislative power has been reduced to the lowest limits consistent with useful influence. They have ceased to originate great public measures, especially if they involve any general policy of state. A few professional Bills take their rise in the Lords, and others are given them to begin for mere economy of time. But the House of Commons now virtually directs the Government of England. It lays down, settles, and directs the principles of the whole policy—and even of the administration—of the State. The Crown and the Lords no longer rule—they balance and regulate—but they do not supply the movement of the State. It is this moderating influence alone which saves England from the despotism of an uncontrolled popular assembly; and, since that influence no longer acts indirectly in the Commons, it is only the more essential that its direct action in the corporation of Lords should be strengthened and preserved.

Mr. Horsman

For we know that all forms of Constitutional Government, in all ages—from ancient Athens down to modern America—have indicated by their arrangements the same deeply felt want—the necessity of a second institution—strong in itself—independent and distinct in its nature—which shall control the popular force—which shall receive, and not give, the impulse to legislation—but shall be able to command revision—to enforce time for reconsideration—to compel the moving power to think twice, and appeal from the hour of excitement to that of sobriety—which shall give effect to the permanent, and stable, and abiding element of each political organization—and yet be not strong enough to resist progress, or become an obstacle to improvement.

And this principle pervades the whole British Constitution, which is nothing but a collection of every kind of device to balance political power and give completeness to legislative change. And it is this which has made it so enduring. It allows free scope for innovation, but yet contrives that innovation shall not be carried out until the fullest examination has been brought to bear on the change.

Then how does all this affect the case of privilege before us? If the Lords claim what none among us can be so unreasonable as to deny them—identity of feelings and interests and character with the nation at large; if they profess only to be the servants of the nation, fellow-servants of the Commons, employed on the same business, charged with the same interests, obedient to the same authority, and responsible to the same tribunal of opinion,—what interest has the nation in dispensing with their services on rare and critical occasions as auditors of finance? The nation has decreed that its business shall be transacted by two Chambers, differently constituted and chosen; the one, popularly elected, and indicating every shifting gale of popular opinion,—the other, nominated by the Crown, and ordained by the people to be permanent and independent, expressly that, by its freedom from those influences to which the more impulsive Commons are exposed, it may exercise a beneficial power as a court of revision and control.

And there cannot be a greater mistake than to suppose that because the Lords are an hereditary, they are therefore an irresponsible body. On the contrary, I believe there is no other body in the kingdom so responsible. They are the only important public body that may be said to hold power by the tenure of good conduct. A few mistakes, even without anything like a pertinacious obstruction of the national will, would jeopardise their position. They saw this in 1832, when their defence of the rotten boroughs separated them from the nation in a struggle which was to them one for property as well as power. It damaged them very much; they were a long time recovering it. But they have recovered it, and we may gather even from the admissions made in this debate that, of the two Houses of the Legislature, the Lords are at this moment the most popular and revered. But they are profoundly conscious of this truth—that they can only oppose the House of Commons for one purpose—to give time for reconsideration—for a more mature and decisive demonstration of the national will—that this, and this only, is within their power—and the will of the people, once made up, and unmistakeably expressed, must be obeyed. It is hard to imagine a more genuine responsibility. The Lords have ever acknowledged and acted upon it; and every impartial student of history must admit that, on the whole, no institution known to history has shown so profound and accurate a knowledge of the feeling and movement of the nation, and has so steadily, under every form of political turmoil, made the national sentiment the basis of its own conduct.

And now I repeat the question,—on what ground of public policy or safety are the Lords to be excluded from dealing, on even the most urgent occasions, with measures of finance? On what principle can you justify that exclusion? For we must acknowledge and give weight to the truth, so frequently insisted on in this debate, that the question of finance in our day has assumed very different proportions to what it had two centuries ago. It is now the largest and most important branch of legislation. It is mixed up with every important question of national policy. To exclude the Peers from finance would be to exclude them from more than one-half of the legislative business of the country. And why are the Commons to be relieved on finance from any portion of that control which the Constitution has so carefully provided on all other matters of legislation? Are the Commons infallible in finance? Is there no unwise, or mistaken, or rash, or selfish legislation on finance? I believe that money questions are precisely those which, while they must ultimately be decided by the Commons, need, beyond all others, the balancing and regulating action of the Peers; for it is here that the temptations of constituencies and of classes to selfishness are strongest; and where particular localities or interests put an undue pressure on representatives, and would turn them into delegates, then it is that, not the public interests alone, but the secret convictions of the coerced representatives themselves, need the correcting hand of a second Chamber.

I grant that all taxes should originate with the Commons—that the initiative should be taken by that elective and more immediately responsible assembly that is constantly referred back to the constituencies. But no less essential is the reviewing power of a permanent and independent Chamber that is by its constitution more peculiarly adapted for the functions of calm deliberation and dispassionate judgment; and so much is this the case that, even if law and precedent combined, which confessedly they do not, to cast a doubt on the financial functions of the Peers, I should say that it behoved us to consider well before we enforced a construction that might unduly abridge the powers of that body.

It is undeniable that the Act of 1832 gave a preponderance of power to the Commons, and that the tendency of any further Reform Act must be in the same direction—towards a greater concentration of legislative action and authority in one chamber, to the practical disfranchisement of the other.

It is, therefore, above all things desirable, in solving doubts as to the respective rights and functions of the two Houses, to bear in mind the necessity for maintaining harmonious co-operation; and so far from narrowing the field of action for the Peers, it might be the wiser alternative to adopt a generous construction of their powers, with a view to preserving the equilibrium that is held to be essential to the safe and well-working of the Constitution.

Such being my views of the constitutional rights and functions of the Lords,—holding them to be as essentially a national body as the Commons,—with duties as varied and comprehensive, responsibilities as unlimited, and a dependance on opinion even more complete, I ask, on what grounds can we now challenge this last act of their undoubted legal power?

The repeal of the paper duty was submitted to them as a part of a great scheme of financial policy; but that policy was based on a commercial treaty which was so mixed up with the Budget that they could not be disconnected.

And if it were really and truly the opinion of the Lords, on whom much new light had broken since the Budget was first propounded in this House, that its most blissful promises were based on treacherous calculations, and that the sacrifice of revenue by which, with an empty exchequer, we had bought that treaty was now proved to be an error—if they saw our manufacturers thronging the ante-chamber of the Emperor, suppliants of his mercy to falsify their fears that their roaring trade was about to prove a bubble—if the relations of eternal peace and harmony with France, which the treaty was to secure, had already given way to disquietude, and disputation, and alarms—if, while the trumpet of war was all but sounding, the Lords durst not disregard the signal not unwisely and wickedly to multiply perils by parsimonious neglect of our defences—if, under the apparently innocuous addition of a penny to the income tax, the House of Commons had been surprised or seduced into revolutionizing our whole system of finance—and if every succeeding week since the Budget first threw these benches into an ecstasy had, to the minds of the Lords, accumulated fresh and irresistible evidence that the anticipated surplus was tending to an inevitable deficiency, and, so far from remitting taxes, it would ere long be the duty of the Minister to augment them—if such were the conclusions forced on the convictions of the Peers, and communicating themselves to the most experienced, the most thoughtful, the most dispassionate and unprejudiced on both sides of their House—what were they to do? What, in such circumstances, were they, as sworn and responsible legislators, bound to do? What did their duty to the country call on them, command them, compel them to do? Could they hesitate? To their honour, be it said, they did not hesitate; but, by a majority unprecedented, I believe—yet deriving still more importance from its character than its numbers—they interposed that veto which checked the House of Commons in its headlong, precipitate, and mad career, and challenged for their act the verdict of the country.

Mr. Horsman

By so doing, says the hon. Gentleman,—and here is the gravest count of his indictment—the Lords have perpetrated an unheard-of act of usurpation, far beyond what is even suggested by any precedent, for they have imposed an additional tax upon the people. It is not, he says, merely a refusal to remit—it is actually a right to increase taxation that they assume. This is a fallacy often repeated, but which it is not difficult to refute. It is said that the Lords have increased taxation. But what does taxation mean? Does it not mean expenditure? does it not go hand in hand with expenditure—or rather, does it not follow expenditure? Is it not, invariably, one of the first duties of the House, at the commencement of each Session, to vote what shall be the national expenditure, and go on afterwards to supply the Ways and Means? When I say, invariably, I must of course except the present year, for in this Session, for the first time in the memory of man, or, I believe, in the history of Parliament, we were persuaded, unfortunately, to reverse that practice, and to pass the Budget before we had passed the Estimates; and we are to-night reaping the fruits of that irregularity, against which it is a satisfaction to me to remember that I protested strongly at the time. But I repeat my question. Can it be affirmed that the Lords have increased the expenditure which rules the taxation of the country? We know that they have not. We know that they have taken the expenditure at the sum estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and approved and sanctioned by the House of Commons; and that they have in no way questioned the absolute and exclusive right of the Commons to determine what the expenditure shall be, or have themselves attempted or desired to increase the national burdens by a single shilling.

But the Lords have done this: as the Commons have determined the sum to be expended, and pledged Parliament to provide income to meet it, the Lords have endeavoured to retain and secure the means of fulfilling that pledge and maintaining the national credit. They think that Parliament should be in a condition to meet its engagements, but they doubt its being so if this tax should be repealed, and they decline to share the responsibility of placing the country in that discreditable and embarrassing position. They do not assume to administer the ordinary finance of the country—they know that a body of exclusively rich men must by position and nature be disqualified for such a task. They do not pretend, therefore, to make a Budget; but they do pretend, viewing that Budget and treating it as of a mixed character, combining political with financial considerations, to question the calculations that have been made, and to suspend its operation till they have been submitted to the test of time. The hon. Gentleman must see that restoring the balance of a Budget is a very different thing from imposing a new tax. What the Lords have done has been to take a just and provident and necessary security that the pretended remission of one tax does not furnish an excuse for substituting another in a new and more objectionable form.

I think I have shown that Gentlemen have somewhat mistaken, not only the relations of the two Houses of Parliament to each other, but also their relations to the country; and they have not perceived that, not only all legislative functions, but also all legislative departments, are by law common to both; and that, although a division of labour between the two Houses may be convenient, an appropriation by either House of the absolute, unchecked, and uncontrolled administration of any one department would be highly unconstitutional.

And here is the fallacy that has run through the whole of the speeches of Gentlemen on the other side; they have thought that it was enough to show that an Act is unprecedented to prove it unconstitutional. But, unhappily for their argument, our whole constitution is made up of a succession of precedents, each of them unprecedented, and most of them the growth of some unforeseen necessity, like that which has just arisen.

We live in an age that is essentially an age of precedents. The House of Commons is perpetually assuming fresh powers, and establishing new precedents. Virtually, all Bills now originate with the Commons; but this is not the consequence of any aggressive spirit in the Commons, but the necessary and inevitable result of the historic working of the English constitution. The change is just as real and deep as if it had been produced by violence, either of revolution or encroachment.

Equally so is this new act of the Lords. It was not dictated by any desire to brave or affront the Commons, or to assert the privileges of the Lords, or to acquire any additional power. It was simply the natural working of the constitution to meet a definite emergency. The novel principles of finance, to which we in this House had too hastily assented, required revision. That revision could not take place in the Commons. The majority had committed themselves by their early votes. Men do not like suddenly to reverse their votes—least of all when accountable to popular constituencies. A reversed vote has an awkward appearance on the hustings. The Budget was really a revolution in finance, into which the House of Commons had been partly coerced and partly charmed. Many who had voted in the majority had their misgivings, but did not see a remedy. The only remedy was the House of Lords; and the Lords, instinctively, from the nature of the case, and without any premeditated intention of claiming a new right, applied the remedy. The act was perfectly natural and perfectly constitutional. It was a very happy illustration of the practical self-working of our English Constitution. The Commons are ever advancing; it is the law of our system; it must not be bewailed—it is not to be combated—it can only be balanced. The equilibrium must be preserved, unless the Constitution is to be destroyed and mixed government to come to an end. Change there is—change there must be; shall it be only in the direction of the absolute power of the Commons, or shall the Lords also change and retain their relative position?

Sir, the unconscious encroachments of the Commons have quickened into life the dormant powers and latent faculties of the Lords; and this wonderful and healthy energy of the Constitution—obeying, as its law of political vitality, the all-pervading law of benevolent nature, and developing spontaneously new processes to counteract new tendencies to disease—deserves our highest admiration, as being the very best and most solid guarantee for safety and durability.

But the Constitution which I have been describing is not the Constitution which the advocates of action desire to vindicate. The Constitution in their eyes struck at by the Lords, and to the defence of which their speeches and agitation would incite us, is of a different kind. The Constitution they would set up is the despotism of the House of Commons—the tyranny of one Chamber—the absolute dominion of an unchained and irresponsible democracy.

[Second Night.]

Such a Constitution would indeed be an anomaly—unknown in England—ruinous to England—fatal to all classes and interests, to the lowest as well as the highest—to traders and artisans as well as to Peers; for we may rely upon it that, when the Upper House of Legislature ceases to be independent, the Lower House will soon cease to be a House of Representatives.

It is because I believe that the Act of 1832 gave to the Commons as much power as relatively they ought to have, and because I agree with that which was so well and truly said by the noble Lord last night, that there is, in the future, more danger to public liberty to be apprehended from the encroachments of the Commons than the usurpations of the Lords, that I am glad that the majority of the House are prepared to justify and support the Lords in the course they have pursued.

And I rejoice that we shall not be daunted by the fear of the new precedent we are establishing. For what is the precedent? It is that the Lords have opposed themselves to the Commons when the Commons have not consulted or regarded the wishes and interests of the nation? Is that a dangerous precedent? I hope for my part that it will be faithfully recorded and fearlessly followed up whenever a like necessity shall recur. It is such occasions that especially call for a House of Lords—for which a House of Lords exists and is of the utmost value—that the Lords may be sane when the Commons are wild—that they may suspend an irrevocable decision till the country has had time to recover its senses. We must remember—what some Gentlemen have been too apt to forget—that the Peerage is now the property of the nation—that it has to keep watch for the nation. On this occasion it has kept faithful watch. It has sounded an alarm that has aroused its masters and arrested you in your irregular course. If the arrest has been illegal, you have your remedy. Why do not you appeal to your judges out of doors? Is it not that your judges would affirm the decision of the Lords, and it would be shown that the Lords really represent the nation, and that the majority in the Commons only represent the Ministry?—and even that majority is of an equivocal and precarious nature—inasmuch as the noble Lord himself last night reminded us that the Ministerial majority was a vanishing quantity, which another division might, in his opinion, have turned into a minority—and in that third division it seemed only too probable that the noble Lord would have been found in an opposite lobby to his Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Horsman

The truth is, Sir, on this occasion we have no materials for a contest with the Peers, and the attempt to raise one has lamentably broken down. The law is not with us—precedents do not favour us—constitutional principle and policy are both against us—and as to the country, if we appeal to that, the nation is certain to affirm what history will most assuredly record—that this Session of 1860 has been doubly memorable—for the rashness, the recklessness, the ruinous disregard of consequences that have marked the proceedings of the Commons,—and the calmer courage, the dignity, and the patriotism that have shed a lustre over the saving wisdom of the Lords.

MR. BRIGHT: Sir, I cannot help being struck with an inconsistency in the right hon. Gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I am surprised that he has not concluded by moving that certain words in the first Resolution should be omitted, and in point of fact that the declaration which the House is about to make should be reversed. That, Sir, would be in accordance with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and with the sentiments which many Members opposite have most vociferously cheered. Sir, I confess I do not know what a number of hon. Gentlemen opposite thought of the statements of the right hon. Gentleman about the headlong, precipitate, and reckless Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because I think there were some fifty of them who were more enthusiastic supporters of that Budget than a great number of the Members on this side of the House.

Now, Sir, I shall not follow the right hon. Gentleman in his endeavours to support his theories with regard to the extreme value of the House of Lords, nor shall I attempt to controvert them, because, in reality, that is not the question which is before the House. But, if the House will permit me, I will endeavour to keep as close to the question as I can, and I will state the grounds on which I am not very well satisfied with the course which this House is invited to take. Sir, I will not attack the Resolutions of the noble Lord, and I will not defend them, for I am not responsible for them. They appear to me not worthy of the occasion which is before us. I think they bear marks of having been prepared by more than one hand, and if they pass, and constitute the sole expression of our mind on this occasion, posterity will hardly fail to pronounce them the Resolutions of a somewhat degenerate House of Commons. The first Resolution is a very good one, but it is very old. It is none the worse for that; and I am glad the noble Viscount did not think it necessary to endeavour to amend it. The other two Resolutions are, to my mind, somewhat ambiguous and feeble, and are not in their expression of what I believe is constitutional usage, any more than as examples of composition in the English language, to be compared to the first and oldest. Last night we had two speeches from that side of the House after long silence—speeches which, I confess, I heard with some surprise and with some pain. They appeared to me marked—to use a favourable phrase of the right hon. Gentleman below me—by great recklessness, and, if I may so speak, with great levity. Whatever may be the opinion of hon. Members of this question, it is not one to be treated in that manner. It is a serious question—whether the powers of this House have been infringed or not, or whether neither House of Parliament shall hereafter exercise powers which they have never heretofore exercised. I confess I was compelled to think of the truth we learn from history, that there is no greater sign of the decadence of a people than when we find the leaders of parties and eminent statesmen treating great questions as if they were not great, and solemn realities as if they were not real at all. Sir, I think I could observe in those speeches the triumph of men who had found an advocate in the Prime Minister, whom they expected to meet as an opponent, and who were delighted that, acting with their confederates in the other House of Parliament, they were likely to obtain a signal party advantage. Is there anybody who has denied in point blank terms, except the right hon. Gentleman, that the House of Lords, in the course it has taken, has violated—I will not say the privileges of this House, for privilege is a word not easily defined—but has broken in upon the usages of many centuries old—usages which our predecessors in this House have acknowledged to be of the utmost importance to our own powers and to the liberties of those whom we represent? If there was nothing wrong, then why was there a Committee? Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks neglected to answer that question. He made no opposition at the time; but three weeks afterwards he thinks that it would have been better if the Committee had not been appointed. I will, however, undertake to affirm that, when the noble Viscount proposed that Committee, every Member of this House thought the proposition a reasonable one. Why did we ransack the Journals unless something had happened which jarred upon every man's sense with regard to the rights and privileges of this House, and the usages of the House of Lords? And why, having this Committee, and instituting these researches, have we these Resolutions moved, not by a young, inexperienced, and unknown Member—if any such there be of the House of Commons—but by one of the oldest Members of this House, one of the ablest statesmen of the day, and at this moment the chief Minister of the Crown? Surely, Sir, every one will admit that the circumstances were such as to justify the course that was taken in appointing the Committee.

Then, Sir, I have another reason to show to hon. Gentlemen opposite, notwithstanding their spasmodic cheering—I do not intend the word offensively—why we should have these very Resolutions which you are about to agree to, which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks, as far as I could understand, entirely approves, and which you all feel delighted should be proposed by the noble Viscount, because they relieve you from a considerable difficulty. Sir, I say that these Resolutions are a proof that the course which has been taken by the other House has been unusual, if not wrong; because the Resolutions by implication condemn what the Lords have done, and although they do not revoke the Act, or pledge this House to any particular course, yet, when those Resolutions come to be considered, it will never be denied that the House of Commons does by these Resolutions express a unanimous opinion that the course which has been taken by the other House is contrary to usage, and is calculated to excite the jealousy and alarm of the Members of this House. Sir, I have been a member of that Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge knows my opinion of the Committee and its labours. I think that Committee fell wonderfully below its duties—that the course which it pursued was poor and spiritless; and at a future time when the course it has taken is contrasted with the course taken by the House of Commons on previous occasions, it will be justly said that there had been a real and melancholy declension in the spirit of this House. That which I complain of in the proceedings of the Committee, I also complain of in respect to the manner in which some hon. Members have discussed this question. Half of the Committee appeared to me to go into that Committee as much the advocates of the House of Lords as of the House of Commons, and I find that some Members of this House are of the same character. Speeches have been delivered here that very few Members of the House of Lords would make on this question, and I will undertake to say that not one Member of that House, who is known to the public by his political influence, legal knowledge, high character, or extensive learning, would dare to make the speech that has been made to-night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud. Sir, I went into the Committee with the utmost frankness in order that I might ascertain, not altogether in what manner the Lords had asserted their privileges, but what our predecessors had done with regard to theirs. We have no right to let go one single particle of the privileges and powers which the House of Commons have gained in past times; and I took it for granted that if I examined for some centuries back the course which the House of Commons had pursued—if I read their Resolutions, if I read the reasons adduced at their conferences, if I observed the Acts which they passed, and the result of the discussions between the two Houses—we should be justified in concluding that we have rights to maintain in this regard for which our predecessors have contended.

[Second Night.

Now, Sir, several Members, following the example of the Committee, have taken the House back for a long period of time. I will not go into those precedents with the view of contending whether they do or do not refer to this particular case; but the House will permit me to mention two or three facts which I brought out of the

Mr. Bright

Journals, and which convinced me that we should not take a sufficiently bold or decided course, if we merely agreed to the Resolutions of the noble Viscount. I will first refer, Sir, to that very case which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge and myself fixed upon as the starting point of our precedents—the precedents of 1407; and I trust every hon. Member has read it, either in the translation, or in the old Norman French. Sir, it is worth reading, for it is a very curious case, and there is no other so like the recent action of the House of Lords, as that which took place 453 years ago; for the House of Lords then proposed to continue a tax to which the Commons had not assented, and the House of Commons were greatly disturbed at the House of Lords prolonging a tax to which the House of Commons had not given their assent. We then made a great leap, and from the year 1407, came down to the year 1628. We then found the House of Commons insisting upon the initiation of Bills of Supply. They would not permit the name of the Lords to be inserted in the preamble of a Bill of Supply, neither would they agree to the compromise that neither the Lords nor the Commons should be introduced, but that the High Court of Parliament should be mentioned. The House of Commons refused to pass the Bill in that shape, and submitted that the Commons should be named alone in the grant. This, Sir, was done, and that has been the practice ever since in the preamble of Supply Bills.

Now then, Sir, we come down to 1640, when the House of Lords were much more modest than they ought to have been, according to the right hon. Gentleman, who maintains that they ought to check, alter, amend, improve, and if necessary, overthrow all the financial arrangements of the year that this House may agree to. Sir, the Declaration of 1640 set forth that the Lords stated at the Conference that—

“My Lords would not meddle with matters of subsidy, which belong naturally and properly to you—no, not to give you advice therein, but have utterly declined it.”

Then the House of Lords in 1640, we are asked to suppose, knew nothing of their constitutional rights, and the House of that day were less able than they are at present to judge of what is necessary for the performance of their proper functions in the State, and for the liberties of those whom they represent. Mr. Pym told their Lordships that they had not only meddled with matters of Supply, but had “both concluded the matter and order of proceeding, which the House of Commons takes to be a breach of their privilege, for which he was commanded to desire reparation from your Lordships.” The Lords gave reparation by declaring that they did not know they were breaking a right in merely suggesting that Supply should have precedence over the consideration of grievances. I am not sure that even now, notwithstanding what has been said, the House of Lords have ever admitted by any Resolution that they have not the power to originate Supplies. They have not the power, of course, to carry such a Bill, because if it came to this House it would fall down dead, unless that unhappy time should come when the theories of the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Stroud, are carried out.

Then, Sir, comes the question of Amendments. The Lords endeavoured to Amend a Bill of Supply. I do not wonder that they did, because the theories of the right hon. Gentleman must have been palatable to a good many of them. In 1671 it was proposed not to continue a tax, but to reduce a tax—the duty on white sugar. The Lords proposed to reduce the duty from one penny per pound to five-eighths of a penny, and the House of Commons came to a Resolution that “in all aids given to the King by the Commons the rate or tax ought not to be altered by the Lords.” A conference was held with the House of Lords, and the House of Commons then declared that the right which they claimed “was a fundamental right, both as to the matter, the measure, and the time.” Then, what followed in the House of Lords? Why, they replied by the very same Resolution which the House of Commons had passed in its own favour. The Resolution they passed asserting their power to make Amendments was just as strong, and in the same words as the Resolution which had been passed in a contrary sense by this House. They said, with reason, “for if they cannot amend, or abate, or revise a Bill in Parliament”—they said this, mind, in answer to the Commons, who declared that they could not amend, but might negative the whole—they said, “if we cannot amend, or abate, or alter in part, by what consequence of reason can we enjoy the liberty to reject the whole?”

Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Dublin, last night showed himself a most unhappy critic. He called our attention to the condition of things in the United States. In fact, Sir, he proved himself—only he did not exactly understand what he was saying—he showed himself to be strongly in favour of Americanizing our institutions in one respect. He said the Senate of the United States has the power not only of rejecting, but of amending, which is quite true. When the founders of the American Republic were binding together the thirteen Sovereign States in one great—and to be still greater—combination, they looked back naturally to the practice of the country from which they were separating, to determine, or at least, to learn something from our Parliamentary practice. They found that in England the Lords could not begin Money Bills, could not alter or amend them; but that theoretically—because the matter had never been decided—theoretically they had power to reject. But, then, what was the conclusion which they came to? They said the very same thing as the House of Lords had said in the year 1761—“It is perfectly childish to say that the House of Lords cannot alter, abate, or increase, but yet shall be able to reject.” They knew well that, although there was that theoretical right in England, yet, practically, it had never been enforced, and they came to the conclusion that if they would give to their own Senate power to reject, it would be necessary also to give them the power to amend; and at this very moment the Senate of the United States might, not with that sort of responsibility of which the right hon. Gentleman is so fond, but with a real responsibility, every two members being the representatives of a particular sovereign State—that elected Senate does amend, and does reject, and does deal with finance in a manner which has never been permitted, nor even proposed in this country, until in the extraordinary speech to which we have just listened.

Now, Sir, seven years after the last date to which I have referred there arose another contest, in the course of which a Resolution was passed. It is the strongest and most comprehensive Resolution that the House of Commons have ever passed in relation to this subject. Sir, I will not go into any elaborate arguments upon it, but I will just read it, because it makes the argument I am about to bring before the

[Second Night.]

House more continuous and clear. The House of Commons declared this; and it was not one of those sudden acts which the House of Commons are now alleged continually to commit; but it was a Resolution drawn up by a Committee specially appointed for that purpose—a Resolution specially considered and solemnly entered in the Journals of the House. It was in these words, that

“All Aids and Supplies, and Aids to His Majesty from Parliament are the sole gifts of the Commons, and all Bills for granting such Aids and Supplies are to begin with the Commons; and it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such Bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed or altered by the House of Lords.”

Now, Sir, at this time, when the Lords had never pretended to reject a Bill, it is probable that such a proposition was a thing that never entered into the head of any Member of the House of Peers. I will undertake to say it would be difficult for any Member of this House to draw up a Resolution more comprehensive and conclusive as to the absolute control of the House of Commons than that of the year 1678, which I have just now read.

Now, Sir, shortly afterwards, in the year 1691, there is another Resolution which goes minutely to the case before the House, and I beg the right hon. Gentleman's attention to it. In that year a Bill was passed for appointing Commissioners to Examine the Public Accounts of the Kingdom. The House of Lords Amended, the House of Commons dissented; and among the reasons which the House of Commons gave was this—“That in aids, and supplies, and grants, the Commons only do judge of the necessities of the Crown.” Sir, what are we asked now? We are asked to take into partnership another judge of the necessities of the Crown. The House of Commons which for 500 years, which, since the Revolution at least, has never withheld adequate Supplies from the Crown, is now to be depreciated and defamed, as if it had been guilty of scantily supplying the wants of the Crown, and the House of Lords is to be asked to do that which the House of Commons alone did in 1691, namely, to judge of the necessities of the Crown, and to make the Supply greater than that which the House of Commons have believed to be sufficient. And, referring to that famous record of

Mr. Bright

Henry the Fourth, we find it stated there that “all grants and aids are made by the Commons, and are only assented to by the Lords.”

Now, a few years afterwards, our forefathers got into a question about the paper duties, just as we are at this time; only they managed it better than we are doing now. In the year 1699 they declared:

“It is an undoubted right and privilege of the Commons, that such aids are to be given by such methods, and with such provisions, as the Commons only shall think proper.”

But now we are told that aids and provisions for the Crown are to be raised by methods, not which the Commons think proper, but which the Lords think proper in opposition to the Commons.

Now, Sir, the House will perceive that I am very hoarse, and I am sorry to trouble them with other cases. In the year 1700 there was another question raised between the two Houses: and the Commons told the Lords that they could not agree with their Amendment, that “All the Aids and Supplies granted to His Majesty in Parliament, are the sole and entire gift of the Commons; and that it is the sole and undoubted right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint the ends, purposes, considerations, limitations, and qualifications of such grants.”

Then, Sir, in 1702 there was another statement that “the granting and disposing of all public moneys, is the undoubted right of the Commons alone.”

In the year 1719 they objected to a clause which the Lords had introduced; on the ground that it levied a new subsidy not granted by the Commons, “which it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to grant, and from which they will never depart.” Sir, I want to ask the House, or any reasonable man, if we were discussing this question between the American Senate and the House of Representatives, or between the two Chambers of any foreign country, to what conclusion would each one of us necessarily come as to the purpose and object of all these declarations, to which I have referred, and which are only a portion of those which are to be found in the Journals of this House for the last 500 years? Would you say that they lead to the conclusion that the House of Lords could throw out a Bill repealing a tax of the value and magnitude of £1,300,000 a year? Would you say that if they could not abate a tax, or continue a tax, or limit a tax, or dispose of a tax, or control in any way a tax, or even give advice to the Commons in respect to a tax—could you say that notwithstanding all that which is clear and undeniable, they could, in the face of this House, reject a Bill which repealed a tax of £1,300,000 a year, without violating Parliamentary usage, and running contrary to all the declarations of this House for many centuries? I think, Sir—and I put it before the Committee—and if any hon. Gentleman has done me the honour to read the draft Report which I prepared, he will see that. I put before the Committee this long string of cases and Resolutions, and declarations, couched in language not ambiguous, not feeble, but in language clear and forcible, which could not be mistaken; and then I wished to ask the Committee—as I now ask the House—what was the end and object which the House of Commons had in view in these repeated declarations of their rights and opinions touching the granting of Supplies, and the imposition of taxes upon the people. Why, Sir, I should say they did this—they confirm and consecrate a practice of 500 years, the principle which, within the last hour, I thought every man in England admitted—the fundamental and unchangeable principle of the Government and Constitution of the English people, that taxation and representation are inseparable in this kingdom. Let us look and see how these declarations and Resolutions apply to this case.

Sir, we are now in the year 1860, and for a long period we have had no question of importance of this nature; and we begin to fancy that, after all, there is no great importance in such a question. We have long had our personal liberties in this country; longer almost, in some classes of society, than history can tell; but people perhaps fancy that their personal liberty cannot be endangered by this matter. No; in this case we were so confident of our right and our power that we could not comprehend any infringement of those rights. These paper duties, I believe, were granted in the reign of Queen Anne; partly for revenue, and partly for other purposes; which purposes, I presume, had some effect in procuring the rejection of this Bill by the Lords. It was a tax to prevent the publication and spread of political information. I see an hon. Gentleman up there in the gallery who is very much astonished at this; but he is not aware, probably, that all which I have stated is, if I am not misinformed, in the Preamble of the Bill. Public opinion in those days allowed of very bad reasons being given. They can be acted on now even when they are not given. From the time of Queen Anne, to the present time, this paper duty has crippled a very important industry. It has taxed all the trades which required large quantities of paper—such as those of Manchester, of Sheffield, of Nottingham, of Birmingham, and elsewhere; but more than that, it has very successfully done what Queen Anne's Ministers wanted; it has threatened, and, to a large extent, it has strangled the press of this country. Within the last thirty years—and hon. Members on the opposite side of the House, I presume by this time, are becoming conscious of it—new principles have become established in this country with regard to taxation on industry. New and wiser principles have been adopted, and not only adopted but established; and there are some very powerful defenders of these new principles, that I have the pleasure to see opposite me to-night.

Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Stroud, has gone on the old mode of discussion when arguments are not plentiful, and facts are entirely wanting. He has raised his old friend, the hobgoblin argument, and has tried to show us that some frightful calamity must come upon us if this paper duty be repealed: it is but a million-and-a-quarter. Does any hon. Gentleman believe that our prosperity or success—or that any vast interest of this country—can possibly depend on a million, more or less, in the general revenue of the empire? Sir, a million is a million. ["Hear."] I am glad to have said something in which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leicestershire can coincide. There is no Member who has laid more stress on the importance of a million in the taxation of the people; it is the tax of many villages, of many towns; and it makes the difference sometimes between comfort and desolation; and therefore I am the last person who would undervalue the amount of a million of the public revenue. But still I should only be making myself foolish, if I were to say that a million sterling—whether our taxation be £50,000,000, as it was twenty years ago, or £70,000,000 as it is now—was of the gigantic importance attributed to it by the right hon. Gentleman: for on this million, which we had provided a substitute for, before we relieved the million of that million, he founds his argument as to our recklessness, precipitancy, and madness, and drunkenness—I think he added—at least it was to be inferred from what he said; for he made use of the converse, and spoke of sobriety.

[Second Night.]

Now, Sir, the noble Lord, the Member for the City of London, in his speech last night reviewed the course of events, and told us what we all knew, that within the recollection, I suppose, of almost the youngest Member of the House, there have been Excise duties on many other articles; I think, at one time, on candles; certainly at a later period on leather; I believe, since I came into this House, on glass; and, still more recently, on soap. Well, Sir, all these Excises have been done away with. Can you find a man, from John O'Groat's to the Land's End, who will not tell you that these reckless principles, applied to the repeal of these Excises, were not of essential benefit, not only to the particular trades most interested, but to the great mass of the people, and to the industry by which your people live?

Well, then, Sir, having followed for many years a course so beneficial, we come at length, in the year 1860, to the repeal of the paper duty, which was promised by the House; which was recommended by the Government officers; which was called for by innumerable petitions; which was hoped for, I believe, by every person in the country, who took an intelligent view of what was essential to aid the efforts which Government are making, by liberal grants every year, to promote the instruction of the people. This tax was £1,300,000. It was a question whether sugar should be relieved to the extent of a million, tea of a million, or paper of a million: I am speaking in round numbers. The hon. Gentleman, not caring in the least about this reckless deficit, would evidently have preferred sugar or tea; but surely, as regards the question of the Supplies for the year, it was equally a matter of indifference to the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the duty were taken off tea, or sugar, or paper. But the conclusion to which he necessarily came was, that while in the cases of tea and sugar, the relief was to the extent of a million of taxation, in the case of paper it was not only a relief to that amount in money, but it was a relief to a great industry, and to several other industries, whose prosperity must depend on an abundant and cheap supply of paper. I speak with some knowledge of the subject, and I have not the least doubt that the abolition of the paper duty was a positive relief to the whole people of the country equal to double the relief which would have been afforded by a reduction, equal in amount to the duty on the articles of tea and sugar. But the question may be still more narrowed; and I beg the right hon. Gentleman's particular attention—for it appears now that his hostility to the Chancellor of the Exchequer renders him unable to understand the multiplication table, or anything else that is plain. If the paper duty expired on the 15th of August, the reduction of revenue between that time and the end of the financial year, would probably not be more than £600,000, but certainly would not exceed £700,000. I am sorry the House did not take more economical advice in past years. But we are now come, according to the right hon. Gentleman, to this extremity of our resources, that you cannot take £700,000 this year from our Excise which is strangling a great trade, and put an additional halfpenny or penny on the income tax, without bringing about such a frightful state of things, that the Constitution itself and the usage of Parliament must be violated, and we must bring in a foreign power to check us in our precipitous, reckless, and headlong career. Sir, it may be very far from the modesty which becomes a Member of this House, but I confess I am of opinion that the House of Commons is the best judge in this country of what is necessary for the trade, and also what is required by the financial condition of the country. First of all, Sir, there are among us a good many sagacious men of all sorts. There are, as I know, some very sagacious landowners; we found it very hard to beat them even when they had a very bad case. We have a very sagacious Gentleman down here who spoke to-night, and who, whatever be the question which comes before us, always finds some very fitting object for his merciless and unscrupulous vituperation. We know many of us intimately all the details connected with these questions; in fact, I suppose, there is not a trade in this country of any importance or note that cannot find its representatives in this House. For many years past we have had the absolute control of questions of finance, and I undertake to declare, notwithstanding what the right hon. Gentleman has stated, that there is not a representative body in the world, which during the last twenty years has done more in the way of financial and fiscal reforms with greater advantage to the people. And yet, at the end of that period, when the triumphs of this House are to be found not on granite and bronze monuments, but in the added comforts of the population, and in the increased and undoubted loyalty of the people! you are now, forsooth, asked by the right hon. Gentleman to abdicate your functions, and to invite 400 gentlemen, who are not traders, who have never been financiers, who do not possess means in any degree equalling your own of understanding the question—you are to ask them to join your councils, and not only to advise, but to check, and even to control. Why, Sir, it is one of the points which gave me most grief in regard to this Question that I have seen the House of Lords taking, of all cases, perhaps the worst that could possibly come before them, and inflicting suddenly, unexpectedly, and in my opinion, groundlessly, most harsh and cruel treatment on all the persons who were interested directly in this question of the paper excise. We are asked now, in terms not ambiguous, to overthrow the fabric which has grown up in this country, which has existed, and existed without damage, for at least 500 years. By the Report of the right hon. Gentleman we find that as far back as the year 1640 the House of Commons made this declaration, to which I ask the particular attention of Members of the present House. They said:—

Mr. Bright

“We have had uninterrupted possession of this privilege” [the privilege of the undisputed control over the taxation and finances of the country], “ever since the year 1407, confirmed by a multitude of precedents both before and after, not shaken by one precedent for these 300 years.”

Well, Sir, if that be so, it carries us back for a period of 520 years; and yet we are asked to-night in the most unblushing and audacious manner, to overthrow this magnificent and time-honoured fabric, and admit to powers, to which they have hitherto been unaccustomed, the hereditary branch of the Legislature.

Now, Sir, I say that the House of Lords in the course they have taken have committed two offences, which I had much rather they had not committed, because I am not anxious that they should depreciate themselves in the eyes of the people of this country. [A laugh.] If hon. Gentlemen opposite were as anxious that they should continue limited to their proper functions, doing all the good that it is possible for them to do, and as little harm as possible, they would not laugh with that kind of unbelieving expression which I presume they intended just now to convey as to what I have stated. I say the House of Lords have not behaved even with fair honour towards the House of Commons in this matter. Every man of them who knew anything about what he was voting for knew that the House of Commons repealed the paper excise, not because it wished to remit a million of taxes, but because it thought that to strangle a great industry was an injurious mode of raising revenue, and, therefore, they transferred that amount of taxation from the paper excise to the income tax. Then, Sir, I say if that were known in the House of Lords, although they might have disapproved the change, and might have thought it better if it had not been made, it was not an honourable treatment of this House, and if they had the power which the American Senate has, and which the right hon. and learned Gentleman wished them to have, still it would not have been fair to this House to enact the penny on income and refuse to repeal the tax on paper. That, Sir, is a question which every man can understand; and I cannot believe that there is any Member of this House who does not wish it to be put in that shape.

But, Sir, there is another thing in which the House of Lords have done wrong. They have trampled on the confidence and taken advantage of the faith of the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman last night made on this subject a very curious statement, which, if I were a Member of the House of Lords, I should be disposed to find fault with. He said:—“Why, what can you expect? It was the laches of the House of Commons that gave the House of Lords the opportunity of doing what they have done.” But, surely, if for 500 years the House of Lords have never done this,—if since the Revolution, even with the search into precedents made by the Committee, not a single case which approaches this can be discovered—are the House of Commons blameable for thinking that they were at least dealing with a House which would abide by the usage of the Constitution, and would not take advantage of the change which the House of Commons made for the public interest in the mode of imposing taxation. Instead of being temporary, taxes were made permanent. The West

[Second Night.]

India interest said they did not want their trade to be troubled and disturbed every year; and the sugar duties were made perpetual. Well, but then are we always to treat the Lords as political burglars, and invent bolts, bars, locks, everything which may keep them from a possible encroachment on our rights? Must we treat them as men who, if you give them the smallest opportunity, will come down upon you and do that which you wish them not to do? If that be so, you must assuredly take certain precautions to prevent them from continuing such a course.

Now, Sir, it is said that the Paper Duty Abolition Bill was thrown out in the Upper House by a great majority. That is a fact with which we are well acquainted. I was talking recently to a Peer who gave an explanation of this, which I will venture to repeat. "If," he said, "the regular House of Lords, that is to say, the hundred Members who during the Session really do transact the business, if they only had been in the House, the Paper Duties Repeal Bill would certainly have passed." That, however, happened which we all understand, and I have no objection to repeat the exact words used to me. "About two hundred Members, who hardly ever come there, were let loose for the occasion." Most of them are unknown to the country as politicians, and they voted out this Bill by a large majority, with a chuckle, thinking that by doing so they were making a violent attack on the Ministry, and especially on the Chancellor of the Exchequer. That is a House, recollect in which three Members form a quorum. I sometimes hear complaints in this House that Ministers pass measures very late at night, when, perhaps, only fifty Members are present, of whom thirty are connected with the Government; but in the House of Lords three form a quorum. Proxies may be used too; and these three Peers forming a quorum, with proxies in their pockets, are to dispose of great questions involving £70,000,000 of taxes raised from the industry of the people of this country. At all events, if the 200 Peers who voted that night choose to come down on other such occasions there is no single measure of finance, however liberal or however much for the advantage of the people, that they would not reject, and thus frustrate the beneficial intentions of this House.

Now, Sir, after all I have said I am going to make this admission, that the Lords of course can reject a Bill, and can also initiate a Bill if they like. If it were not so late (and the Lords like to get away about seven) if it were not so late, the Lords might to-night bring in a Bill levying a tax or voting money for the service of the year, and they can also reject any Bill you may send up to them. They are omnipotent within the four walls of their House, just as we are within the four walls of this House. But if they take their course, one contrary to the general practice of that House and of Parliament, it becomes us to consider what course we will take. We cannot compel them to make any change; but we may ourselves take any course that we please, and we may at least offer them the opportunity of altering the course they have taken. My opinion is that it would have been consonant with the dignity of this House, wholly apart from the question of £1,300,000 a year, or of £700,000 the sum for this year, to have passed another Bill to repeal the paper duty. If that had been a duty which I considered not the best to repeal, I still should have laid aside all partiality for a particular tax. The question before us is of far more importance than the maintenance or abolition of any particular tax. There can be nothing more perilous to the country, or more fatal to the future character of this House than that we should do anything to impair and lessen the powers we have received from our predecessors. I understand there are other sums amounting to about £1,500,000 or £2,000,000, which have yet to go up to the House of Lords. Now, Sir, if the noble Lord at the head of the Government, acting up to his position, which I think he has failed to do in this matter, had asked us, not on the ground (for that is a low ground) that the paper duty was the best duty to repeal, but on the ground that as the House of Commons have come to that decision they should abide by it; if he had asked us to pass another Bill, with an altered date, perhaps, and sent it up again to the House of Lords, he would have given them the opportunity of reconsidering their decision; and my full belief is that a course like this, taken without passion and without collision, would have been met in a proper temper by that House; this difficulty would have been got over, and in all probability both Houses for the future would have proceeded more regularly and easily than they are likely to do under the plan proposed by the noble Lord.

Mr. Bright

Sir, having stated that I shall leave the question of these Resolutions, I say there is no reason whatever in the arguments which have been used why this duty should have been maintained, or why it was perilous to remit it. Its repeal was consistent with the policy of the Whigs before Sir Robert Peel came into power, with the policy of Sir Robert Peel's Government, of Lord Derby's Government, of Lord John Russell's Government, of Lord Aberdeen's Government, of Lord Palmerston's Government, of Lord Derby's last Government, and of the existing Government. The policy of the repeal of the paper duty is the recognized policy of this House, and it is the admitted interest of the country. Then, why, Sir, unless it be for a party triumph, unless it be to attack a particular Minister, why is this question of £700,000 this year, and less than double that sum in future years, raised to an importance which does not belong to it? and why, for the sake of a party triumph, are the great interests connected with it to be damaged and tortured, as they now are, by the action of one House of Parliament? I am told, Sir, there are Members of this House who would not support the Government in this course, and I should certainly hardly expect that all the Gentlemen on the benches opposite would lend to it their sanction. Yet I doubt whether if the noble Lord at the head of the Government were to act in the manner I have indicated, the great majority of them would be induced, upon reflection, to adopt the policy which they have pursued with respect to these Resolutions, and whether the House of Commons would not have passed a second Bill even by a larger majority than that by which we passed the last.

Now, Sir, there is a rumour that some Gentlemen on this side of the House object to such a course of proceeding, and hon. Gentlemen opposite have, perhaps, on that account been led to take up a line of action upon this question in which they otherwise could not hope to succeed. An hon. Gentleman behind me, from whom I should have expected something better, said only last night, in speaking of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that he was a reckless and unsafe finance Minister. That observation he no doubt confined to the question of the repeal of the paper duty; but I cannot forget that in 1853 we had the same Chancellor of the Exchequer as to-day, and that it was asserted then also that he had committed great errors. [Cheers from the Opposition.] Yes; but your Chancellor of the Exchequer was not in office long enough to perpetrate any great mistakes. Not long after that right hon. Gentleman assumed the reigns of office, he brought in a Budget which the House of Commons rejected, and upon the next occasion on which he proposed one, he found it necessary to shift the burden of responsibility to the shoulders of his successor. But in 1853, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford was Chancellor of the Exchequer, I put it to those among us who were then Members of this House, whether it is not the fact that the strength of the Government of Lord Aberdeen, of which he was a Member, was developed and concentrated by his action on the taxation of the country which met with universal approbation out of doors.

Well, we come now, Sir, to the present year, and while I do not wish to depreciate the popularity, or the character, or the ability of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, or any of his colleagues, still I undertake to say that the power and authority which his Administration have acquired during the present Session, it has gained mainly as the consequence of the beneficial propositions which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has made. I heard somebody last night—(I am not quite sure it was not the right hon. Gentleman below me to-night)—talk of the House of Commons having been partly charmed and partly coerced into the acceptance of these propositions. But if that be so, and if we have proved ourselves to be soft-headed children who could be so swayed, I must say it appears to me very strange that such should be the case; for I think the House of Commons has upon the contrary shown wonderful independence, and has proved itself to be extremely free from all those ties, the acting in accordance with which usually enables a Government to conduct the business of a Session with success. Be that, however, as it may, I repeat that the Budget of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer when it was laid before the country, was received throughout all the great seats of industry, and among the farmers too—for it tended to benefit them as well as the inhabitants of towns—with universal approbation.

Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman below me has been indulging himself to—night, in accordance with his custom, in dwelling upon the French Treaty, and I must say we have heard a great deal upon that subject since it was first mooted in this House. We have had it commented upon by a great Journal in this country, whose motives I will not attempt to divine, but whose motto must, I think, be that which Pascal said ought to have been adopted by one of the ancients—“Omnia pro tempore, sed nihil pro veritate,”—which being translated, may be rendered—“Everything for The Times, but nothing for truth.” We have had in short, every description of falsehood propounded with respect to this Treaty. The right hon. Gentleman below me has not hesitated to-night to give currency to representations with respect to it wholly inaccurate, and if I were not here, I would apply to his observations a still stronger term. Did not the right hon. Gentleman say our manufacturers were—I forget the word—plaintiffs—no, suppliants in the ante-chamber of the Emperor of the French? The statement is one, I can tell him, which is wholly untrue; nay, more, and I may say that with the exception of some right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Treasury Bench, there is no one more competent to give an opinion on the subject than myself, for reasons with which the House is of course acquainted. I tell the right hon. Gentleman that nothing can exceed the good faith and the liberality with which that whole question is being treated by the Commissioners of the French Government. I would have him know that they are as anxious as our Commissioners that a great trade between England and France should spring up; and I will add that in the case of nations and Governments in amity one with the other, whose representatives are endeavouring in all fairness and frankness to extend the commerce between both, he is neither a statesman nor a patriot who seeks to depreciate in the eyes of his countrymen the instrument by which it is hoped these results will be accomplished, and thus doing his utmost to prevent its success.

[Second Night.]

Now, Sir, I come to ask the House what is this reform in the tariff introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, by which you are so frightened? Is it something novel? The right hon. Gentleman below me says it is a scheme both new and gigantic in its proportions, and fatal in its principle. Now, I was speaking last week to an hon. Member for a South-Western county who sits on the benches opposite, and he spoke in terms of exultation to me of the success of late years of that branch of industry in which you are peculiarly interested. Is it honest, then, that you should make such acknowledgments and not consent to extend further the principles which the whole country has pronounced to be sound and beneficial? We boast of the freedom of our commerce. That commerce has more than doubled since I had first the honour of a seat in this House. When, then, you now attack, through the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, principles, the adoption of which has wrought this great good, you are not, in my opinion, pursuing a course which will enhance your reputation with the country which you profess to represent. There is not, I contend, a man who labours and sweats for his daily bread; there is not a woman living in a cottage, who strives to make her humble home happy and comfortable for her husband and her children, to whom the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer have not brought hope, and to whom his measures, which have been defended with an eloquence few can equal, and with a logic none can contest, have not administered consolation. I appeal to the past and present condition of the country, and I ask you, solemnly, to oppose no obstacle to the realization of those great and good principles of legislation.

Mr. Bright

Sir, I will not enter further into this question. I am unable from physical causes to speak with clearness, and I am afraid I must have somewhat pained those who have heard me. I must, however, repeat my regret that the noble Viscount at the head of the Government has not shown more courage in this matter than he appears to me to have exhibited, and that the House of Commons has not evinced more self-respect. I fear this Session may as a consequence become memorable as that in which, for the first time, the Commons of England had surrendered a right which for 500 years they had maintained unimpaired. I, at least, and those who act with me, will be clear from any participation in this; we shall be free from the shame which must indelibly be attached to the chief actors in these proceedings. I protested against the order of reference which the noble Lord proposed, yet I sat and laboured on the Committee with earnest fidelity on behalf of the House of Commons. I have felt it an honour to sit in this House up to this time, and I hope that hereafter the character of this House will not be impaired by the course which is about to be taken. I have endeavoured to show to my countrymen what I consider to be the almost treason which I fear is about to be committed against them. I have refused to dishonour the memory of such Members as Coke, Selden, Glanville and Pym; and, if defeated in this struggle, I shall have this consolation, that I have done all I can to maintain what I believe to be the honour of this House, and that I have not sacrificed the interests which my constituents committed to my care.

MR. WHALLEY: Sir, I rise for the purpose of making a few observations to the House. [Cries of "Divide, divide."]

MR. MELLOR: Sir, I move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed—
"That the Debate be now adjourned."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I do sincerely hope and trust that the hon. and learned Member will not persist in pressing his Motion for an adjournment of the Debate. The question which I have brought under the notice of the House has been most fully discussed, and the House is exceedingly full, and is quite prepared to express its opinions. It is now Friday night, and I do hope that the House will come to a decision. When an adjournment is spoken of I certainly do not know what other day will be convenient to adjourn to at this period of the Session.

MR. BRIGHT: I beg to ask the noble Lord whether he will not be satisfied if the first Resolution were to be put and agreed to on the present occasion, and then the second and third Resolutions might be postponed to a future occasion. Those are in fact the Resolutions upon which difference of opinion exists, and it is very natural that some discussion should take place with regard to them.

MR. CONINGHAM: I think it highly necessary that an opportunity should be given to every hon. Member to express his opinions upon the Resolutions which have been submitted to the House by the noble Lord at the head of the Government.

MR. DISRAELI: I would beg to observe that, although the first Resolution only is formally before the House, and the debate which has taken place has comprehended all three Resolutions, they have been discussed as a whole. It appears to me that the debate has been very completely carried on, and I certainly cannot understand why it should be adjourned; indeed, no grounds have been given why the debate should be prolonged. Although formally we are going to decide upon the first Resolution, yet I think that the House will agree that they should be taken together.

MR. MELLOR: With the leave of the House I will withdraw my Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate, but I beg at the same time to say that I shall reserve to myself the right to say a few words upon the second Resolution.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SPEAKER put the following (the first) Resolution:—

Question,

"That the right of granting Aids and Supplies to the Crown is in the Commons alone, as an essential part of their constitution; and the limitation of all such Grants, as to matter, manner, measure, and time, is only in them."

Put, and agreed to.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON moved the following (the second) Resolution:—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, although the Lords have exercised the power of rejecting Bills of several descriptions relating to Taxation by negating the whole, yet the exercise of that power by them has not been frequent, and is justly regarded by this House with peculiar jealousy, as affecting the right of the Commons to grant the Supplies and to provide the Ways and Means for the Service of the year."

MR. MELLOR: It appears to me, Sir, that this Resolution expresses more than the House intends and certainly more than the precedents prove, and I do hope that the noble Lord will think it necessary to amend the Resolution. The allegation is—"That although the Lords have exercised the power of rejecting Bills of several descriptions relating to taxation by negating the whole." I say that that expresses more than the precedents themselves prove. I say that there is no precedent which establishes the fact, that the Lords have exercised that power by amending any Bill relating to taxation or to a tax simpliciter. The words which I would suggest, and to which I cannot conceive there can be the least objection on the part of any hon. Gentlemen, are only for the purpose of guarding ourselves against making an improper and unnecessary omission. I beg to propose that after the word "Relating," the following words should be inserted, "Among other matters." If that were acceded to by the noble Lord, I should have no objection to the Resolution, but if it be insisted upon that we are to consider the Resolution in the way precisely in which it is framed, and if it be passed in that form, it will controvert the truth. Therefore, if the Amendment which I venture to propose to the House should be satisfactory to the noble Lord and to the hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, my objection to the Resolution would cease. But unless I have some assurance that that course were adopted, I must take the sense of the House upon it. I therefore move that after the word "relating," the words be inserted, "among other matters."

Amendment proposed, after the word "relating," to insert the words "amongst other matters."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. SPEAKER put the original Motion and the Amendment.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I object to the insertion of the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member. These Resolutions however they may been criticised by some hon. Members who have spoken in the course of this debate, have nevertheless been subjected to a good deal of consideration. I think that they correctly express the idea which they are intended to convey. What is meant is not that a Bill relating to various other matters has been rejected, but the point of the Resolution is that of Bills rejected relating to taxation. It is stated that they are Bills of several descriptions relating to taxation which have been rejected, and I think that the Resolution correctly describes them. I conceive that the words, "Bills of several descriptions," imply what the hon. and learned Member has in view.

MR. BRIGHT: The difference between the noble Lord and my hon. and learned Friend is this, that as the Resolution stands, it would bear the interpretation that a Bill, very like the particular Bill which we have been discussing, was one of those that were among the various descriptions of Bills referred to, whereas it is notorious to the whole of the Committee, and to everybody who has attended to this subject and looked into this matter, that that is not the case. Therefore, while I do not like the Resolution, while I am no friend to the Resolution in either shape, I think it would be better when we are meddling with edged tools, to be a little careful that we do not admit something into it which would enable some degenerate Members of a Committee, some fifty years hence, to quote this Resolution in favour of the theories and the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud. Therefore, I hope that the noble Lord will allow the House till Monday for the purpose of considering this point. [Cries of "Divide, divide!"] I was only going to say, that the Gentlemen who with so much consideration prepared this Resolution will be able between this and Monday to—[Cries of "No, no!"] There must be many hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, who are desirous of availing themselves of the excellent opportunity which an adjournment of this debate will afford them, of addressing the House; for up to this time we have only been favoured with the views of two Speakers on the Opposition side.

Mr. Mellor

MR. WHALLEY: I rise for the purpose of moving that this Debate be now adjourned.

LORD FERMOY: I beg to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 433: Majority 397.

The House divided on the Amendment of Mr. MELLOR.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 369: Majority 317.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON proposed the following (the third) Resolution—

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, to guard for the future against an undue exercise of that power by the Lords, and to secure to the Commons their rightful control over Taxation and Supply, this House has in its own hands the power so to impose and remit Taxes, and to frame Bills of Supply, that the right of the Commons as to the matter, manner, measure, and time may be maintained inviolate."

LORD FERMOY: Mr. Speaker, I really have an appeal to make to the noble Lord at the head of the Government and to the hon. Gentleman opposite who have exercised hitherto, no doubt, a sound judgment to postpone this Resolution, inasmuch as upon this Resolution there are two very important Amendments which require considerable discussion, and inasmuch as, to use a phrase which the noble Lord used last night, "Circumstances are now very different." I am at a loss to understand how hon. Gentlemen will not allow this matter to be discussed, but will still persist in preventing consideration being devoted to it. It is perfectly clear that we ought either to discuss the question, or we ought to adjourn. I would say that the circumstances have now completely changed—[Cries of "Divide! Divide!"—As I cannot be heard, I shall content myself by moving that the Debate be now adjourned.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY: I second the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I do trust that, after the unequivocal expression of opinion which has just been given by the House, and considering that there stand for next week matters of very considerable importance for discussion, it would be exceedingly inconvenient to the public service if this debate were not brought to a termination to-night. I do therefore hope and trust that the noble Lord will not persist in his Motion for the adjournment of the debate, but that he will allow the Resolution to be put at once. If, however, the noble Lord will persist with his Motion, I trust that the House will reject it by a large majority.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY: I seconded this Motion because discussion, which it is most important should take place, is shut out. The noble Lord (Lord Fermoy) stated that his object was to have the matter discussed, and that his object was not an adjournment; but inasmuch as the matter is not now to be discussed there is no alternative but to persist in the Motion for adjournment, I shall support the noble Lord in his Motion. The noble Lord at the head of the Government said that these Resolutions which he has submitted to the House are most important, and therefore I apprehend they cannot be too fully discussed. In fact, the very Amendments which have been proposed in the course of the debate to these Resolutions are very important, and there are many hon. Members who doubtless would desire to express their opinions with respect to them. These are my reasons for seconding the Motion for adjournment.

MR. CLAY: Sir, I do trust that my noble Friend (Lord Fermoy) will not put the House to the trouble of a division. We all know full well how these repeated divisions on adjournments end, and I do confess with regret that it would be a very unseemly act of our own upon such a question as this, if this debate were to be now adjourned. My noble Friend can hardly expect that any further light will be thrown upon this question by further discussion, and I must confess that I think that my noble Friend would better consult the dignity of the party to which he belongs by at once withdrawing his Motion for adjournment, and thus enabling the House to agree to the Resolutions which have been submitted to them. The Resolutions may not do all that he feels and all that I feel upon the subject, but at the same time they are more or less a protest; and I submit to my noble Friend and to the House, that the best course which we can take under existing circumstances is at once to agree to them.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

Put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.—RESOLUTION.

Act [8 & 9 Vic. c. 25] read.

Order for Committee read.

MR. CARDWELL said, he would move that the Speaker leave the Chair, in order that he might propose a Resolution, upon which he should ask leave to found a Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, he objected to the Motion. The Bill was one to undo what had been done in 1853 with reference to this college; and two o'clock in the morning was not an hour at which to bring in a Resolution on which to found such a Bill.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that it was the first time he had ever known an hon. Member object to a Minister of the Crown stating the provisions of a Bill which he proposed to bring in.

House in Committee.

MR. CARDWELL said, that from the year 1845 to 1851 the Board of Works kept the buildings of the College of Maynooth in repair by means of an annual grant of public money. In 1853, however, when the Government submitted the usual vote to the House of Commons it was defeated by a small majority upon the Motion of the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner). From that time to the present the Board of Works in Ireland were under a statutory obligation to keep the College in repair, but had no funds given to them for the purpose. The state of the College in consequence could be easily conceived. A Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the condition of the College, who recommended, not that the House of Commons should be asked to reverse its decision, but that the expenses of the building and repairs should be defrayed out of the funds already assigned by Parliament for the purposes of the College. He had asked the trustees if they were willing to acquiesce in this arrangement, and they replied that, having regard to the health, comfort, and discipline of the students, and the efficiency of the studies, they would accept the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners. He, therefore, proposed—acquiescing in the decision of the House, but not in the justice of that decision—to bring in a Bill to transfer from the personal endowment of some of the students of the College the sum of money necessary to keep the College in repair. The whole sum to which the Bill referred was that devoted by the 6th clause of the Maynooth College Act to the endowment of 250 pupils. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by placing in the hands of the Chairman a Resolution.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that instead of the old buildings having been repaired as intended by Parliament, new buildings had been erected, and accommodation made for one-half more pupils than the entire number in the College in 1845. That was a misappropriation of the money granted by Parliament. He objected to proceeding with the Resolution at that hour.

MR. DEEDES moved that the Chairman leave the Chair.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that there would be ample opportunity for discussing the measure on the second reading.

LORD NAAS said, that they could not discuss the Bill till they had it before them. He, therefore, hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be allowed to bring in the Bill.

MR. SPOONER said, he had no wish to oppose the general wish of the Committee. He hoped, however, that the second reading would be moved at a time which would give ample opportunity for discussion.

MR. DEEDES withdrew his Amendment.

Resolution agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolved,

That the Chairman be directed to move the
Mr. Cardwell

House, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to enable the Trustees of the Royal College of Saint Patrick, at Maynooth, to make provision for certain necessary buildings and repairs.

Resolution to be reported on Monday next.

House adjourned at Three o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, July 9, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Local Taxation Returns.

2^a Naval Discipline.

ITALY.—EXPLANATION.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, he wished to call the attention of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Brougham) to the impression that was made, adverse to some highly respectable persons, friends of his own, by the disparaging tone in which his noble and learned Friend spoke the other evening of some correspondence that had been addressed to him by certain gentlemen in Florence. How did that correspondence originate, and what was its nature? It was conveyed to him by persons in whom he could place as much reliance as he could in any one in this House or in his noble and learned Friend himself, and it related to the acts and proceedings of the Provisional Government in Tuscany—a Provisional Government which was supported and nursed mainly by the action of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs. That Government had gagged the press so that not one word was allowed to appear in public except what was favourable to the acts of Baron Ricasoli, and therefore his correspondents were compelled to transmit their statements to him in order that they might be read in the House of Lords. But now the Provisional Government was at an end; and what had since happened? In a newspaper, which had been started by the most eminent men in Florence within the last six weeks, all the statements of his correspondents with regard to the misdeeds, the duplicity, the tyranny of the Provisional Government were fully substantiated. Had the Government denied the facts? On the contrary, after a vain attempt to suppress the paper, they bought up the printer and the other printers in the town to refuse to print it. But here, too, he was glad to say they failed; so that the newspaper which contained this exposé of the deeds of the Provisional Government, after having been suspended for ten days, was now in such credit that it was published daily instead of, as at first, three times a week. The result, then, of the discredit which had been attached to the statements of his correspondents was that they were substantiated in a newspaper published by some of the first men in Florence. He might also state that he had foreseen, and had warned the House from the beginning, that the only result of our interference in Tuscan affairs would be the strengthening of the Mazzini party. That party was now growing stronger and bolder than ever, and the last account he had received from Florence was that no fewer than three barricade committees had been formed in that town. Discredit had also been thrown on some statements he made on the authority of the French newspapers with respect to atrocities committed in Sicily; but these statements were confirmed the day after he made them by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, though he said the acts were not traced to General Garibaldi. Now, he never said that these outrages were the acts of the Government or that they were the acts of persons acting under the Government. But what he said, and what he would repeat was, that when the regular Government was suspended, then every person acting at all was acting under the authority of General Garibaldi; and he did not think when a person assumed responsibility such as General Garibaldi had done, and great atrocities were committed, it was enough to say that the reports of the British Admiral on the station were to the effect that Garibaldi was perfectly humane and moderate. He never meant to dispute that, for he knew nothing on the subject, but Garibaldi ought not to put himself in a situation of such responsibility if he could not prevent the crimes that were committed by those under him. It was unnecessary to assure his noble and learned Friend that he did not mean to bring any charge against him, but he thought this explanation was due to those respectable persons who had corresponded with him, and whose statements, though they had been discredited at first, were now so completely substantiated.

LORD BROUGHAM:—I am sure my noble Friend and the House will acquit me in anything which I said from intending to cast even the slightest imputation on my noble Friend himself. Correspondence undoubtedly means letters received as well as sent; and when I described the very small value which I attached to the correspondence of my noble Friend I meant letters which he had received, and not letters which he had sent. Of those I had no means of judging, except from my entire confidence in my noble Friend, and whatever statements were conveyed in those I am quite certain would be accurate. The value which I attached to the letters containing the details referred to by the noble Marquess was certainly of the very smallest, and nothing which has now fallen from my noble Friend has inclined me to raise that estimate. My information from Florence is diametrically opposed to that of my noble Friend—though I have no doubt whatever that he will attach as little value to my correspondence as I have attached to his. I believe that the Government of Florence is not subject to the imputations cast upon it by the correspondents of my noble Friend, but that it is perfectly free from those charges. As to that celebrated individual—not more celebrated than he deserves—General Garibaldi, I am exceedingly glad indeed to hear that my noble Friend does not at all impute to him those excesses which he says have been committed in the course of the revolutionary proceedings which have taken place in Sicily. However, I did not quite so understand my noble Friend on a former occasion, and to-night I thought that, if he did not actually quite charge these excesses upon General Garibaldi, he more than insinuated that he is answerable for them. I suppose my noble Friend means that a man who is in supreme power is answerable for everything which is done during his dictatorship; but in no other sense can General Garibaldi be answerable for any of those offences to which reference has been made. My noble Friend seems to be under the impression that the Secretary of State admitted those excesses the other night in the other House of Parliament, and also that General Garibaldi had something to do with them; but my belief is that he peremptorily denied it, as I do now upon his authority and upon the authority of all others who have any knowledge of the matter. There is no cause known in history which has met with more universal acceptance than the cause of the Sicilians, with General Garibaldi at their head, against the tyrant of Sicily and his emissaries, whether in the shape of sbirri or soldiers—the soldiers, I verily believe, but for a season about to remain in allegiance to him. I am told there is a constitution about to be imposed, not upon Sicily, for that is out of the question, but upon Naples; in my firm belief, and in my entire and hearty hope and prayer, such constitution will utterly fail to save that detestable tyranny.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY had never said that General Garibaldi was personally answerable for the outrages that had been committed. What he did say, and what he now repeated, was, that when a man, in violation of the law of nations, assumed absolute power, either in Sicily or elsewhere, he rendered himself responsible for all the outrages that were committed. The noble Lord, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, did not trace those outrages to General Garibaldi personally; but he did not deny that outrages had been committed. One word more as to his correspondents. The noble and learned Lord said, that what he had heard made no difference in the value he imputed to these statements. What, no difference! when he informed him that every word in those statements had been confirmed and repeated in a Liberal newspaper published in Florence? In 1848 his noble and learned Friend spoke strongly against the revolutionary spirit; and the other night his noble and learned Friend stated that he did not retract or change one word of what he then said. All he had to say was, that if his noble and learned Friend's opinions were not changed, he had greatly changed his mode of giving expression to them.

LORD BROUGHAM wished to add one word only with regard to General Garibaldi. His noble Friend said that he had proceeded in violation of the law of nations to liberate his fellow-subjects.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY: Not his fellow-subjects.

LORD BROUGHAM: His countrymen, then.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY: Why his countrymen?

LORD BROUGHAM: Because he is an Italian. He could only say that if the law of nations was to be enforced to the perpetual subjugation and misery of nations, the sooner they had as little as possible of the law of nations the better.

LORD WODEHOUSE wished to call attention to one phrase made use of by the noble Marquess, that the noble Lord, the

Lord Brougham

Foreign Secretary, in the other House, said he could not trace the outrages committed in Sicily to General Garibaldi. That was a phrase which would imply that his noble Friend had a suspicion of General Garibaldi's connivance in those outrages, though there was not sufficient evidence of the fact. His noble Friend's expressions, however, went much further than a denial of any proof that General Garibaldi had connived at those excesses. Not only was there no connivance, but he had done his utmost to prevent them; and by the last intelligence, it appeared that he had recourse to severe measures for that purpose. But when a man was placed in the position of General Garibaldi it was not surprising that he should not be able to prevent the commission of everything of which he disapproved. He certainly deserved the highest credit for the generosity and moderation which he had displayed. It must not be forgotten, too, that if some outrages had been committed in the excitement of a revolution, outrages had been previously committed by the Royal troops, which were perfectly well known to all the world, and which were unsurpassed by anything of which the oppressed people of Sicily had been guilty.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET, in moving the second reading of the Bill to amend the laws relating to the government of the Navy, said that it was nearly a century since the Act was brought in which at present governed the discipline of the navy, and the changes of the law and the progress of public opinion with regard to the service, rendered it very desirable that Amendments should be introduced and the law revised. Neither offences nor punishments were clearly defined. A paper which was in their Lordships' hands showed the spirit in which it was intended by this Bill to deal with the subject. It was proposed to deal with it on principles of justice and humanity, without relaxing in any degree the discipline of the navy. The men would know what punishments they incurred, and that the object was to keep good order among themselves, without which they could have no comfort or safety on board ship. With an ill-disciplined crew, the insubordinate and disorderly shirked work, and, as the work must be done, it fell upon the orderly and subordinate. It was, therefore, in the interest of the orderly men that the disorderly should be punished. It was proposed to diminish the almost universal punishment of death which stood in the old code. It was never inflicted in a great many cases, and it was desirable the men should know what in those cases their punishment really would be. He had received a great many suggestions from officers who were competent to form a sound opinion upon several of the details, some of which he intended to adopt. After the second reading he should propose to go into Committee pro forma, in order to introduce those Amendments, and the Bill might be debated and re-considered on going again into Committee on a future day. There were many reasons why it was desirable to pass the Bill this year. They had heard with regret of disturbances in vessels both at home and abroad, and he was told that one great fault of the present law was that the petty officers, who stood between the officers and seamen, and on whom good discipline in great measure depended, though protected on board ship, were not protected sufficiently on shore. They were often injured and insulted on shore by the men, whose conduct they had found fault with on board ship. The Bill, therefore, contained a clause by which martial law would be extended to protect the petty officers on shore, as well as on board ship. The continuance of corporal punishment in the navy was a question which he had considered very carefully, and had heard fully and fairly discussed among naval officers. The conclusion at which he had arrived was, that to transfer the power of inflicting corporal punishment from the captain to a court-martial would be to diminish the authority of the captain and to endanger the discipline of the service. The nearest approach which could safely be made to such a system was to provide—as was done in the present Bill—that, except in the case of open mutiny, no man should be subjected to corporal punishment by the commanding officer until the case had been inquired into and reported upon by one or more officers appointed by the commander. By that means the responsibility would be to a certain extent divided between the captain and one or more of his subordinates. He proposed that arrangement rather for the protection of the captain than of the men, as it would relieve him of that personal odium which he was at present apt to incur if he inflicted corporal punishment. Their Lordships were, no doubt, aware that seamen were now grouped in two classes, and that first-class men were not liable to corporal punishment at all till they had been reduced to the second class. Every precaution, therefore, had been taken to place corporal punishment on a safe footing. He was certainly not prepared to give up this mode of punishment, as certain persons who called themselves the “friends of the sailor” demanded. He believed that its abolition would be a positive misfortune to the well-behaved men, and would lead to great inconvenience at sea, as confinement would be almost the only substitute.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE agreed with the noble Duke as to the importance of the subject; but he was of opinion that the discipline of the navy was equally, if not more, dependent on the character and conduct of the officers in command than upon the code of laws under which they acted. In forming an opinion on this question, the public had not made sufficient allowance for the peculiarities of the naval service, and had been too prone to consider the Articles of War on the same ground as the general law of the land. The effect of popular opinion acting on the successive Boards of Admiralty had been to render it extremely difficult for officers to carry out the naval code of laws and to maintain the discipline of the service; and that influence could only be met by the establishment of a detailed system of discipline, and by the personal example of commanding officers in sharing the same privations and restrictions as their men. Let the officers show that they were determined to maintain discipline; but at the same time let them make it apparent that they themselves took their share of that discipline. He owned that the language of the existing Act of Parliament, which had been in force for a hundred years, was too general and comprehensive, and that it was desirable that the particular offence and the punishment attached should be clearly defined. He had, therefore, no objection to the measure of the noble Duke as a whole, although there were points in which it might be improved. He highly approved the manner in which the noble Duke proposed to deal with the distinction which prevailed between offences committed on shore and on board of ships. The exemptions from martial law which a seaman at present enjoyed when he quitted his ship certainly tended to unsettle him on his return on board, and not unfrequently petty officers who attempted to enforce very strict discipline were assaulted by the men when on shore. A marine who misconducted himself on shore was liable to the same punishment as on board. Not so the seaman, who was amenable only to the civil law for his conduct on shore. One result of this was, a threat to a petty officer to retort upon him when he landed has the effect of deterring him from discharging his duty. The Bill gave power to the Lords of the Admiralty to suspend, annul, or modify any sentence passed on any person subject to the Act, except the sentence of death, which could only be remitted by Her Majesty. He objected to any proposal to constitute the Lords of the Admiralty an appellant court. The naval officers who composed a court-martial were generally quite as good judges as the Lords of the Admiralty, if not better. An appeal from a court-martial was always open to the Crown, and, although he wished to see an appellate jurisdiction established, it ought to be entrusted, he thought, to men learned in the law, and not to the Admiralty. Great objections were properly entertained to the 15th section of the 49th clause, which set up within the walls of the ship a court for the judgment of offences. The clause said:—

“ Except in case of open mutiny no man shall be sentenced by the commanding officer to corporal punishment until his offence has been inquired into by one or more officers appointed by such commanding officer, and the guilt or innocence of the prisoner reported to such commanding officer.”

He objected to this clause, thinking it desirable to retain in the hands of the captain the sole power, conduct, and management of the ship from first to last, together with the full responsibility of such command. The captain might himself see an offence committed, and yet under this clause he would be unable to punish the offender, until his guilt had been inquired into by these officers. Such a regulation would diminish and injure the authority of the captain, and have a prejudicial influence upon the discipline of the ship. At present an interval of forty-eight hours elapsed between the sentence of corporal punishment and its infliction, so that ample time existed for inquiry and reconsideration. He trusted that the House would not agree to this inquiry by junior officers; there were several clauses in the Bill which required the most careful consideration, either before a Select Committee or in Committee of the Whole House.

The Earl of Hardwicke

LORD COLCHESTER said, this Bill proposed to remodel the whole law upon this subject. He did not object to many of the alterations; indeed he approved of some of them being made, but others would require some notice in Committee. In his opinion it was absolutely necessary, for the good of the ship, that the captain should have complete command over all persons in the ship.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE objected to that part of the Bill by which an officer might be dismissed the service for what was called an “error of judgment.” He thought this a very severe penalty.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET would consider the various suggestions that had been made, with a view to their adoption in Committee if they were deemed advisable. If the Bill was sent to a Select Committee upstairs, and noble Lords attended to it for a day or two, he had no doubt that it might be considerably improved.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

LAW AND EQUITY BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that to his great regret the Select Committee to which this Bill was referred had struck out several most valuable clauses, but he hoped the House might before long be induced to adopt them. The Bill as it stood still contained important amendments of the law which he believed would be found beneficial in practice, and he therefore submitted it to the favourable consideration of their Lordships. Two clauses had been omitted by mistake, and he believed there was no objection to their introduction.

LORD BROUGHAM shared in the regret expressed by his noble and learned Friend at the decision which had been arrived at by the Select Committee. He hoped that next year, his noble Friends who had overpowered the Lord Chancellor and himself in the Committee would come to, he would not say a wiser, but a different opinion.

LORD CHELMSFORD dissented from the view taken by the noble and learned Lords who had just addressed the Committee. He believed that the Bill had been much improved by the omission of the clauses referred to; those which remained would doubtless prove exceedingly useful.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the supporters of the Bill in its original shape had been only compelled to yield to what lawyers called the vis major, which could not be resisted.

Amendments made. The Report thereof to be received To-morrow.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock, till To-morrow Half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, July 9, 1860.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Inclosure (No 2.);

2° Queen's Prison; Clearance Inwards and Lien for Freight.

3° Indemnity; Mines Regulation and Inspection; Metropolitan Building Act (1855) Amendment; Burial Grounds (Ireland) Act (1856) Amendment; Bleaching and Dyeing Works.

HOUSES OF REFUGE.—QUESTION.

MR. W. EWART said, he wished to ask the President of the Poor Law Board, Whether there will be any objection on the part of the Board to introduce a Clause into the Poor Law Bill, or Poor Law Amendment Bill, which would render it legal on the part of Guardians of the Poor in England and Wales to expend Poor Rates in relief to women and girls who may be received into accredited Houses of Refuge, or Homes, for the purposes of moral and industrial training?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that he was aware of the scheme to which this question referred, and that it was favoured by some very excellent and benevolent individuals, and on that account it had received the very attentive consideration of the Poor Law Board. He was bound, however, to tell his hon. Friend that it was the opinion of those who had had most experience in the administration of the Poor Law, as well as those on whose legal advice the Board depended, that this scheme was beyond the province of the Poor Law, and almost at variance with its purpose. The Poor Law only undertook to relieve destitution and to take charge of the children of destitute persons. The proposal of his hon. Friend was for the purpose of applying the rates for the maintenance of adult persons not under the supervision of the Guardians, and in places not subject to the jurisdiction of the Magistrates. The Legislature might change its policy in this respect, but he could not but think that the greatest care would be required, if it did so, to guard against some of the evils to which farming the poor was formerly subject, and which rested upon somewhat the same principle.

KENSINGTON GARDENS.—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to put a question to the First Commissioner of Works on a subject which had excited much interest—it was, Whether he proposes to make a road through the centre of Kensington Gardens, as was stated, joining Tyburnia to Belgravia, and going over the site of the Exhibition building? He would also ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will make such a road without previously coming to Parliament for its sanction.

MR. COWPER said, he had no intention at present to do what the hon. Member had mentioned.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman means to apply for the consent of Parliament in the first instance.

MR. COWPER said, he had thought it unnecessary to say that if any money was required for any works in the Park, he would certainly think it right, upon the whole, to ask the House to vote the money before he spent it.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY (SALARIES, &c.)—RESOLUTIONS.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th June],

“That this House doth agree with the Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency [Salaries, &c.] in the first Resolution, as amended, ‘That the Salaries, Allowances, Remunerations, and Retiring Annuities, which may become payable to certain persons appointed under or affected by any Act of the present Session for amending the Law relating to Bankruptcy and Insolvency in England, shall be charged upon the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.’”

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

[Second Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, as some days have elapsed since the vote of the 25th of June, it may be convenient that I should state to the House the course which I intend to adopt to repair the mischief done by that vote. It will be recollected that the vote was taken upon a Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby), proposing to omit from the Report on Salaries the word "compensation." At the mention of that word the House fell into a fit of indignation. It was idle to attempt to tell them, as I did, that the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill created no new compensation, that the compensations spoken of in the Report of the Committee were the penalties paid for the sins of a past generation, because they were created in 1831, and that the Bill now before the House did nothing but what was recommended by a Commission presided over by my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) as being a measure dictated by ordinary justice. It was of no use to tell the House that. The House was determined to omit the word "compensation," and accordingly that word was struck out of the Report. Now, one object of the Bill for the amendment of the law of bankruptcy and insolvency which I have introduced is to relieve suitors in bankruptcy from an enormous burden of fees which ought never to have been imposed upon them, and part of those fees were created for the purpose of answering these very compensations. The fees which I propose to remit will amount to very nearly £90,000 a year. Undoubtedly, they ought none of them to have been imposed, but when they are to be abolished it becomes necessary to provide from other sources the sums raised by them. The only step which I took to encroach upon any other fund was that recommended by the Commission of throwing those charges which were a legacy from the bad state of things altered in 1831 upon the public, instead of leaving them to be borne by the suitors in Bankruptcy. In consequence of the vote of the House it becomes necessary to alter altogether the arrangements of the Bill. I am, however, able to do so without much inconvenience; and it would not, therefore, have been that cause which induced me at the moment to hesitate as to going on with the Bill. But, Sir, I took that vote as an indication of the temper of the House. I had met with three adverse divisions. I had received from the opposite side of the House the most generous and the most enlightened support. I am indebted to the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns), to the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir Fitz-Roy Kelly) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Whiteside), for such assistance; but the adverse divisions were all called for and headed by hon. Gentlemen who sit behind me. Nothing would induce me to proceed with the Bill unless there is some confidence in the Government and some confidence in its author. It is a Bill which not twenty Gentlemen in the House have read, and which certainly not twenty understand; therefore, if every hon. Gentleman is to do that which is right in his own eyes, whether he understands the matter or not, it would be of no use to attempt to proceed with the measure. I could undoubtedly meet any ordinary opposition; but the blows which I have received have come from familiar friends in whom I trusted. What probability is there of success? I am opposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Coventry (Mr. Ellice), although I believe there is not a single merchant or manufacturer in that place who has not petitioned in favour of the Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Nottingham (Mr. Mellor) also went out with the majority, yet from the town which he represents I have received the strongest entreaties to go on with the measure; nay, on the part of the whole commercial world there is, as far as I see, with the exception of some matter of detail, the greatest anxiety for the passing of this Bill. We have had two nights, and have got through twenty-four clauses. Unless, therefore, there is a general disposition to put confidence in the Government, to trust to the attention and care which have been used in preparing this Bill, and to place that confidence upon the approbation which has been given to it by the public, who are infinitely more concerned in it, and have been infinitely more diligent in its study than have hon. Members of this House, I must give up the attempt to pass it as a hopeless task. In the hope that such confidence will be extended, and that we shall proceed with a desire to pass it, I am willing to go on with the Bill.

The arrangement which I propose in order to remedy the mischief which the hon. Baronet somewhat unconsciously did is this—I propose to leave the additional salaries of the County Court Judges, if the House shall think fit to pass them, charged upon the Consolidated Fund, but I also propose to give to that fund a very large compensation for that small additional charge. The House will recollect that the County Court Judges have been treated with some little inequality—I may say with some degree of unfairness. They are divided into three classes; some receive £1,500 a year, another small class receives £1,350, and another £1,200. Now, it being the object of the Bankruptcy Bill to give additional labour in bankruptcy to these Judges, and especially to those who receive only £1,200 a year, I propose to make the salaries of all County Court Judges £1,500 a year. In return for this it has been felt that the fees of the County Courts would well bear some augmentation. At present 10*d.* in the pound only is paid for each plaint; it is proposed to increase that to 1*s.* At present nothing is paid for the service of a summons, and in consequences summonses are frequently taken out vexatiously. It is proposed to impose a small charge upon the service of a summons, and so numerous are these summonses that this trifling additional impost, which has been recommended by fifty County Court Judges out of fifty-seven, will bring into the Consolidated Fund about £34,000 a year, the charge which I propose to throw upon it amounting to only £10,500. If, therefore, that be done which the House is aware depends upon the Treasury and the Lord Chancellor, the Consolidated Fund, instead of being a loser, will, in fact, be a considerable gainer. The other measure which I shall ask the House to adopt is this—I shall leave the compensations and retiring annuities created by the Act of 1831 charged where they now are. I propose that a statement of accounts shall be laid before Parliament on the 1st of March every year, and that a vote for any deficiency which may exist, never exceeding the amount of compensations and retiring allowances, shall be taken on the 1st of April. In that way I expect to enable the Court of Bankruptcy to diminish its fees to the amount of about £90,000 per annum. Those fees may be described in few words. There are stamp duties now paid to the amount of £26,000 a year; I propose to reduce them to about £5,000. There is a heavy percentage paid upon estates in bankruptcy, which, upon an average of seven or eight years, amounts to about £38,000. I propose to take that away altogether, because the practical effect of its continuance would be to keep very large estates out of the court. In addition, there are large and oppressive percentages received by the official assignees; they amounted last year to nearly £51,000. I propose to abolish these altogether. Of course in making these large reductions I reckon upon a considerable increase to the income of the court, which I expect will be made by bringing all trust deeds and deeds of composition within the reach of the law of bankruptcy. It will be recollected that the great feature of the present Bill is to make the law of bankruptcy part of the ordinary law of debtor and creditor. As the matter now stands you cannot have the aid of the law of bankruptcy without not only going into the court, but administering the whole of the estate in the Court. It frequently happens, however, that you want the assistance of the law of bankruptcy for a particular purpose only. I propose to give that benefit to all trustees, creditors, and parties to deeds of composition upon their paying a very inconsiderable stamp duty, and registering the deeds in the Court of Bankruptcy. At present a great part of the insolvency business is conducted in a very irregular manner. All insolvencies of any magnitude are made the subject of private arrangement, and there is no record kept of the state of solvency or insolvency among non-traders. Under the improved system which I propose there will be a perfect record. According to the best returns trust deeds and deeds of composition amount to between 8,000 and 9,000 per annum. In future they may not exceed 6,000, and I propose to derive from them, in the shape of a graduated stamp, a sum amounting to about £60,000. In return for that small payment, they will get the whole benefit of the law of bankruptcy; they will enjoy the advantage of acting under the direction of the court, and, upon the whole, I have no doubt that the deficiency which I should otherwise have in my income will be amply provided for. I trust, therefore, that we may now go on with the Bill, and do what we can to rescue this great mercantile nation from a reproach which it bears, I am sorry to say, in marked contrast to other nations—that, while it is the greatest trading country in the world, its law of bankruptcy and insolvency is in a most imperfect and even disgraceful condition. The hon. and learned Gentleman concluded by moving that the first Resolution, as amended, be agreed to.

[Second Night.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY denied that the Amendment he proposed and carried on a former occasion involved any "mischief" whatever. It simply affirmed the principle that it was not desirable to connect Amendments of the law with immense charges upon the Consolidated Fund. He had no wish, for his part, to oppose the Amendment of the law now proposed by the hon. and learned Attorney General, though he thought a Bill containing 540 clauses was a rather dangerous sort of Amendment, likely to afford considerable employment to gentlemen of the long robe. It appeared to him that the Attorney General would derive from the compensation account, which amounted to a very large sum, and from the fees which he proposed to establish under the present Bill, a sum amply sufficient to cover all charges.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE remarked, that the House ought to be much obliged to the hon. Baronet opposite for having brought forward his Amendment. It was quite clear that the fees in the Bankruptcy Court ought to be charged with the compensations, and if it turned out in the long run that some small balance was not provided for, then it would be for the House to consider whether it would make up the deficiency. That was a better course than placing a fixed charge on the Consolidated Fund. He wished entirely to disclaim that any Member on that side of the House had been moved by a factious feeling in the course they had taken; but it was not reasonable to expect that a Bill containing 540 clauses should be taken on the ipse dixit of any person, however distinguished.

MR. BARROW said, the administration of the law had been loaded from time to time with useless sinecures to a most disgraceful extent, and upon a former occasion he had thought it his duty to protest against the transfer of a sinecure of that description from the fee fund of the Court of Bankruptcy to the taxpayers of the country. He doubted very much whether it was desirable to increase the tax on the poor suitors of the County Courts in order to relieve the rich suitors of the Bankruptcy Court, and he was very much disposed to vote against that portion of the measure which proposed to draw into a sort of central vortex a vast number of transactions which parties now arranged in private in order to save the expense of the law courts.

The Attorney General

MR. HENLEY said, that though he was one of the unfortunate individuals who voted against the scheme of compensation which had been proposed by the Government, he was not anxious to escape the censure which the hon. and learned Attorney General had distributed. He thought, when the comprehensiveness of the scheme of the hon. and learned Gentleman was considered, and that it might include every one, from the Archbishop of Canterbury to the poorest curate, and from the highest Duke to the dweller under the poorest roof, the Attorney General need not doubt that he should get plenty of fish into his net; and, if that were so, he thought it was rather too much to expect that everybody should take the clauses of this Bill for granted. The Bill would affect a very great number of people, perhaps without one in ten of them knowing how they might be brought under its provisions. The hon. and learned Gentleman ought to be prepared, therefore, to expect some degree of opposition. Any person who had incurred encumbrances for the last twenty years might find himself drawn in under this Bill, and might have to pay additional interest in time of pressure, to escape from the effect of its provisions. Whether the scheme would work well, time alone would show; but, at any rate, a sufficient number of persons might be brought within its operation.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that in his original proposition the hon. and learned Gentleman had calculated far too much upon the ignorance of the House; and the House had acted most commendably in protecting the pockets of the public.

Question put, and agreed to.

Subsequent Resolutions agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 28 (Addition to the Salary of the County Court Judges).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL proposed to omit that clause, and to bring up a new one instead, the object of which would be to give to certain of the County Court Judges an addition of £300 a year to some,

and of £150 to others, with a view to giving them all £1,500 a year.

MR. MALINS: Then we are to understand that the salaries of the County Court Judges are all to be uniform?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Yes; uniform throughout.

MR. BAINES said, there was a certain class of County Court Judges that had already £1,500 a year, on account of the great amount of business they had to discharge. In Yorkshire, for example, he knew that the Judges had an enormous amount of business cast upon them. Now, by the present Bill an additional burden would be cast upon them. He thought it hardly fair that such an increase of business should be put upon them without giving them additional compensation.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that some time ago the Government had given a distinct assurance that the successors of those Judges now receiving £1,500 a year should only be paid £1,200. As regarded the County Court Judges generally, he believed that not half of their time was occupied. In all probability the additional business that would be cast upon them by this Bill would be very little.

MR. FRANK CROSSLEY said, he did not think that the County Court Judges were at all overpaid for the duties they were expected to discharge. In Yorkshire he knew that the time of the Judges there was fully employed.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, the 25th Clause gave the Government the power to create additional districts where the duties were more than one Judge could fairly perform. From Returns which had been submitted to the House he gathered that whilst some of the Judges were occupied from 150 to 200 days in the year, others were only engaged from 100 to 150 days; whilst one was occupied only 94 days per annum in the duties of his post. Under these circumstances he thought it could hardly be said that the Judges were overworked. The Metropolitan Magistrates had more disagreeable duties to perform, and had only £1,200 a year, whereas it was proposed that all the County Court Judges should have £1,500.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would be kind enough to explain what in his judgment would be the additional charge placed upon the Consolidated Fund by the new clause he intended to bring up. He concurred in the opinion that the salaries of the County Court Judges should be placed on a uniform footing. He hoped, however, that the Bankruptcy Bill would not be like the French Treaty—the more they knew of it the worse they would like it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the whole charge thrown on the consolidated fund would be £11,700. There were at present eighteen County Court Judges in receipt of £1,500 a year; four who were receiving £1,350; and thirty-seven who were paid £1,200. If the clause he intended to bring up were adopted, these thirty-seven gentlemen, together with the four who stood between the favoured and the degraded class, would all receive £1,500. The County Court Judges were of great public utility, and he should be glad to make their salaries commensurate with their utility. A man might be a grocer or a cheesemonger without education, but he required considerable education and considerable experience to become a County Court Judge. In his opinion, no money was better spent than that paid in performing the first duty of a Government—the administration of justice; and, although it might be stigmatized as a lawyer's job, he should call economy there a most miserable economy. The reason why the salaries of the County Court Judges had been fixed at a uniform rate of £1,500 a year was because it was desirable that no distinction should be made between those who at present received that rate of remuneration, and the County Court Judges who were paid only £1,200 a year, and who, being located in purely country districts, would have a greater amount of labour thrown upon them under the operation of the Bill than would be the case with their brethren whose courts were situated in populous town districts, where there were Commissioners in Bankruptcy fully competent to discharge the duties of their office.

MR. MALINS said, that on a former occasion he had expressed a doubt as to the propriety of extending the jurisdiction of the County Courts. Having considered the subject further, however, and communicated with many persons of experience, he was compelled to admit it was a matter of the greatest importance that the business should be brought home to the doors of the suitors; that in many cases the present system amounted to a denial of justice; and, therefore, in order to effect that object, it was absolutely necessary to extend the jurisdiction of the Bill to the County Court Judges. In regard to the salaries of those Judges, he was glad to find the hon. and learned Gentleman about to give effect to a proposition which he (Mr. Malins) had supported some years ago—namely, uniform salaries to the County Court Judges. He differed altogether in opinion from the hon. Member for Lambeth as to the standard of compensation for those Judges. A gentleman who was obliged to travel frequently long distances from his wife and family in order to act as Judge of some of those courts, was really as much entitled to the highest salary as one who was compelled to sit so many hours each day in a court situated in populous districts. If it were desirable to have competent and educated men as Judges of those Courts nothing could be more short-sighted than to cut down their salaries to an amount that would prevent them maintaining that position which they ought to occupy in society.

[Second Night.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the County Court Judges who were now in the receipt of £1,500 a year, were men who had their time fully occupied, and who had to administer every description of law. That being so, he should like to know how it could be considered expedient to add to their labours unless they were accorded increased remuneration. If such a course were persevered in, the result would be that the business would not be done, and that these Gentlemen would very properly say that they had not engaged to discharge the duties which under the operation of the Bill would be cast upon them. When the hon. Member for Lambeth made himself the judge of intellectual excellence he appealed to a different standard from that adopted by other men. In regard to the qualities necessary for the efficient discharges of the duties of a County Court judge they were of a peculiar and superior order. The County Court Judges administered chancery law, common law, admiralty law, and every other species of law common to this country, and they had not the aid of a Bar, which was often of the greatest importance and assistance to the Bench. For his own part, he could not understand why the administrators of justice in Westminster Hall were not chosen from their body rather than from among the Members of that House belonging to the legal profession.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the remark of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) to the effect that the County Court Judges would be disposed to strike if required to do increased work, tended to place the Committee in a position of some difficulty in dealing with the clause. He might add that the Attorney General appeared to him to have used an awkward phrase when he spoke of one class of those Gentlemen—those who received only £1,200 a year—as “degraded.” Holding that opinion, the hon. and learned Gentleman must be prepared to use similar language in the case of the County Court Judges who received £1,500 a year, as compared with the district Bankruptcy Commissioners, whose salary was £1,800 per annum.

Mr. Malins

MR. ROEBUCK repeated that they could not impose farther work on the County Court Judges without their either refusing to do it, or doing it inefficiently.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he understood the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman to come to this: that it was improper to put any bankruptcy business on the County Court Judges at all. But the Bill provided a way to meet the difficulty. He quite agreed that in many districts the County Court Judges were fully employed, perfectly competent to do their work, and did their work extremely well. His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, in proposing to transfer the bankruptcy business to the County Courts, made the best choice he could. On a vacancy occurring in the office of district Commissioner the executive would have the power of transferring the bankruptcy business to the County Courts, and making a new arrangement of the County Court district, and appointing a new County Court Judge. At present they were enabled, with a salary of £1,500 a year, to command the services of some of the most superior men at the Bar; it was a competent and sufficient salary; the only demur he should make was as to the salary of the district Commissioners who received £1,800 a year. He thought it desirable to have a uniformity of salary. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would consider that point. As he read the Bill it was not proposed at once to equalize the salaries of all County Court Judges, and to transfer bankruptcy business to them, but only as vacancies in the office of district Commissioner occurred. It was the more necessary that as the process came into operation only gradually there should be a uniformity of salary.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, with regard to the equalization of the salaries of the district Commissioners, he undoubtedly hoped that whenever a vacancy occurred, it would not be filled up, but the business allotted either to the County Court Judge or to another Commissioner. But if that were not the case, no doubt the new district Commissioners ought to be put upon an equality with the County Court Judges. In reply to the observation of his hon. and learned Friend he wished to observe that by the present state of things jurisdiction in insolvency was vested in the County Court Judge. The Bill took away the distinction between bankruptcy and insolvency, and all that description of business which was now administered under the description of insolvency, and which, in future, would be known by the name of bankruptcy, must, of course, at once pass to the County Court Judge. In all cases where the property to be administered was less than £300, it would be competent for the district Commissioners to transfer the case to the County Court Judge, and in all cases where the debtor was in prison the petition was to be presented in the County Court. By the 30th Clause the Judge of the County Court was to have like jurisdiction, and to perform the same duties as were now fulfilled by the district Commissioners.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 29 to 31 agreed to.

Clause 32 (Registrar may act for the Judge in certain cases).

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he objected to the business of the County Courts being delegated to deputies. It was proposed by this clause to allow registrars of County Courts to sit and dispose of cases under 40s., or where the debts were admitted. It was not the amount in issue that regulated the importance of a case, as instanced in the case of shipmoney. If the business increased beyond what it was possible for the Judge to dispose of, the districts should be subdivided, and new Judges appointed under the 25th Clause.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, the clause involved a very serious innovation. Four-fifths of the business in the County Courts arose out of cases where the amount in dispute was under 40s. It was proposed that the decisions of the registrar should be subject to appeal to the Judge—a provision which was a satire upon the clause. Cases under 40s. often involved as important and difficult questions as cases of higher amount; and the judgments of the registrars, who were not judicial officers, would create dissatisfaction among the poor, who were, on the other hand, quite content with the ruling of the Judges.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID thought the clause opposed to the very principle of the County Court jurisdiction,—namely, that of deciding questions of small amount without disproportionate expense. The more unlikely litigants were to have the assistance of advocates possessing competent skill, the more indispensable it was that the Judge himself should have that qualification. It would be better to create additional County Court Judges, as provided by the 25th clause.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the whole tenor of the Bill was that the poor man was to be satisfied with an inferior Judge.

MR. COLLIER recommended the serious reconsideration of this clause. He concurred in the transfer of the business in bankruptcy to the County Courts, but he thought that advantage would be bought at too high a price if it was essentially necessary to alter the principle of the County Courts Act. He hoped the clause would not be pressed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the clause did not propose to make this transfer to a deputy without the intervention of some authority. He never would have proposed such a clause. A deputy was only to be called in where the Lord Chancellor thought it absolutely necessary. Nine-tenths of the cases consisted in the Judges sitting in court and using such a stereotype phrase as “You must pay 2s. 6d. a month.” Nevertheless he recognized the force of the objections which had been raised, and he would consent to the omission of the clause.

Clause withdrawn.

Clause 33 (Jurisdiction of the Court).

MR. MURRAY proposed the omission of the word “creditors,” which, if retained, would have the effect of making all creditors, whether they chose to come in under the bankruptcy or not, subject to and bound by the jurisdiction of the Court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the object of the clause was to give jurisdiction to the Court of Bankruptcy in favour of strangers; that was to say, that any individual having a question with the assignees of the bankrupt, or the creditors of the bankrupt, might come into the Bankruptcy Court, and have the question tried. The omission of the words would cramp the jurisdiction of the Court, and its retention would extend it. The retention of the word could not do harm, and might be useful in many cases.

[Second Night.]

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he was disposed to think that the retention of the word would effect an alteration of the law of bankruptcy; and trusted that the Attorney General would not introduce any such alteration of the law.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not think his hon. and learned Friend fully appreciated the clause, which was intended to facilitate the proceedings of parties claiming against the assignee, against the creditors, and against the bankrupt. However, if there was any difficulty about the retention of the word in the minds of hon. Members, he would defer to that objection, and consent to its omission.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as were also Clauses 34 to 39.

Clause 40 (Country Vacations).

MR. ROEBUCK said, that by the clause provision was made for a vacation for the Commissioners. The salary of the Commissioner was £1,800 a year, £200 a year for a substitute during his vacation. Now the County Court Judges, who did a great deal more work than the Bankruptcy Commissioners, had no vacation unless they paid for it. Why should there be any difference made?

MR. HENLEY observed, that the district Commissioner of Bankruptcy was to have £1,800 a year; and, when he took his holiday, £200 were to be paid to his deputy; so that his salary became £2,000 a year. He thought that if the Commissioner of Bankruptcy wanted a deputy, he should pay for one out of his salary.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would be glad to assist the hon. and learned Member, when he should bring forward a Bill to emancipate the County Court Judges from the sad position in which they were represented to be. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) expressed his opinion that the Commissioner of Bankruptcy should pay his deputy; but it would not do to allow any one to be chosen as deputy by the Commissioner. The deputy must be a person in whom confidence could be placed.

MR. HENLEY replied, that he had said nothing about the Commissioner appointing his deputy. What he said was, that if the Commissioner wanted a vacation, he might pay for a deputy; and the appointment of the deputy might be in the hands of the Lord Chancellor.

MR. MALINS said, the Bankruptcy Commissioners, if they had to pay for their deputies, would, in fact, receive only £1,600 a year. They were appointed at a salary of £1,800 a year, and he thought that amount ought not to be diminished. The country ought to give them some rest without making them pay for that rest out of their salaries.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the County Court Judges had to administer laws of the greatest importance, and replete with questions quite as difficult as any which came before the Commissioners of Bankruptcy. What was sauce for the gander was sauce for the goose, and it was unjust for the Attorney General to favour one class of functionaries, and turn his back on another.

SIR FITZROY KELLY thought it was premature to raise on this clause a discussion as to the emoluments and labours of the County Court Judges. The Bankruptcy Commissioners, by virtue of several Acts of Parliament, received £1,800 a year, and he did not think it would be just to diminish that amount by making them pay for the services of deputies during the vacation. If the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield would at a future stage propose a clause to afford some rest each year to the County Court Judges, who were overburdened with work, by enabling them to appoint deputies whose services should be paid for by the country, that clause should have his cordial support. The County Court Judges had performed their work in a manner so satisfactory that he was certain a clause of that nature would receive the general support of the two Houses.

MR. BARROW contended that a Commissioner's salary was intended to pay him for the whole of his time, and if he wished for a vacation he ought to pay for a deputy. It was desirable that every man should have a holiday from time to time, but it was not right to call on the State to pay for it. That was the principle adopted in the cases of the County Court Judges and of coroners.

MR. VANCE observed, that it was only by the casting vote of the Chairman a majority of the Select Committee which had inquired into that subject had decided that the Commissioners should receive a higher salary than the County Court Judges; and he thought it would be great extravagance to augment further the advantages of the Commissioners by providing them with deputies at a cost to the public of £200 a year.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 38: Majority 2.

Clause 41 (Jurisdiction above Three hundred Pounds).

SIR FITZROY KELLY suggested for the consideration of the Attorney General whether it was expedient to adopt the amount of assets as the sole criterion of the importance of the case. Perhaps in the majority of cases the amount of assets was the best test, but it might happen that a bankrupt with little or no assets had incurred enormous liabilities, and there were clauses in the Bill rendering a bankrupt liable to prosecution, or to the summary jurisdiction of the Court for contracting large debts without the means of payment.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that the provision looked very like an experiment in corpore vihi. Great questions of law had been determined upon cases involving £5 or £6. It was a mistake to suppose that people having small sums in litigation ought to have an inferior tribunal to decide their rights. The sum of £100 to one man was of the same value as £100,000 to another, and justice ought to be done indifferently. There ought to be a Court to deal with all cases of bankruptcy without regard to the amount of assets.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL would move the omission of the words "in any case" in the 13th line of the clause.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he must press for an answer to the objection that there should be any limit, and that small cases, which might involve great questions of law should be disposed of in an inferior court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that he did not consider the County Court Judges to be less capable of administering justice than the Commissioners; and the County Courts were tribunals which possessed the great advantage of dispensing justice in the cheapest and the most expeditious manner.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought it ought to be made imperative that all cases under three hundred pounds assets should be tried by the County Court Judges.

MR. VANCE remarked, that it would be impossible to make the amount of liabilities the criterion. The assets could be very easily ascertained, but it was clearly impossible to find out the liabilities until the bankruptcy had proceeded a considerable length. The proof of debt was left to the registrar in bankruptcy, subject to the control of the Court; but where a right was to be maintained with regard to property, of course, the question would come before a Court of a superior description.

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he wished to make a few observations on the policy of the clause in answer to the remarks of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) and Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). There was undoubtedly great difficulty in determining what should be the criterion of cases to be transferred to the County Court. But as a general principle it might be held that wherever there was a small estate there was very little judicial business to be done. It was true that the smallness of the estate was no criterion of the questions which might arise with regard to liabilities, but the smallness of the estate would probably render questions about the debts and liabilities of very little importance, and very unlikely to be struggled for. He did not find, therefore, any better rule which could be laid down as to what cases should or should not be transferred to the County Courts than the rule which was expressed in this clause. As to the objection of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, there was something in the nature of that hon. and learned Gentleman which led him to follow his disposition to find fault, even at the expense of consistency. He could not understand how the hon. and learned Member, who had constituted himself the advocate of the County Courts, could prove that to send a bankrupt whose assets were under £300 before one of the Courts, was giving him an inferior measure of justice. The great qualification of justice was that it should be freely and easily obtained; and if there was one feature in this Bill which above all others had called forth the marked approbation of the public, it had been the disposition to give every facility to creditors to transfer these cases to the administration of the County Courts. He had himself said again and again that he hoped the day would come when the whole provincial or country administration of justice would be centred in these courts. Any points of difficulty, in a case where the assets were under three hundred pounds, would, no doubt, be discovered before the chief Court was called on to make the transfer; and, as the authorities had a discretionary power, their decision would be influenced thereby.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he could not pretend to cope with the hon. and learned Gentleman in sarcasm; but he must express his inability to discover why there should be two jurisdictions—one inferior, and the other superior. If the hon. and learned Gentleman thought the County Court Judge the superior jurisdiction, then he conferred a benefit on the poor, and a hardship on the rich.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 42 to 45 inclusive.

Clause 46 (Appeal).

MR. HENLEY asked if there was to be no limit to the power of appeal? However small the matter might be, as the Bill stood parties disposed to litigate might take it to the superior Courts, and he wished to know whether that power was to be guarded in any way?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that was a very important question. It was extremely difficult in bankruptcy to put any limit to the right of appeal. Questions of very great importance might frequently arise on a proof of debt of £20. Anxious as he was not to give any encouragement to litigation, or to open the door to mere vexatious proceedings, he was quite unable to lay down any rule for fixing the limit.

MR. MALINS said, he agreed that it would be undesirable to place any restriction on the right of appeal.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he thought the poor man ought, in some way or other, to be protected from the unreasonable appeals of the rich.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 47 and 48.

Clause 49 (Appeal from Judge).

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to introduce an Amendment by the insertion of the words in line 26, "That the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy may, if he think fit, request the assistance of one or more of the Judges of the superior Courts of common law." The new Judge in Bankruptcy would be placed on the same footing as regarded rank, jurisdiction, and salary, as the ordinary Judges of the Courts of common law and the Vice-Chancellors, and looking at the importance of many of the cases that would come before him, and the difficulty of the questions which he must decide, he did not see why he should not be allowed the same assistance as was given to the Vice-Chancellors and to the Judge of the Court of Probate. That would secure speedy, as well as cheap and satisfactory justice.

The Attorney General

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was sensible of the value of the aid such a provision would give to the Judge in Bankruptcy; but as complaints had been made of the excessive occupation thrown on the Judges of the common law Courts, and of their being required to assist in the Divorce Court, he shrank from asking them to incur this additional task. As they would probably on that very account be relieved, this Session, from attending in the Divorce Court, it would be inconsistent to cast upon them the duty of attending in the Court of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

SIR FITZROY KELLY remarked that the inconvenience in the Divorce Court arose from the fact that a particular class of cases were by the Act necessarily to be heard by the Judge ordinary, and a Chief Justice, and a Puisne Judge, while many of those cases were of a nature that the Chief Judge alone could decide.

MR. MALINS said, he thought it was advisable that the new Judge should have the power of calling in a common law Judge to assist in hearing a particular case argued.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would agree to the Amendment.

MR. MALINS said, he had to object to another point in the clause. It proposed that when an appeal was to be carried from the Court of Bankruptcy to the Lords Justices, the appeal should be made on a special case prepared by the Chief Judge. Now he contended that the Judge whose decision was appealed from ought to have no voice in framing the appeal. The right of appeal ought to be free and unrestricted. Besides, the preparation of the special case involved much inconvenience, and he had known instances in which more time was occupied in framing the case than in arguing it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that while admitting that obstacles lay in the way of getting up special cases, he was at the same time of opinion that they acted as powerful auxiliaries in the promotion of economy. The point was here however, he was ready to admit, well worthy of consideration, and he would cheerfully abide by the decision of the Committee. It would be derogatory, however, to the Court of Bankruptcy to suppose that the Judge, whose decision was appealed from, would state the case in any other than an impartial manner.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he hoped the Attorney General would reconsider the question. There were considerable objections to that part of the clause. In the first place, it changed the present practice of the law, which undoubtedly allowed of an appeal to the Lords Justices without the preparation of any special case. He could understand the latter portion of the clause which required the preparation of a special case in making an appeal from the Lords Justices to the House of Lords, because the appeal in that case would be on a point of law or equity, and they might be very properly called on to state a case for the consideration of the House of Lords. But an appeal to the Lords Justices would be an appeal not on the law of the case but on the facts, and if the appeal were on the facts a special case could not be settled. In settling the facts they would settle the case. There was another consideration. They allowed an appeal from the country Judges to the London Judge without any special case, and he could not understand why they should make any difference in an appeal from the London Judge to the Court of Chancery.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, he was in favour of the clause as it stood.

MR. COLLIER said, he should oppose the preparation of a special case being rendered necessary, as he knew how inconveniently it worked in the common law Courts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would assent to the Amendment.

MR. MALINS said, he would then move the omission of all the words after "order." The Attorney General, according to the previous Amendment, had given up the principle of the clause, which was to restrict the right of appeal; and he did not see, if there was to be an open appeal to the Lords Justices, why there should not also be an appeal to the House of Lords.

MR. MELLOR said, he trusted the hon. and learned Attorney General would not consent to the Amendment. In matters of this sort it was really essential that there should not be a multiplicity of appeals. In bankruptcy it was specially requisite that there should be a speedy and final determination; and one appeal was quite sufficient.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he thought in mercy to suitors, there should be some end of litigation, and the Lords Justices, with all the facts before them, were perfectly competent to pronounce a final decision without any appeal to the House of Lords.

MR. MALINS said, the Irish Bankruptcy Act gave an appeal in the manner proposed by his Amendment.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, as the Bill stood there was an appeal in a country case, first to the Metropolitan Commissioners, then to the Chief Justice, then to the Lords Justices, and, finally, to the House of Lords. He thought that there ought to be some restriction put upon the power of appeal.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he could not support the present Amendment. There was no analogy between the cases contemplated by the Bill and ordinary questions arising at law or equity between one man and another, where there might be little harm in the litigants fighting as long as it suited them. But it must be remembered that the winding-up of a bankrupt's estate was suspended by an appeal, and that until the rights of the parties were determined, hundreds, or it might be thousands, of creditors, could not get a shilling of dividend. In a case of bankruptcy, it was necessary to cut the knot and divide the estate; and he thought it would be quite sufficient if the right of appeal was given within the limits contained in the clause.

MR. MALINS said, that as the opinion of the Committee was against him, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 50 to 66 inclusive.

Clause 67 (Evidence, how taken).

SIR FITZROY KELLY moved, in line 5, after "oath," to insert the words "in open Court."

MR. ROEBUCK asked the Attorney General to consent to the omission of the words, "or by interrogatories in writing." The system of taking evidence by interrogatories was at once the most incomplete, the most confused, and the worst that could be resorted to. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman was not about to perpetuate it by his Bill.

MR. EDWIN JAMES said, he concurred in the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield.

MR. MALINS said, he thought that as a general rule viva voce evidence was the more satisfactory; but he would not remove from the Bill the permissive power of taking evidence by interrogatories.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL explained that it was by no means intended to render the system of interrogatories general, but there were particular cases in which it was necessary to have the power of taking evidence in that manner. It was only proposed to put the Courts of Bankruptcy in this respect on the same footing as Courts of law.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he thought it would be better to leave it to the Court to decide in which way evidence should be taken in each particular case.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL pointed out that for the most part proceedings before the Bankruptcy Court were analogous to those before a superior Court of common law sitting in banco, and it would therefore be wise to give the Court the power of taking evidence by affidavit.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 68 to 72 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 73 (Registrars of the Insolvent Debtors Court).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would propose to leave out of the 3rd line the words "Registrars and Taxing Officers," and in the 4th line the words "as such," thereby transferring those officers from the Insolvent Debtors' Court to act in the London District Court of Bankruptcy, and to add "in such manner as the general order of the Court shall direct."

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he fully concurred in the propriety of transferring these officers instead of superseding them, and so avoid compensation, but he thought the question of the salaries they received, together with the extra large fees, should be considered and revised. He believed that there was no such officer, to speak technically, as a "registrar of the Insolvent Debtors' Court."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the salaries of these officers would be as before. If there was in reality no "registrar," the person so transferred under such misnomer, if it were found to be such, should be correctly described.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 74 (Registrars of the Insolvent Debtors Court).

MR. VANCE proposed to amend the clause by transferring the right of nomi-

Mr. Malins

